Sophomores Chick Johnson and Chris Egizi combined for seven goals and five assists Saturday afternoon as the varsity hockey squad improved its season record to 6-5 with an easy 10-3 thrashing of Little Three and Division III foe Wesleyan. It was the tenth consecutive Williams win over Wesleyan and the nineteenth straight Little Three victory for the Ephs.

The win was an important one, however, for the Purple, as it helped to ease the damage done to the team's pride in a 6-0 shutout at the hands of Middlebury last Wednesday. Junior netminder Ed Weiss turned away 25 Cardinal shots in the win, the same number as Wesleyan goalie Steve Capone.

Williams got on the board early in the contest, as Egizi scored on feeds from linemates Johnson and junior John Bessone, returning to action after a two-game layoff. Johnson's

by Frank Carr

A powerful Union contingent invaded Towne Fieldhouse on Friday evening and blew the Ephmen right off the track (and field). The Dutchmen won eight of twelve events and racked up 74 points to avenge their narrow loss to the Ephs last season. Coach Dick Farley saw his crew scramble for 39 points and second in the tri-meet, posting a victory over a 16 point Middlebury effort. Williams is now 3-2 on the year, with a tough quadrangular meet coming up next Friday.

Freshman Jim DeSimone opened up the scoring with a second place heave in the shot put, of 42'7". Consistent point getter Greg McAleenan grabbed first place in the long jump and was closely pursued by three Union competitors who placed 2-3-4. Jim Holmes and Mark Eckert battled a couple of Dutchmen with poles and emerged with second and fourth respectively in the vault.

Union then jumped out to a 19 point lead after the next two events with Jamie Rouse scoring in both. Rouse popped a 41'5" triple jump for the number three spot and then came back with a fourth in the high jump, which was won by Union's Mike Cozzens who set a new fieldhouse record of 6'7".

The running events started off with a 9 lap neck and neck contest between captain Ken Leinbach and Union's Kevin Scheuer. After hitting the 880 in 2:11, the duo stepped on the accelerator and blazed across the finish line in under 4:20, Scheuer's mile victory of 4:16.4 paced Leinbach to an excellent 4:17.9 clocking.

The spectators lining the track for the 60 yard dash finals saw captain David Bass sprint his way to fourth. Bass secured the lone Williams point in the event with a 6.7 second performance. After being shut out in the 600, the Ephmen countered with back-to-back individual victories. Junior Ron White zipped over 60 yards worth of hurdles for the win, stopping the watches at 7.5 seconds.

Joe Kolb took winning honors in the two mile run for the second straight week and easily qualified for the Easterns with an 18 lap time of 9:23.5. Frank Carr followed Kolb's pace and matched the Eastern qualifying standard, finishing second in 9:30.0. Freshman Mike Behrman added a fourth and topped off a 9 point Eph total for the event.

Leinbach returned in the 1000 yard run and once again faced a very eager Kevin Scheuer. The Dutchman took the tape breaking honors but Leinbach posted his best time ever, netting the runner-up position at 2:17.5. Dave Seeger and Jeff Coombs chalked up the final Williams points of the meet finishing third and fourth respectively behind Leinbach.

Farley's tracksters will take on Springfield Albany State and Lowell tnis Friday evening.

Wes women topple purple skaters, 3-2

In a far cry from the slow skating, board slamming women's ice hockey team that first took the ice three years ago, a well drilled, quick Williams team presented a legitimate challenge to a tough Wesleyan club, losing 3-2 Saturday.

The Ephs, supported by a hundred loyal fans, went ahead early against the Cardinals on a goal by junior Sarah Baldwin. Wesleyan then responded with two quick goals. Center Mary Fish, dumping one past the Wesleyan goalie, tied the score early in the third period.

The Ephs looked tough in the final period on the goaltending ability of Blythe Miller who managed to stop a threatening Wesleyan line throughout the third period. With two minutes to go, the visitors put one past Miller to secure a 3-2 win.

Meeting Union in the season's home opener last Saturday, the Ephs set a new rink record, whipping the Dutchwomen 12-0. Three Williams women turned in hat tricks in the upset with Mary Fish grabbing four goals, while Betsy McGean and Marty Taft scored three.

Earlier this season, the team was shut-out by a tough Middlebury squad. Under the coaching supervision of seniors Jim Ford and Steve Christakos, the women will next take the Chapman ice Saturday, February 12 against Colgate.

Women cagers thrash Clark, 64-44

by Nancy Rhein

In a display of defensive strength and improving teamwork, the Williams women's basketball team easily defeated Clark 64-44 Thursday in Lasell. The team, 2-1 prior to last night's game at Wesleyan, was working well together demonstrating more of a team effort, rather than the outstanding individual performances that were characteristic of their earlier games.

Although Clark jumped to a 13-6 lead seven minutes into the game, the Ephs came back quickly as a result of the defensive rebounding of senior forward Robin Ellett. While Ellett handled the play-breaking, Ann Youngling, with assistance from Lisa Capaldini, took charge of the Eph's scoring drive, grabbing 11 points in the next 13 minutes, while Maggie O'Brien added eight.

Hustling on defense, the Ephs, in zone, forced several Cougar turnovers and turned them into points for Williams, knotting the score at 18 at 9:25. The team then rolled on to a big lead, but not without paying in fouls for the half's tough defense, as guard Monica Grady and forward Leigh Wilson were in foul trouble at the end of the half.

Despite her three fouls, Wilson played out the half, joining with Youngling and guard Leslie Milne, in for Grady, to run up an 18 point lead going into the lockerroom.

Early in the second half, team veterans O'Brien, Milne, Capaldini, Youngling, and Ellett worked well and saw the results of their effective playmaking as the Ephs really pulled away. Forcing the Cougars to use a basket hanger to get on the scoreboard, the Ephs defensive effort helped retain their 47-25 lead.

Coming in for Youngling, freshman Jeannie Weeks combined with Grady for several plays, before Grady returned to the bench on her fifth foul. Hudson emptied the bench at 64-34 and the remainder of the game, which had been quite a display of team play, was chaos as inexperienced players from both squads "played" out the last five minutes. Clark, grabbing ten quick points received little challenge from the Williams bench although Weeks looked good for the Ephs.

The slow final minutes were quite a change of pace from the speed and drive seen earlier in the game. Wilson, Youngling and Capaldini were effective offensively going for 14, 11 and ten points respectively. O'Brien, with eight points, also had a good defensive game grabbing ten rebounds, second to Ellett who picked off 12 for the day. Freshman Grady's foul troubles held her to only six points while teammates Weeks and Ellett had four.

Looking stronger after every game, the team should have a good shot at Vermont this Saturday at 2 in Lasell. Although the northerners handed the Ephs a 56-42 loss last year, the Ephs are ready to avenge that defeat and with the skill and depth of the present squad the prospects for an upset look good. For the faithful, that's 2 p.m. in the "cozy confines".

Trustees randomize tenure

by Ty Tenberg

The Board of Trustees abolished the tenure system yesterday when it voted to approve a committee report. The committee, chaired by Ann G. Vine, recommended that the present system be replaced with one which has degrees of randomness and diversity.

Most board members described the change as radical but necessary. William Curtiss, chairman of the executive committee, said the change had the support of students as well as a few faculty members.

John W. Chandler, president of the College and a member of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions, said the change is not really radical. "There is much randomness in our present system," he said. We tenure some bad teachers and refuse to tenure some good ones. "Just take a look at this year's decisions," he said.

The faculty Steering Committee immediately passed a resolution opposing the decision.

The Ann G. Vine committee refused to devise a new system but did make some proposals.

The committee urged the College to use its computer. "We suggest that each present faculty member be allowed to rank the academic divisions in order of preference. The computer would fill the tenure openings in each division on a random basis. Professors would then be assigned to departments within the divisions.

The committee suggested that half the present faculty be given tenure at this point through the system. The computer would select which members do not get tenure. In each of the next three years, there would be an additional four tenure openings in addition to openings caused by retirement. After that period, there would only be openings because of retirement and resignation.

Professors would be able to go through the random selection process in their fifth year and if denied tenure would have to leave after their sixth year.

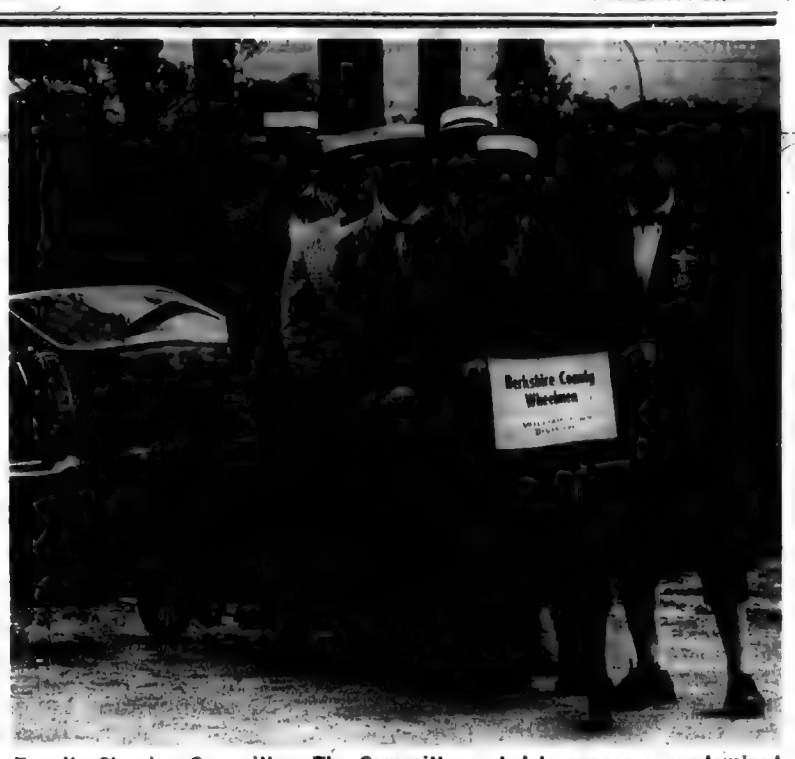
The Ann G. Vine committee reached two major conclusions after eight full committee meetings and nine months of effort:

"1. Tenure at Williams has come to exercise a disproportionate role in the life of junior faculty members, and as a result the primary educational purposes of the College are not being fully realized.

2. Long continued delegation to the CAP by the College of a large part of its responsibilities with respect to tenure is a major cause of many existing conditions and lousy tenured professors which are harmful to the educational purposes of the College."

The report warns, "It is obvious the proposed plan will take time. It is also obvious that the transition period will be a difficult one because, until the program is in full operation, existing divisions and rigidities within the faculty may temporarily become even more serious."

The report concluded, the proposal "is not designed to make a bad Williams good, but to make a good Williams better."



Some senior faculty members have reacted rather negatively to the proposal. A group of younger members is planning a candle light march in front of President Chandler's Main Street residence.

H. William Oliver, Thomas T. Read Professor of Mathematics, said he was pleased by the decision and that he would donate his title to the College. Oliver is alleged to be near retirement.

Oliver's department chairman Guilford L. Spencer took a different approach. "If they want my title (Frederick Latimer Wells Professor of Mathematics), they are going to have to buy it from me at a high price.

Marlowe faces investigation on mailroom abuse

"I once got a 12 cubic foot package in one of those little mailboxes," mail czar Charlotte Marlowe said proudly.

Marlowe was speaking to a panel investigating abuses in the mail system at Williams.

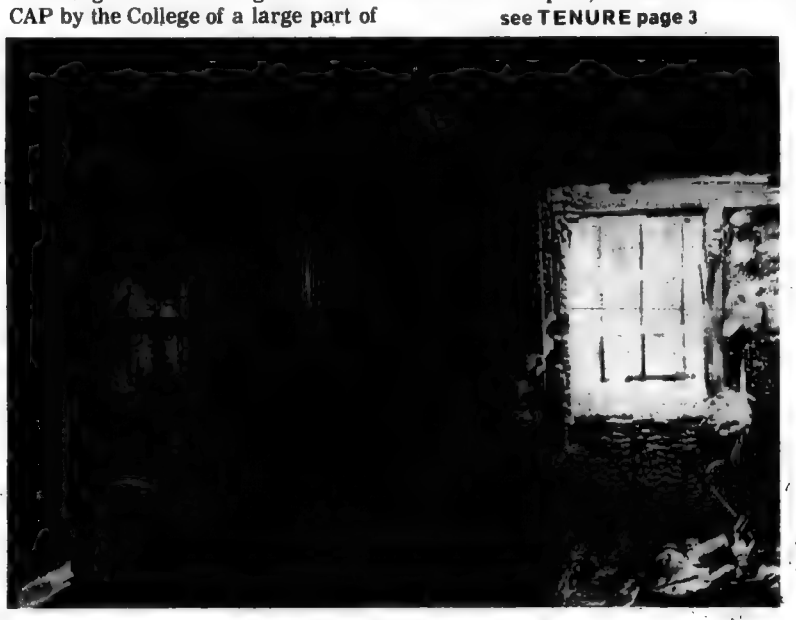
"For many students receiving mail is the most exciting part of their day. There are students waiting for medical school acceptances and big packages, but the most fun are the girls waiting for letters from their boyfriends. I really enjoy those letters," she said.

She maintains her office likes to add fun and excitement to people's days. "We will never place more than one letter of acceptance in anyone's mailbox," she claims.

When asked how she could tell an acceptance from a rejection, she pointed to a special steam machine she uses to open letters.

"We throw out extra acceptance letters; once a person has heard from somewhere, he gets drunk. Grad schools always send second letters if the first ones get thrown out. These second letter have a 24 hour response period. That's where the typing business I run on the side comes in handy."

She denied that she refuses to deliver mail to persons who do not use her typing system. "They just get it late."



She said she is most proud of her record of losing 62 packages a month. Marlowe said she never forgets to put notices in people's boxes that packages have arrived. "At times, we add a few extra."

"There is another thing I enjoy: hearing students complain that their packages are lost. You would think that they are all getting shipments of drugs."

According to Marlowe, only a few students receive drugs in the mail and most of that is only cocaine." I always get my take on the drugs." "I've got a student with a big Jewish nose who does the sniffing for me," she told the investigating panel.

The panel consists of former mailmen and of students who used to steal magazines from row house mailboxes.

Marlowe said her new system has cut down on the theft of magazines. "I take the 'skin' ones home for my daughter, but the rest get properly delivered, sometimes to the right person."

Garfield House in its last days. Dean of Housing Cristy Roosenraad said the house will be replaced with a parking lot for Mission Park houses.

Deans tear up Garfield

by Jake Snakely

Dean of Housing Christy Roosenraad announced today that the College is planning to tear down Garfield House next January. It will be replaced by a well-lit parking lot for residents of Mission Park.

Security Director Walter O'Brien stated that this move "should put an end to vandalism of student vehicles." He voiced confidence that "this would more than make up for any inconvenience of the short walk."

The Record has learned that the College has been trying to "knock over" Garfield for the last three years, possibly because of open attempts to revive the secret sorority, "The Sweethearts of Delta U." During this period the furnace has exploded three times and sticks of dynamite were found secreted in the house fireplace. Fortunately, these were fitted with the wrong blasting caps. Record investigator Ann McCall said "this shoddy sort of work is typical of the B&G Plumbers."

Students have discovered other evidence of a plot on the life of the old English Tudor. Non-functional fire alarms and extinguishers have ruined countless practical jokes. One Wood House Woman, who was being chased by a very drunken rugby player, attempted to call Security on the red phone. She got Dial-a-Prayer instead. The sprinkler system refused to go off despite a combined assault of matches, lighters, blowtorches, flamethrowers, hand grenades, and chainsaws.

When house president Tim Pritchard hooked his electric bong to the smoke detector, he was surprised to hear, not an alarm, but a recording of "Woe to Lord Jeffrey" by the Legionnaire's Disease.

Reporter Cy Yid asked Director of Student Housing Charles Junkey what he was going to do about next year's Garfield seniors. He replied, "Why the hell should I care? Students are animals. All they want is tight ear muffs, loose sheets, and a warm place to lay."

President Chandler was somewhat more concerned about the situation. He has offered to move to West College for the spring, making his house available to Garfielders. The only conditions: that Larry Rainey and John Mitchell cease their attempts to resurrect Delta Upsilon, and that he Chandler be given a room on the third floor of West . . .

Keller jailed in oleo scandal

by C. Rick Wristring

Food Service Director Ross Keller is being held in contempt of court in Boston under orders from U.S. District Court Judge Arthur Garrity. According to a court spokeswoman, Keller refused to testify before a grand jury investigating kickbacks in the margarine industry.

The spokeswoman said, "Mr. Keller refused to remove his imperial crown and testify." She would not elaborate on the nature of the investigation. But informed sources claim the investigation focused on Keller's ban on use of butter at Williams.

When contacted at his jail cell in Boston, Keller refused to take with the Record because it had not made an appointment a week in advance. However, he did tell a WCFM Radio news reporter that he had done nothing wrong.

"When I came to Williams, I decided to cut down on the administrative and special catering costs and to spend more money on food. Margarine costs more than butter, so we buy margarine instead of butter. We do, however, serve butter at special events at which College administrators are present. But this is only part of our effort to cut costs on such events."

Keller is expected to remain in jail until Monday at which time he will have another opportunity to testify before the grand jury. Keller asked Judge Garrity not to place him in jail because it would threaten his efforts to plan another special guest meal such as last week's inauguration special.

The Record has learned that this Thursday's roast beef dinner has been replaced with the Jail Special. Waiters wearing striped outfits with weights tied to their feet will be serving bread and water. The walls will be covered with crepe paper stripes giving the impression of a jail.

Keller inadvertently told WCFM that the money for the metal plates for the meal will come from his "kickback" fund. But when questioned further he denied that the "kickback" fund was a margarine kickback fund.

According to the food services sources, there is also a poultry kickback. Keller denied this: "We have been serving poultry dishes five times a week because I own a chicken farm in Pownal. This way the College gets fresh chicken," he said.

"If I owned a cattle ranch, we might serve more beef," Keller asserted.

Keller said that in his absence Vivian LePage would run food services. "It should be no problem for her. I will call in the menus. Students will eat the same things as I am eating here. Viv will just be responsible for controlling portion size."

LePage indicated she would make some other changes also. According to LePage, the College will no longer use Aladco Linen Service to wash aprons, tablecloths and other items. "We will require that dirty linen be sent to the LePage Laundromat on Cole Avenue where the persons with the easiest jobs on campus, the row house cooks, will wash, dry and iron them."

From prison, Keller reports that he is getting some new menu suggestions from cell mate Constantine Anagnos, who is serving time for violation of anti-trust laws.

Jim Hodgkins, Assistant Director of Food Services, said that Business Manager Shane Riorden told him that regardless of any changes in the food service administration, Hodgkins would remain in his present position "forever."

In other action, LePage announced that Row House Unit Manager Roy Clark was being promoted to the position of Omelette Cook. He will work out of President Chandler's kitchen. "Mrs. Chandler just loves his omelettes," LePage said.

Ross Keller . . . in jail

Perry House steward Andy O'Donnell said he will very much miss Roy Clark. "He was a fun guy to watch in action," O'Donnell said. According to sources, O'Donnell is under consideration for Clark's post. O'Donnell, however, insists that he must complete law school before accepting the position. "You never know when we might get sued when someone gets sick on this stuff."

The Williams Record

This is the annual parody issue of The Williams Record. Whether it will be published again depends on the outcome of certain lawsuits now pending. We assume that the absurd nature of these four pages makes it abundantly clear to all that they were written in jest, with no—well maybe a little—attempt to portray persons and institutions as they really are. The names have been changed to protect the guilty. This parody is in part written in reaction to the deadly serious and overbearing style into which the Record occasionally falls. We hope it will be as humorous for you to read as it was for us to write.

Editorial

Who's Got The Power

Before trying to solve the myriad of problems facing Williams students today, a crucial question to ponder is "who has the power to change that which the students dislike?" Clearly, the ability to influence student opinion is almost as important as the ability to take direct action.

The student power elite has five components: The Record, Pique, WCFM, the College Council and the Finance Committee. The heads of these groups determine the agenda for the student body.

Take the Record. It has clout because journalists have emerged nationally as guardians of the public conscience. The Record is fortunate that it can take advantage of this national movement, because there is no other way that archaic rag could gain respectability. The only thing that isn't stale about that paper is the beer the editor-in-chief drinks. "Drinks?" A better word for it is "Wallows in"!

Periodicals formerly called literary magazines have become essentially news magazines; these publications have the time to analyze problems in greater depth than newspapers; a more personal style of writing is accepted here. These factors give publications like Pique persuasive power. The editor of Pique favors a loose style of writing and allows her contributors to flirt with danger in their investigations. As a matter of fact, "loose style" and "flirting" extend beyond Miss you-know-who-you-are's writing; they describe her lifestyle. I wonder how Pique comes up with so many stories of a confidential nature?

An alert radio station has the advantage over the printed media because it can get information out faster. Those first impressions one gets from hearing news on the radio usually contribute most to a person's final position. Radio interviews have become a useful tool; the new program director of WCFM has mastered the art of interviewing. I think he picked this ability up from his psychiatrist. Rather, one of his psychiatrists; I mean, he's had so many words ending in "phobia" or "osis" attached to his name that he's a living dictionary of mental disorders. I sure hope that electroshock works!!

Student government, by title, is recognized as the body that maintains order in the process of change. College Council President is a demanding job when some faction of the body politic wants change. It is a tribute to the current CC president's efficiency that he has time to do other things. And YOU should have seen what other things he was up to Sunday night!!! I realize that politicians are used to public exposure, but there ARE certain kinds of public exposure that are simply no-nos!! I mean, being open and candid have limitations.

Finally, it has been said that whoever pays the piper calls the tune, and the Finance Committee of the CC, by virtue of its tight hold on the purse-strings, also has a tight hold on the piper. Now, I don't mean to imply that the chairman of this committee carries a purse. Why, that would be the end of me, I tell you! His henchmen—dear chaps with IQ's hovering around their shoe sizes—would drop me in the Hoosac River wearing cement shoes. Sometimes I wonder where Mr. Chairman gets the money to support his friends? For that matter, how does he support his umpteen wives? I'm SURE he doesn't "take a little off the top" of the Student Activities Tax; he would rather sample off the bottom, the middle and the four sides!!! Woops, please gentlemen, I don't want to go for a swim tonight. I haven't finished my editori

To the editor:

Well, maybe you don't need Security at your parties anymore. Maybe we can't shut your parties down at 2 anymore. Also, just becuase undergraduates are manning regular Security shifts doesn't mean we're any less important or necessary to this campus. It's OK, all this doesn't bother us.

Coarse guide

To the editor:

For years students have argued for an uncensored evaluation of courses and teachers. I would like to see a guide to students.

If I had known that Scott Fenn only had a 3 for class preparation and a 2 in "excitement in class" I would never have let him into my 385 F class.

Laszlo Versenyi told me he would have taken a sabbatical one year earlier if he had known that Ham Throckmorton was the only major in the History of Ideas department.

I see no reason why professors shouldn't be better informed on what students are a pain in the ass in class. With that kind of information, we would be much better informed when it comes to deciding who to bump from a class.

NEWS BRIEFS

Eusden elucidates existence

Williams College Chaplain John D. Eusden addressed the Chapel board Friday night to discuss the topic of phenomenology in a rationally integrated high order consciousness state augmented by deification of neuralgic persona syndrome in America, in light of Zen Buddhism and Christianity.

Eusden called for a "backing out of the illustion of rational self motivated integration, in an existential orientation," which he said meant "rigorous self examination, rehabilitative unyielding comprehensibilities of the phenomenology of mystique over reason." "We should recognize with Ghandi," said Eusden, "that the essence of comprehensibility is obscured realistic rationalism of the highest order. That the path to Nirvana is the brahamptura of the soul and the tampura of the mind."

"No one at the meeting understood what he said," noted Eusden's wife Joanne, "'but I did because I know him personally."

Council funding fiasco

The college council met last night to ratify final budget appropriations for the 1978 year. The only complication arose over a grant of 15,000 dollars to the magazine ojukwa-amjowwa. This is the fourth year the group has requested the funding, and they promise that they will have an issue out . . . one of these days.

Shooters strike oil at Mt. Hope

President Chandler disclosed yesterday that oil has been discovered on Mt. Hope Farm. Apparently, a moose-poacher struck a gusher when one of his shots missed. Amoco geologist Fanny Fox was called in immediately to sound the depth of the deposit. Sources close to the Fanny said it was the biggest strike since King Kong.

It is further reported that President Chandler is considering using the income to move the College to Williamsburg, Virginia, so that students will be able to pick up lost mail from relatives. "This move will have the additional benefit that more parents will be able to find their way to graduation," Chandler added.

Town bank fears competition

The Williamstown National Bank has filed suit against the Williamstown Savings Bank, Berkshire Bank, First Agricultural Bank and Ken's Market for damages caused by increased competition.

"We are no longer able to charge for checking accounts and for making more than two withdrawals a month," the bank president said. "Ken stabbed me in the back when he moved out," the angry president asserted.

The suit was filed in the Williamstown District Court but may be moved elsewhere because the Williamstown Savings Bank holds the mortgage on the Spring Street building.

The president said, "We had a choice; we could have started giving out free dishes to lure customers, but that would have decreased our profit margin temporarily."

Record plays 'em, trades 'em

Three used Record reporters, an undisclosed number of quasi-usable typewriters and Kip Lamb's scandal sheet have been traded to Pique, the campus literary magazine, for two artsy photographers, 27 raunchy photographs and Pique's entire collection of Sports Illustrated cheesecake issues, Record coach Scott Fenn announced moments before the closing bell of the Winter Study trading session yesterday.

At the same time, Fenn announced that he had placed rookie reporter Karen Walker on waivers and sold columnist Tony Spaeth to the Philadelphia Legionnaire for an undisclosed number of Marv Throneberry baseball cards.

"I told Karon to get back in the pool where she belonged," Fenn noted. "She just doesn't seem to have what it takes to make the Record team," he stated in defending his unpopular decision.

In other trades made today, Record General Manager Bill Dahling announced that news editor Dave MacGregor would be sent back to the minors and features editor John Rindlaub would be allowed to play out his options in Austria.

"Ya, we gave MacGregor back to the Globe because his nasty red hair just didn't jive with the wallpaper in our new office," Dahling exclaimed. He added that Rindlaub was being held by Austrian officials because he couldn't satisfactorily explain why he was carrying 2000 intimate sex surveys into a brothel in Vienna.

According to Fenn, other media trades are in the making at this time. "We're trying to swap Sally Coney to Pique for Anne Eldridge," the characteristically lascivious Fenn continued, "but they're currently being a bit unrealistic. Right now they wouldn't give her to us for Coney, Nancy Rhein and our autographed picture of Farah Fawcett-Majors because she's the only one who knows the combination to their Baxter mailbox."

Busl hits wasp in snack bar

by Gregory McDavid

Officer Willard Busl of the College security force destroyed a wasp last Friday at 6:45 p.m. in Baxter Hall.

Security officer William Busl reports in to headquarters with the news that he has successfully terminated the life of a wasp which was menacing the Baxter snack bar . . . Good job, Bill.

The wasp had been harassing snack bar personnel since 5:24 p.m.

Officer Busl answered the urgent summons of Dave Studenmund '77, who vaulted over the mailboxes into the mail room office to make the telephone call.

Witness Larry Sanders '77 said, "Yes, I would have to admit Mr. Busl was somewhat effective." Studenmund agreed but said, "My own strength and foresight should not go unnoticed."

"Although I seldom admit it, I'm highly allergic to three species of Iraqi wasp and that beast may have been one of those fatal kinds."

Climbing out of a file cabinet in the Record office, Ann McCabe admitted she was a bit frightened.

She said, "Gosh, it was really keen the way he (Busl) just stepped up and gave that insect the old one-two."

Obviously Busl is not allergic to wasps, Studenmund said.

All viewers agreed that the wasp put up little resistance after being crushed by Busl's shoe. Busl wears size 11½.

Pretentious company prances

by David Meme

Last night when I walked into the AMT, I thought for a minute that I had stumbled into a meeting of WGSO. On stage were at least 10 grown men prancing around in their underwear. I said to myself what the hell is going on. Someone next to me informed me that this was the opening performance of the B. Pretentious dance company, currently touring the Berkshires, and at Williams College for one performance, for a mere $15,000. Oh, I said and sat back to watch this artistic rendition, all the better informed. The music came up slowly, two guys minced across the floor, jumped up, spun around and ran off. Two more followed suit. Yes, I thought to myself. This is indeed high art. As the dance continued I was more and more intrigued with the intricate movements ... how the dancers held their position, how they moved with the gentle rhythm, how they managed to survive in those tight pants. But, the evening dragged on. Finally I was awakened by intermission. "Yes, I replied to all who asked, high art ... mighty high art". To you, however, I say, grown men prancing around in their underwear.

Trustee team "rediscovers" Williams

Six of the college's nine trustees were able to find Williamstown in time to make the first meeting of the trustee review board. Over a lunch of escargot, filet mignon, caviar, brownies flambee, served in Baxter, the committees got down to serious work, dispensing immediately with a review of the food.

Amply lubricated by trustee Bronfman's heady contribution, the meeting really got under way. Trustee Morgan (of Morgan Guarantee Trust), was surprised to learn that Williams is now accepting students from public schools. "Not too many" replied Trustee Luce (of Time-Life), "and besides, they also have women here." NO! replied trustee Electric (of General Electric), and fell out of his wheelchair. "Not like it was the last time I was here", said Trustee Rockefeller (obvious), "they've built all these new buildings, Bronfman, Baxter, Sage, Williams, West, ... my how the campus has changed". "Well," said Trustee Trans (of TWA), let's get down to business".

And so, the trustees sat down for a four hour meeting to decide how the colleges resources will be allocated and invested. Lucky we have such skilled men at the Helm, said President Chandler (of Williams ... he's the one who lives in the big white house) ... and the college bought a million dollars worth of Equity funding.

Artsy Fartsy Review

'Buffalo' explores musical horizons

by Jordan Marsh

The crowd at the Savoy Civic Center throbbed in anticipation. Frisbees and flourescent green glow sticks cascaded from the balcony to the main floor, occasionally clipping a doddering security guard in the back of the head. The buzz of excitement and synthetic chemicals had the audience swaying uncontrollably. They were here to see Buffalo, the hottest new discofunkelectrosoulacid-rock band, the latest in the now passe genre of geographically-named groups.

Buffalo is roughly halfway between Chicago and Boston. They combine the melodic, perhaps harmonic horniness of Chicago with the ethereal, heavenly heaviness of Boston and arrive at their own distinctive, almost nondescript style. Fusing complexly interwoven substructures of subtle cross-rhythms with mind-messing, soul-searing, brain-bending guitar leads, the group has attracted a small, demented following over the past week.

The atmosphere is electric, maybe noxious as the house light dims and the stage light comes up. The band staggers on stage, and straps on their weapons of music. The roadies turn them around to face the audience, remove their muzzles and leg irons, and Buffalo is ready for action.

Lead singer Buffalo Chip dominates the stage, pawing and hoofing at the rotted wooden floorboards like an enraged South American yak. He resembles the imaginary bastard offspring of Patty Smith and Iggy Pop, heaven forbid. His voice cuts through the din with the piercing sense of urgency and importance which this reviewer can liken only to an air raid signal, or maybe Jackie Gleason. Discarding the normal practice of octaves and words, Buffalo Chip babbles incoherent doggerel which oozes like warm Kaopectate.

Buffalo Bill bangs booming bass all the time, content to stand behind the amplifiers, shunning the spotlight and crowd recognition. He emerges now and then to trade off searing guitar riffs with Buffalo Bob, his dear cousin and brother. Buffalo Bob plays the triple neck electricwah-wahfeedbackfuzzbox guitar with Manson-like authority. He can command it to sing, wail, scream for mercy, cry out in pain, maybe even kill.

The Buffalo Gals do a bang-up job on background vocals, and tease the audience to no end with their lecherous gyrations the longhairs call dancing. Buffalo Sabre and Brave complete the group, teaming up on percussion. They thump their dual Slingerlandwatercooled455reversech-romestudded drum sets with machine-like originality and thought. These two veterans (Korea) have been there and back, and boy does it show.

These hombres played all their hits tonight for the Savoy faithful, including all of their new "Hotel Tonawanda" album. The band is delving deeper into the disco scene, while not forgetting their roots (a la Haley) in the old West—to whit, "Frisco Duck." They close their show with their ankle-breaking, audience-maiming number, "Turn Your Feet Around, Turn Them Upside Down," and the fans do just that.

But the finale is what has made the band famous, and is what continues to attract new ones to their spectacular stage show. For the encore, the band dresses in buffalo hides and heads, playing, "Gore Gore Gore—How Do You Like It? How Do You Like It?" with a spontaneity last seen in Richard Speck. The audience loves it, and squeals with delight as the roadies take the stage dressed as paleface in cowboy outfits, slaughter the herd, and leave. The lights go out, the show is over, the message is clear—the American bison may be gone, but Buffalo is here to stay.

Administration approves sorority at Bascom Lodge

Dean of the College Peter Berek confirmed the existence of an underground sorority at Williams. According to Berek, some 25 women have been meeting in Bascom since early this fall under the auspices of Delta Delta Delta (Tri-Delta).

Berek said the society has obtained substantial funding from the national organization. "The sorority's financial records show that 20,000 dollars of donations have been received over the past four months," Berek announced. It is rumored that Williams alumni have also contributed financial and moral support to the group.

"The administration would like to see this money used to form a residential sorority under the Tri Delt charter," Berek said. The present housing system is inadequate for the needs of women, the dean added. "Some alternative is needed so that women and their interests are not stifled," Berek concluded.

Reverter clauses which have forced the administration to ban the return of fraternities, include no provisions concerning sororities, according to Berek. The return of a single fraternity would enable all other fraternities to reclaim their former facilities on campus. "Sororities create no such threat to the internal affairs of the College," Berek said, adding that he thought sororities should be given "every opportunity to expand."

In a letter sent to College President John W. Chandler, Pearl O'Reilly, head of the national Tri Delt organization, commended Williams. "The executive board of Tri Delt is delighted to see that Williams, a traditionally male-oriented college, has advanced to the point where sororities are accepted and welcomed by the administration," O'Reilly wrote.

According to informed sources, Associate Dean Nancy J. McIntire and English professor Lynda K. Bundtzen are among several faculty members who have been admitted to the sorority although neither were available for confirmation. Other women faculty members expressed approval of Tri Delt's formation and many said they had sought admission into the society themselves.

This recently restored masterpiece, now on display at Clark Art Institute, was discovered beneath a painting of the cathedral of Notre Dame in the basement of Agard House. The only portion of the earlier work visible in both paintings was the head on the far right, which appeared in a line of gargoyles on the cathedral. Requests for prints should be addressed to the Unemployed Editors-in-Chief Association, Cranford, N.J.

Discipline Committee bear all

The Discipline Committee has voted to open its meetings to the entire College community, effective February 29, committee chairman Andrew Crider announced today. "The College Council has asked that committee meetings be open, and we felt that the selfish interests of a small minority should not stand in the way," explained Crider. "They're probably guilty, anyway," he added.

Committee sessions will be held in Bronfman Auditorium, said Crider, because "since so few students actually know how the Discipline Committee functions we wouldn't want to turn anyone away."

When asked if he felt that open meetings of the Discipline Committee would violate student privacy, he pointed to open College Council meetings as an indication that "most students enjoy humiliating themselves before an audience."

Security Director Walter O'Brien commented that open committee meetings would save him several thousand dollars each year in bribes to find out which students were likely to be dismissed from the College so that his men could confiscate their coffee pots and popcorn makers. "Without this information, confiscations become more difficult to plan. We may end up having to pay security officers salaries."

Committee on Educational Policy Chairman George "Open Meetings," Goethals suggested that the committee exclude Record reporters, however. As a group, the per capita consumption of coffee and doughnuts by Record reporters is quite unbelievable," he said.

Tenure is now random

Professor of Chemistry, is threatening the College with a law suit. Compton told the Record, "My lawyer told me not to comment."

Dean Peter Berek said that he was concerned that he might lose the favorable rates he has on his mortgage if the computer does not renew his tenured position. He said he will remain in Williamstown if he is not tenured. "My wife has a good job at Lawrence Hall," the Dean said.

Student reaction was mostly mixed. One student said, "It is difficult to react until we see which old fogies the computer knocks off. Now Teitenberg and Grudin have a second chance."

Sally Coney, chairman of the Student Housing Committee, asked whether faculty members who got tenure would be able to transfer from one department to another, and how many times.

Cris Roosenraad, who sources claim was a victim of the old system's randomness factor, warned that transfers would limit diversity within department. When asked if could teach Russian literature if assigned to the Russian Department, he said, "Damnit, I'll do anything for tenure. I can take a cram course in the summer."

The trustees decision is effective next week.

The state meanwhile had demanded that the school widen library doors, to provide equal access.

Mitchell muffles rumors

by Clark Kent

College Council representative Larry Mitchell '78 today denied that he had any intention of running for College Council president. An astute Record reporter saw Mitchell running off campaign announcements at Office Services and asked him about the election. "Let me make one thing perfectly clear, it is with a heavy heart that I have no comment at this point in time," he replied tersely. "If nominated I will not run, and if elected I will not serve," he said.

Realizing there was no story here, the reporter started to leave, but Larry jumped in front of the door blocking his path. "I might, however, accept a draft. I'd be the perfect candidate, though," he said, "I agree with everyone on all of the issues. I voted to close CEP meetings, but sponsored a motion to open them to the Record. I voted in the By-Laws committee to eliminate at-large council representatives, but on the council floor I switched to vote with the majority. No one can possibly disagree with me."

"Won't your wavering, waffling, and wobbling on the issues alienate those who really care?" asked the very bored reporter, who had by now given up trying to force his way through the door.

"Not at all," he quickly replied. "No one follows the council anyway, so it doesn't make any difference what I do."

"Well then, why aren't you going to run?" queried the reporter.

Mitchell fell silent, looked the reporter in the eye, and said, "I've seen other offices, but they didn't affect me. I lusted in my heart after this one, though. I've spoken with Harry Kelly and he forgave me, so everything is all right."

"But wouldn't it look good on your transcript?" wondered the Record representative.

"Sure, but as I always say, ask not what you can do for your college, but what your college can do for you . . . or something like that."

"Anyway, my roommate loves me," he said. "My dog Checkers loves me. I don't need you or the rest of the student body to feed my ego, I don't care what Barickman, Kelly or McKay think. You won't have Larry Mitchell to kick around anymore."

Mitchell, noticing the filing deadline was only five minutes away, bolted out of the room. He ran, pausing only to shake hands and kiss freshmen, and shouted, "I'm not running, I'm not running, Larry Mitchell for President."

Grapplers in scoring slump, coach claims

by Sally Call Me (2921)

Wrestling coach Joseph Dailey met yesterday with members of the Western Massachusetts League of Scorers to discuss the outcome of his team's most recent matches. "With scoring at a record low in the last four matches, you know something's got to be done to get it up again," Dailey told the WMLS.

Dailey stressed the importance of "coming out on top" in his testimony, telling the League members that "the score is all that really matters when it comes to keeping the boys on the mats."

James (Jimmy) Rodgers, chairman of the Williamstown chapter of the League of Scorers, explained that "the boys on Williams' teams have had scoring problems in the past" and that the difficulty is not a concern of the wrestlers alone.

The League suggested that Dailey conduct more rigorous practices but according to the coach, "Practices don't help. The boys simply aren't coming."

Carter's brother to talk to Seniors

by Suds Jorjer

Billy Carter, brother of the President, will deliver the Baccalaureate Address, College president John W. Chandler announced yesterday.

Carter, a gas station owner in Plains, Ga., will speak on the subject he knows best—beer, Chandler said.

"Baccalaureate Addresses have been all too serious in the past," Chandler said. "Billy is the perfect person to break the tradition."

"Who else would give out free beer while church is in session in a Southern Baptist town?" Chandler asked.

James Linen, Chairman of the Trustee Committee on Degrees, said Carter was chosen because he could talk sensibly about the item College students spend the most time learning about—beer.

Linen said he hopes that Carter will bring his niece Amy with him. "Maybe she will say a few words to the less intellectual members of the graduating class." "With those glasses she's now wearing, she could pass as a Williams woman," Linen stated.

Carter is expected to appear in his gas station attendant's outfit. He will remain on campus until Sunday to help visiting parents who are having trouble starting their cars.

WGSO attempts Olympic abortion

by Sy Hershey

A group calling itself the Williams Greylock September Organization (WGSO) nearly forced the cancellation of the Mission Park Winter Olympics, the Record learned today. Tight-lipped FBI agents finally elaborated on their terse "no comments" at a press conference yesterday, disclosing the planned kidnapping of President John W. Chandler and the Armstrong House spink team.

Partially shredded memoranda found in the Make-Love Room detailed the planned abduction of the President while he was en route to the opening ceremonies. The ransom demands were to be a cancellation of second semester, an extension of the Winter Study period through April, and unconditional amnesty for all leather carrying members of the WGSO.

In a related story, Armstrong president Peter Freisen disclosed that spink stars Chris Lovell, "Bear" Tone, Tim Dunnzo, and Frank "Bob" Lewis had received death threats from a terrorist organization. The link to the WGSO was found in the previously mentioned documents.

The FBI entered the case when Freisen reported the threats to Assistant Safety Specialist Abe Usal. He turned the case over to Special Agent Lewis Deerskin when phone taps on the spink team's phones revealed that the threats had crossed state lines. Any link to the alleged secret fraternities in Vermont and the WGSO was "pure speculation," Deerskin commented.

Launching a county-wide search unprecedented in the anals of Berkshire written and oral history, the FBI scoured the area for any traces of the terrorist organization. They found panty-hose with holes cut out, "make-shift masks", Deerskin noted, were found in the Make-Love Room as well.

The WGSO evidently got wind of the encircling dragnet, and hurriedly scratched their efforts. Deerskin said that the partially shredded memoranda indicated the haste with which the terrorists cancelled their nefarious plans.

Deerskin was happy that the Games were allowed to proceed as planned, and assured the College that the WGSO presently posed no threats. The FBI had been monitoring the group's movements for some time, but could find nothing irregular in their findings.

The FBI can pursue the case no further, Deerskin noted, but said he planned to continue tapping phones covertly on campus. He has given control of the equipment to Philip Marlowe, the New England Bell Representative to Williams College. Marlowe can monitor all calls, claiming it is standard Bell procedure for tracking down delinquent phone users. "This is strictly off the record," Deerskin added, who will undoubtedly be surprised when he finds this quote in the Record. Marlowe could be reached but had no comment.

Ephs drown at So. Conn

by Mark Spits

A "highly talented and thoroughly tapered" Southern Connecticut State swim team reeled out a series of "awesome efforts" in blowing away the Williams Ephmen, according to swim team manager and Record Coordinator of Aquatics Dennis O'Shea.

A well-informed source said the final score was 81-32.

Southern Conn coach Bruce Hutchinson, who, according to swim team manager Diane Curtis, was seeking his first dual meet win over Williams in six years, put his squad through two weeks of reduced training.

Sources close to the Southern coach said the team shaved down several of its top swimmers.

He had them so wound up they "might easily have beaten anybody in the league," co-captain Duff Anderson said.

The Ephmen managed only one first place all afternoon, the Record learned.

Sources close to the team identified Tom Beckett as the only Eph swimmers to take a first. A source said R. J. Connelly took second in the same race, the 50-yard freestyle.

Beckett allegedly posted his best time since he broke the freshman record in his first outing in December, but the timekeeper could not be reached for confirmation.

Williams coach Carl Samuelson revealed that distance man Stuart Dean lopped 18 seconds off last week's time in his best dual meet 1000 freestyle effort in two years.

Feds sautee pizza king

by Constantine

Constantine Anagnos, owner of the two pizza houses on Spring Street, was arrested yesterday and charged with violating federal anti-trust laws.

According to a spokesman from the U.S. District Attorney's office in Boston, Anagnos was charged with monopolizing the Spring street pizza business by owning all the pizzerias, controlling prices, and keeping Italians out of a business which is rightfully theirs.

Anagnos claimed he was innocent on all counts. "I make the best pizza in America, I can charge the highest prices", he said.

He also said, "Greeks make better pizza than Italians. In the old days, the Romans stole our gods and renamed them; I can steal their pizzas and rename them zas."

He continued, "My juke boxes play more than Greek music; I cannot help it if my customers know I make better zas with Greek music playing."

Sickly senior won't get out

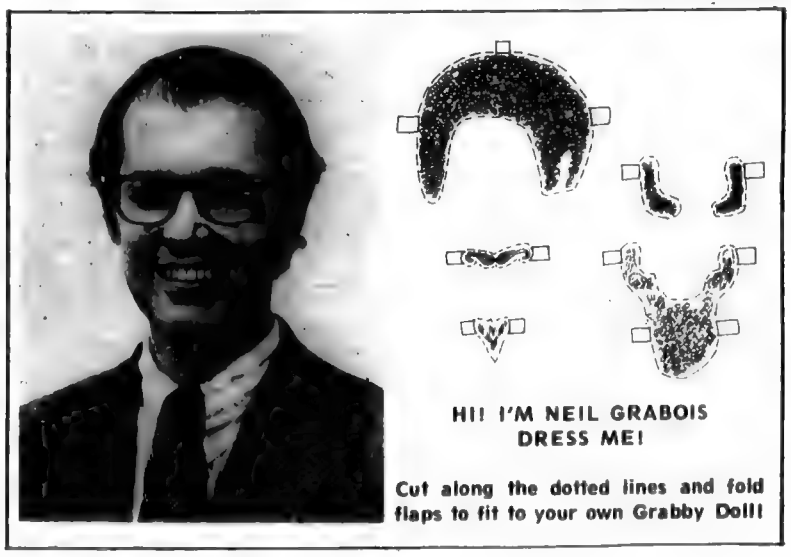
by Nate Bekembier

Williams senior Bradford J. Rock will not be participating in graduation ceremonies this year, so says Coach Peck, head of Williams P.E. department. "It's his own fault," Peck exclaimed, "he had plenty of opportunity to complete the requirements. We make it as easy as possible."

"We offered him a wide spectrum of courses (courses?) to choose from . . . basketball, volleyball, track, weight training, all important skills for later life, but he (Rock) would just sit there and do nothing. Many times he did not even make it into class."

Rock had little comment other than the hope that Peck will reconsider. "I threw him down the stairs the last time that sniveling coward came in here," said Peck.

The fact that Rock has been accepted in all Med schools he applied to has little effect on Peck's cold heart. "Requirements is requirements," stated Peck . . . and besides, if he can't sink a basket maybe he shouldn't be a doctor." "We had him down on the tennis courts once, and he couldn't even serve," argued Peck. "What kind of doctor is that?" . . . "all he could do was roll that dumb wheelchair around the courts, tearing up the clay."



Constantine "flips out."

CUL reports on campus life

The upperclass housing system here works well, the Committee on Undergraduate Life's (CUL) Final Report on the Residential Housing System maintained, although some moderate changes are desirable.

This report, summarizing research and discussion by the 12-member committee over the last three semesters, explored the general issues of diversity and house autonomy and outlined problems in eight aspects of housing, including minority groups, house transfers and alcohol.

The CUL reaffirmed "the College's opposition to special interest housing and its desire to maintain as diverse a student membership within each house as is reasonably possible." Responding to arguments that the random assignment of housing makes organizing social activities difficult and prevents special interest groups from coalescing, the CUL stated, "the argument in favor of forcing students of diverse backgrounds and interests to live together is based on its presumed educational value rather than on any claim that it will maximize a particular dimension of student happiness."

The committee supported the principle of house autonomy "for both educational and pragmatic reasons." "We feel that the houses should be as free as possible to organize and regulate house life."

Calling Blacks and women "two very visible minorities," the CUL urged houses to give these groups more active roles in planning activities. "... Black students generally do not look upon the Residential House as their social center. One reason is that the social activities sponsored by many houses tend to feature 'beer-bashes,' a mode of sociability which many Black students find distasteful."

The panel reported that women are having fewer housing problems than in the past and are becoming a more integral part of the College.

Allowing as many students to transfer to different houses as in 1976 "clearly threatens the diversity originally established by the random house inclusion, and ... reduces the flexibility of the system to the point where it becomes extremely difficult to find openings for genuine hardship cases ..." The CUL adopted a transfer system resembling freshman inclusion, where applicants rank their preferences for housing.

"This system may actually reduce the number of transfers, since an applicant always runs the risk of being assigned to a house that he or she likes less."

The CUL made no recommendations on alcohol consumption, observing that student opinion was split on the question of excessive expenditures for alcohol. The CUL's preliminary report in the fall suggested alcohol was a problem. The final report claimed that excessive drinking has led to violations of personal and property rights,

House inclusion begins soon

Sometime within the next two weeks, all freshmen will receive material in their mailboxes marking the beginning of the housing inclusion process. By the end of spring vacation, all freshmen will be assigned to one of the 15 residential houses.

The initial mailing will include application forms and a booklet describing the various housing options.

According to Housing Committee co-chairman, Jamie Barickman, upperclassmen wanting to change house affiliation and all freshmen must complete their applications before spring recess. Students may apply as individuals or in small groups. Students who sign up together will be assigned to the same residential house though not necessarily to the same room or suite.

Freshmen and transfers will rank the five categories for residential houses; Greylock, Mission Park, Fitch-Prospect, Dodd-Tyler and Row Houses, by order of preference.

During the spring recess, a computer will randomly assign freshmen and intra-house transfers to residential houses. The program attempts to maximize the number of students assigned to houses within their first choice category while making sure that all houses are filled.

This is the first year this procedure will be used for upperclassmen desiring to change house affiliation. Freshmen will receive priority over these transfers in the inclusion process.

Each of the housing categories has its strengths and weaknesses and appeals to different tastes, according to the booklet. To aid freshmen in their decisions, many houses will hold "open days" when students can examine the physical facilities of the houses and talk to house members.

The south side of Lasell Gym, housing the squash courts, is the proposed site for new athletic facilities.

College plans to augment current athletic facilities

The College is making plans to enlarge athletic facilities at Williams, according to Athletic Director Robert Peck. The project, which was approved several years ago along with the plans for improvement of the music and art buildings, includes a new gym, a new pool, a dance studio, wrestling room, weight room, offices, and equipment rooms. The proposed site for the new structure is south of Lasell gymnasium.

A Building Committee has been formed to organize the project, and a meeting with architects has been scheduled for March.

"We still have to raise the money for the project," said Peck, "so no dates have been set." Peck said there has been one meeting of the Building Committee so far, and the next will probably be this week.

In addition to improving the conditions for team sports, Peck said he anticipates greater opportunities for club team competition and recreational activities, as well as better physical education facilities.

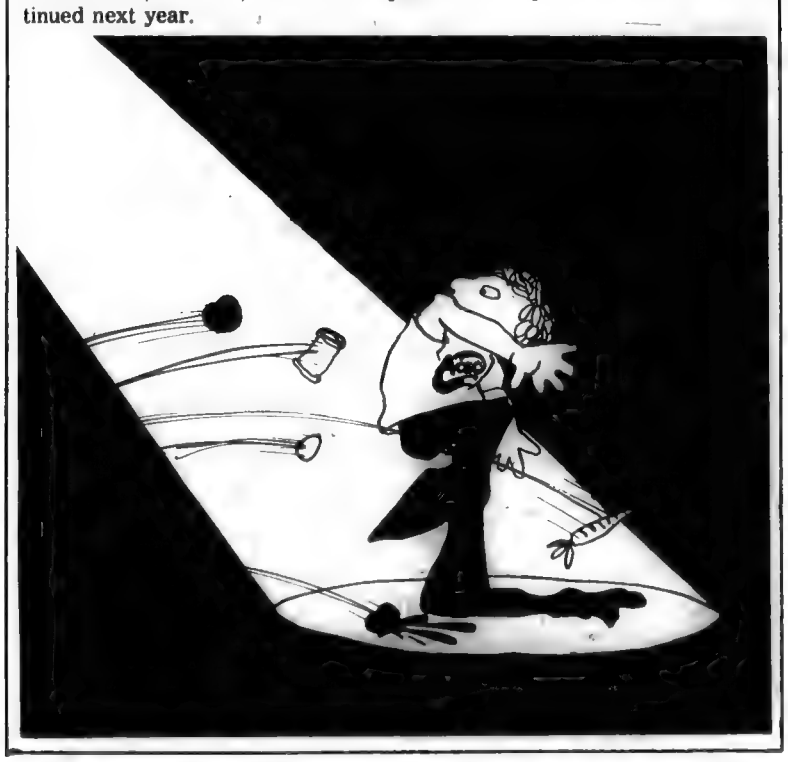
ACEC cancels concert blames losses on jazz

The All College Entertainment Committee (ACEC) probably won't sponsor another concert this year, co-chairman Jim Bowe predicted, because of poor ticket sales for the jazz festival.



The ACEC had hoped to have about $3000 left after the festival; Bowe estimates that the committee now has less than $1000 at its disposal. The committee has not yet made a decision either way on a spring rock concert.

Lionel Hampton was engaged for $2000, Charlie Mingus and Trent Arterberry for $1900 and David Sancious for $1250. Bowe approximated the losses for the performances were $1100, $1300, and $1300, respectively. The additional costs incurred for security, sound equipment, agent commissions, and food totalled over $2500 for the entire festival, Bowe said.

Turnout, especially for the Sancious concert was poor, Bowe noted and he attributed this to Sancious' less-recognized name. "It's too bad," Bowe said, "because the Sancious concert would probably have been the most popular one if more people had come. His music has a very electric sound." Bowe also said that the third concert generated almost no outside interest. A number of tickets were sold for the first two in North Adams.

Bowe attributed the possible spring concert cancellation in part to the lack of available funds and to the difficulty of selecting a particular artist who can interest enough people at Williams to make a concert profitable or at least solvent.

Bowe said, however, that he anticipates that the jazz series will be continued next year.

Constitution, again
CC amends proposal

The College Council resumed debate last week on the By-Laws Committee's proposed revision of its constitution, and accepted an amendment calling for the formation of special committees to deal with the issues that most concern the student body.

In other action at the council's meeting Tuesday night, Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad discussed the renovation of Garfield House and announced plans to create two new residential houses.

Jamie Barickman, Chairman of the Housing Committee, announced that the committee has decided to postpone its decision on the redistribution of the house maintenance tax until inclusion has been completed. Barickman called the issue of redistribution "too complicated" to be dealt with immediately.

The council passed, with amendments, Articles VI and VII of the proposed constitution. Article VI lays out the powers and functions of the College Council, and was amended to include a provision for more student

Suicide and the college student

Death. At adolescence it has a mysteriously unreal quality. More mysterious still is why it might be self-imposed. Yet suicide is a very real problem among college students, and while reliable statistics are difficult to find, its incidence appears to be rising.

The rate of successful suicides between the ages of 15-19 more than doubled between 1950 and 1970, and according to Dr. Robert Kastenbaum of the University of Massachusetts, it is the "general impression" of persons working with college students that they are becoming a still higher risk. Suicide is the second leading cause of death among college students, surpassed only by accidents.

Williams has had one suicide in each of the past two years, and none in the six preceding. This may have been in part a result of a widespread drop in campus suicide rates during the Vietnam war years. According to Dr. Eugene Talbot of the Williams College Health Services, it was his impression that "in comparison to other schools, Williams has significantly fewer suicides overall than other colleges like Williams," that is, among small liberal arts colleges. The rate at big universities is higher still, he says.

Talbot attributed the low rate here to the large number of support mechanisms in the college community. Friends, faculty and administrators all help give students outlets for discussing troubles. Says Dean of the College Peter Berek, "Williams is a very hard place to get lost in. It is difficult for students to get isolated from other students. They can almost always find someone to talk to about their troubles: roommates, JA's, chaplains, teachers, deans, the health services ... students here are less likely to find themselves with no one to talk to." Because of these support mechanisms, the psychological counseling service is used only one half to two thirds as much at Williams as at comparable colleges, according to Talbot.

Thoughts of suicide are extremely common among adolescents, according to Talbot. Just about all students think about it at one time or another, and "many people fear that they are the only ones thinking about it," says Talbot. "(Adolescence)" he continues, "is an age of great searching, including broad thoughts about the meaning of life."

A psychiatrist on the staff of the Harvard Health Services, Dr. Elizabeth Reid, described suicidal thoughts in college students as "medium common," but pointed out that "lots of people think about it without really being a threat to do it."

In a 1971 book on suicide, Earl A. Grollman cited former Director of Williams College Health Services Dana L. Farnsworth as estimating that "for every 10,000 college students, 1,000 will have emotional conflicts severe enough to need professional help; 300-400 will have feelings of depression deep enough to impair their efficiency; 100-200 will be apathetic and unable to organize themselves; 5-20 will attempt suicide; 1 to 3 will succeed."

The question of who is likely to be a victim of suicide is one that continues to baffle psychologists studying the subject. "The more it's studied, the less sure we are of who will be a victim," says Talbot. Suicide victims run the spectrum of personalities and common stereotypes. According to Dr. Robert Goodell, Director of Health at Williams, "We find there are few stereotypes, more individuals. Some have definite medical problems, some are quiet students, some unknown, others have lots of friends." About the only person who can be deemed likely to commit suicide is one who has threatened it or attempted it before. Attempts to find grade correlations have failed.

Talbot also points out that sometimes a deep depression is kept under the surface, and only becomes evident when it results in a suicidal gesture. "Sometimes you find people leading multiple lives—a public life and a private life which have conflicts that may not have been seen."

Part of the problem in preventing suicides is this inability to identify likely victims. The two students who committed suicide at Williams in the last two years were completely unknown to Health Services. According to sources at the Harvard Health Service, this has been by and large their experience as well. Students known to Health Services here as contemplating suicide have all been successfully counseled.

About the only quality suicide victims have in common is depression, often about things which bother all college students, but which appear somehow much more threatening to them. "Problems of a suicidal group tell you in exaggerated form what is bothering everyone else in the culture," says psychoanalyst Dr. Herbert Hendin.

What bothers people most at Williams, says Dr. Talbot is "fear of isolation, fear of having an inability to maintain a relationship, and the apprehension that they'll never be able to." He cautions that there is no way of knowing whether this prompted the two most recent cases here. For all the recent concern over academic pressure here, this was seen as being an unlikely cause of suicide here.

Other authorities have devised more elaborate theories of why college students take their lives. Dr. Hendin, interviewed in the New York Times in 1974, said that academic pressure and pressure to achieve did not seem critical in his patients. "Rather," he states, "the child's relationship with his family involved developing an emotional deadness as a kind of protection against life. Their parents wanted quiescent children; they were fairly egocentric—and I think that's true of the whole culture." Hendin also sees difficulty in relating to the opposite sex as a problem. Women are afraid to be victims; men are afraid to be victimizers—and this results in extreme polarization," he says.

Kastenbaum sees the problem as being one of students inexperienced at handling frustration. They often come to college without ever having successfully come through a difficult event in their lives, meet their first frustration at college and "cave-in". They begin to feel that they don't have what it takes to make it. People have also come to expect more from their lives, he says. "People years ago did not blame themselves so much for their disappointments. Today frustrations and disappointments have more sting."

The Samaritans, a suicide prevention agency in Boston, receives frequent calls from depressed students in that area, and according to one of the agency's directors, Shirley Karnovsky, loneliness is the most common worry of student callers. "Many students," she says, "arrive at college lonely, never having been away from home before. Many students are not 'together' with respect to college; they are not sure why they are there or felt pressured into going by their parents. There is a lot of pressure to be in the 'group' and many don't fit in. Dorm living may not assuage loneliness. I think it's been oversold in that respect."

Callers to the Samaritans are usually looking for someone to tell their feelings to. "They may have tried to talk to someone," says Karnovsky, "but others listen only to a point. But eventually it's "I don't want to hear how ghastly your life is." So we encourage them to talk, let them let out their anger, frustration, anxiety, and make them feel worthwhile. The feelings of self-worth of these people are extremely low. We accept them as a person." The local North Adams based Helpline reports getting no calls from anyone identifying himself as a Williams student.

According to Dr. Wacker, the prognosis for depressed students is extremely good if they seek help. "Depression is usually more easy to treat when young. Students are mostly depressed about things which happen in the transition from adolescence to adulthood. Everyone makes the transition; some people go through easy, some need a little help, some need a lot." He adds that, "Most suicides are people who see the situation as hopeless. But it only appears hopeless because they are depressed. Our basic treatment is to show people that there is a way out."

When potential suicides come to Health Services, the procedure is to begin a general assessment of what is going on in the student's life in order to find the cause of depression, according to Dr. Talbot. Neither parents nor administrators are contacted except at the discretion of the student. The only exception, says Talbot, is when a "public" act is committed, such as a suicide attempt which everyone can see. In such cases, parents may be brought in to help with counseling.

"Fortunately, the frequency of this is relatively minimal. Most of our work is not based on such catastrophes."

Reflections on the inauguration

by Charles L. Hirsch

The air was crisp Thursday afternoon, January 20th. Feet were numb and faces were red from the biting wind as hundreds of thousands of strangers huddled together in anticipation. Small children, sitting at the feet of alert military guards, enthusiastically waved miniature American flags.

Suddenly, a cheer, and the enormous human line that extended the length of Pennsylvania Avenue moved as one, leaning into the wooden police barriers. A small, elderly woman was lifted by a young man so that she might see above the crowd. Her eyes grew wide, and she emotionally remarked to those surrounding her, "I don't believe it! He's walking. God bless him!"

President Jimmy Carter was walking; at the head of his own Inaugural parade, making his own way to his own new home, the White House. Carter's trademark, a huge and toothy smile, occupied his face. At the President's side was his wife, Rosalynn, who waved with one hand, and held her husband tightly with the other. Between and all around these two hopped, skipped, and jumped Amy Carter.

Viewing Carter's simplicity, older spectators immediately remembered Harry Truman's famous morning "strolls." The younger audience fondly recollected John Kennedy's youthful smile and lovely family. And as everyone was having a marvelous time, each Secret Service agent scanned the vast crowds on either side of Pennsylvania Avenue, and quietly wished that the new President had spared him this great worry.

But Jimmy Carter is intent upon bringing the American government closer to the American people. His walk, one example of this, was one of the most dramatic political gestures in quite some time. In fact, the entire idea behind the 1977 "People's Inaugural" was to involve as many of the American people as possible.

As early as 6:30 a.m., worshippers and spectators began assembling before the Lincoln Memorial for "The People's Prayer Service." At 8:00 the service began with Baritone Sherill Milnes and Soprano Leontyne Price of the Metropolitan Opera performing spirituals before thousands of cold, but appreciative participants. At 8:25 when the Reverend Martin Luther King, Sr., moved toward the podium, a wave of excitement swept through the crowd. King's message was expected to be particularly dramatic and emotional, as he would be speaking from the same spot that his son, Martin Luther King, Jr., delivered his stirring "I have a dream . . ." address 13 years before. Reverend King spoke powerfully and beautifully, moving the entire crowd, and setting the stage for the swearing-in of President-Elect Jimmy Carter.

Thousands of warmly dressed "Inauguration-ists" moved, en masse, from the Lincoln Memorial towards the Capitol grounds. Some wisely brought ice skates, gliding the entire length of the frozen reflecting pool with ease. As early as 10:00, the Capitol grounds were overflowing with Jimmy Carter's well-wishers. By 11:45, when the ceremony finally began, good-natured guards had swung open the Capitol gates for those without Inaugural tickets. Even so, there was not enough room, and hundreds of spectators strained to see from the steps of the Supreme Court and the Library of Congress.

In past years, almost all spots along the Inaugural parade route were reserved. This year, however, there were only reserved bleachers on the last two or three blocks of the parade route. In the $25 seats opposite the reviewing stand sat celebrities such as Shirley Maclain and Governor George Wallace. Seeing Wallace smiling vaguely and quietly applauding, one could not avoid thinking of the broad gap between Wallace's "Old South" and Carter's "New South".

And when the parade was over? The Inaugural Balls were yet to begin. But, this year, they were no longer "Inaugural Balls," but "People's Inaugural Parties." This eased the traditionally formal atmosphere, as did the surprising statement "Black-tie Optional" on the invitation. At the Shoreham Hotel, the "beautiful people" jitterbugged and box-stepped to the swing sound of the Glenn Miller Band. President Carter stopped by just to say hello, but ended up dancing with his wife to "Moonlight Serenade." Later in the evening, Vice President Mondale did the same.

Aside from the Shoreham, other Inaugural celebrants found entertainment and dancing at one of the other six parties in D.C. that night. At the Visitor's Center, 21,000 were said to be in attendance. As they were leaving, Foreign dignitaries were overheard complimenting this new Southern hospitality and elegance which seem to have moved with Carter to Washington. It is clear that the Democrats truly provided a "People's Inauguration".

When the day was finished, and everyone was finally retiring for the night, Washington, D.C. was quiet again. In the next four years not every day will be as active and jovial as was January 20th, but Jimmy Carter is certainly going to try. Why not the best?

Exchange deadline extended

The deadline for 12 College exchange applications has been extended to Monday, February 6. Please see Dean McIntyre immediately for information and applications.

Students canvass for Heart Fund

Williams College students will comprise the major portion of the volunteer force that will canvass Williamstown for the American Heart Association Heart Fund Drive during the first half of February. Twelve of the 18 captains of the drive, as well as about 60 other volunteers, will be students.

The students volunteered to help after Williamstown co-chairmen Charlotte Marlowe, Toni Gazzaniga and Jane Steubner were able to come up with only a few townspeople to serve as captains for the drive. When it was learned that the drive might have to be cancelled, the residential house presidents were notified and they gathered the volunteers.

The students, wearing official heart fund cards, will be canvassing from February 1 to February 14.

input to student-faculty committees. The council tabled discussion of Article VIII, dealing with council committees, until tonight.

In discussion of Article VI, Council Representative Tom Ebling pointed out that the constitution lacked "the means to solicit student opinion." The council had given Ebling's point much consideration at its January 18 meeting, when members debated changing the council's basic philosophy. Ebling proposed as an amendment to the article the creation of student committees to parallel the activities of student-faculty committees and "present student input" to them. The council unanimously accepted the admendment.

In further discussion of the constitution, the council voted to accept Article VII, dealing with expulsion of representatives, with an amendment from By-Laws Chairman Stu Ginsberg requiring a "compulsory motion" of expulsion which the council must vote on whenever a representative misses three consecutive meetings. A majority vote would be required for expulsion.

In discussion of the Garfield House renovation, the council adopted a resolution by Cliff Mitchell encouraging any College officials concerned with the renovation plans to "solicit student opinions." Also adopted was Larry Mitchell's resolution requesting that reloacted Garfield seniors be allowed to live in the same house if possible.

suggesting "continual focus should be placed on these incidences in the campus newspaper or in house forums."

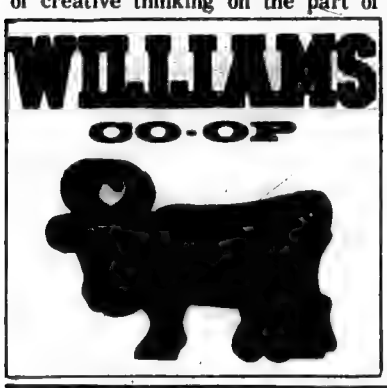
The report also warned of pressures to drink at house functions. "It would seem that something is wrong in a system where the early impressions of underclassmen that acceptance on campus depends upon one's ability or willingness to imbibe alcohol, are nurtured by many groups on campus."

The 20-page document also reported briefly on exchange students, rights to privacy and quiet, food, buildings and grounds, and co-op housing. The trustees requested that the CUL add a statement of opposition to frats.

Background for Report

Last year the CUL formed a number of two-person teams to visit all the residential houses for discussion. These meetings made the CUL aware of student concerns and served as a base for questions for a survey. This survey was conducted in early 1976 with about one-third of the target population responding. The CUL also met with representatives from the Black Student Union and house presidents before preparing the final report.

The CUL, chaired by Earl McFarland, consists of six students and five faculty members.



O'Rourke's 'Tape' creative, subtle

Krapp's Last Tape was presented last Thursday and Friday evenings as a Winter Study independent project in Theater, and following in that context the performance was, at times, academic. That quality of the Studio Theater rendition of Beckett's short play about an old man and his diary-tapes did not, however, exclude other qualities and as a complete work it was superbly done.

The one man show resulted, no doubt, from an extraordinary amount of creative thinking on the part of actor-director Kevin O'Rourke. Though it was not unflawed (the major problem being the deliberateness of the rendering) the performance was probably the best of O'Rourke's Williams career. The often forceful and overbearing quality which has in the past crept into O'Rourke's work was not present in the characterization of the elderly, soon to die Krapp. Beautifully made up and lit quite dramatically by a single bare light above, O'Rourke forced himself to act primarily with his face by hiding behind a desk. That feat added to the general subtlety of the action and helped create the slow but powerful mood of the play. The action was well planned and that aided greatly the production as each moment was thoroughly formed.

Like much of Beckett's work, Krapp's Last Tape is filled with a great deal of activity—subtle as it may be—which provides the audience with intermingling action and sound. The one continually comments on the other in a way only Beckett could create. This is particularly true as we see the older Krapp listening to the tapes he had made years before. The concept of being able to recreate life that way—selectively—is one of the major elements of the play. It is, as is much of Beckett, a fascinating situation—both on the surface and in concept—and therefore can carry off the scant but meaningful monologues.

WILLIAMS CO-OP

pace and slipped back into a zone. The visitors then turned it on, paced by Gail McWilliams, going up 65-48.

The Ephs were unable to sink a shot midway through the period and began to lose confidence—a situation of which the northerners took advantage running up the score to 79-59. Freshmen Karen Allison and Jeannie Weeks played hard for the defeated Ephs, passing off to Wilson who hit the last shot for the Ephs, finishing the day 79-61.

Despite their determination, the Ephs played sloppily and were unable to connect from the floor, which cost them the game. Shooting a below average 37 per cent from the floor the team was only up to par on the foul line going for 64 per cent. The height and play-breaking ability of the Vermonters forced some 30 Williams turnovers while the Ephs were able to manage only five steals.

Looking better earlier last week, the Ephs travelled to Middletown to defeat Wesleyan 60-43. Although the teams had been evenly matched early in the game, standing 27-23 at the half, the Ephs scoring machine was in full force for 30 second half points, holding the Cards to only 20. O'Brien and Grady led the scoring for the team hitting 16 and 14, while Wilson completed the triple threat with 10 points. The Ephs, playing their game, both offensively and defensively, were unable to repeat Monday's strong performance against Vermont.

the victory at a 7.7 second clocking. Fellow frosh Tom Selden followed Davis' tracks to an 8-flat fourth place finish.

Two miler Joe Kolb outkicked Springfield's George Cofrin (a frosh from Mt. Greylock High) to grab the runner-up honors, recording a 9:24.2 clocking for the 18 lap event. In his second race of the evening, Leinbach lowered his 1000 yd. personal best to 2:17.2, but was outsprinted by Springfield's Bob Wise and had to be content with second.

The Williams mile relay squad of Bass, Paul Untch, Lee Jackson and Terry O'Reilly outlasted a sluggish Lowell quintet and sealed a second place finish in both the relay and the meet. The Ephmen take on their traditional Little Three rivals plus Trinity this Saturday at Towne Fieldhouse. In recent years the contest has been dominated by the powerful purple, but the steadily improving Wesleyan Cardinals could give the hosts some trouble. The battle for the Little Three title starts with the field events at 1:00 p.m. and continues with the running events at 2:30.

Once more the bottom of the Eph ladder proved to be the strength of the squad. Tim Belk won an exciting five game match at no. 6 while Pete Thayer had little problem, winning 3-0. Both Michael Fitzhugh and Charlie Haines needed four close games to polish off their opponents and cap Williams' second triumph ever over Penn.

When Princeton arrived without their no. 1 man, a semi-finalist in this year's North American Open, visions of a second upset victory danced in Eph minds. As the match developed, however, it became clear that the previous day's emotional win had left most of the team stale making them vulnerable to the Tiger's powerful attack.

Williams did manage to hang tough as they only trailed 3-1 when the first round of matches were finished. Goldberg provided the win for the Ephs with his second strong showing in two days. Both Cogswell and no. 8 Fitzhugh stayed close for awhile before succumbing to relentless pressure in four games. Belk dropped a tough first game and could not recover, losing 3-0.

Despite the strength at the bottom, Williams recorded only one more win by Thayer in four games. Reinhardt pulled a muscle and had to default in the first game, while both Lindquist and Little won their first game and then dropped the next three. Haines played well but fell in five.

Cagers drop 2 on road trip

by Andy O'Donnell

Veteran roadtrippers have always maintained that the Connecticut state police love to pick on out-of-staters, but our own Eph basketball team found out this past week that the funny looking guys in shorts that patrol the state's hardcourt emporiums can be just as harsh on non-natives when the license reads Williams.

After taking three giant steps forward against Yale, Clark, and Amherst before boarding the bus south, the Ephs ran into a pair of roadblocks in Hartford and Middletown, dropping a 77-73 overtime decision to Trinity Wednesday night and then suffering a 63-55 loss to Little Three rival Wesleyan Saturday evening.

The losses dropped the Ephs' record to 5-6 and snapped a modest three game win streak. Five of those six defeats have been on the road while four of the five wins have been at home, a little tidbit which underlines just how much the growing number of purple hoop faithful that inhabit Lasell each week have meant to the Ephs thus far this season.

The less said about the Connecticut contests the better, for Williams' play ranged from mediocre to poor on both occasions. Against Trinity, the Ephs eased their way into a 35-31 halftime lead and upped the margin to eight midway through the second half on the strength of Mike Tanner's shooting (30 points for the game) and the board work of Brad Wolk and Matt Spangler.

With seven minutes left to go in the game, however, the Ephs developed an acute case of turnover-itis and with a lot of help from the refs (Williams didn't go to the line at all during those seven minutes) the Bantams eventually tied the score at 63 and sent the game into overtime after a last minute shot went in and out.

Things were all Trinity in the overtime period as the Bantams quickly opened up a six point lead and then hung on to post their fifth win in ten outings. Wolk and Spangler followed Tanner in the scoring column with 12 and 11 points, respectively.

The Wesleyan affair, which marked the Cardinals' first victory over Williams since 1972, was in no way a fluke victory. The Cardinals are currently cruising around the Connecticut stratosphere with a 10-2 record (including a 55-50 victory over Tufts) and are very real threats to cop both their first Little Three title since 1972 and a post-season bid to the Division II-III tournament.

The Cardinals handed the Ephs their first Little Three loss of the year behind a patient, well-drilled offense led by sophomore guard Jim Connery and forward Keith Johns. With Connery connecting on 9 of 13 shots from the floor and Johns bulling his way to 15 points inside, the Wesmen jumped out to a 27-21 halftime lead and then maintained their margin throughout the second half. The Ephs aided their hosts' cause by shooting a miserable 26 per cent for the game. Gerry Kelly paced Williams with 14 points, while Tanner added 11.

Swimmers dump Bowdoin

by Dennis O'Shea

The Bowdoin Polar Bears swept south from Maine Saturday and gave everyone in Williamstown just what they expected, a very tough meet. A good winter break crowd of confirmed swim fans and would be vacationers basked in the Aruba-like tropical atmosphere of sweltering Muir Pool as Ephmen Jeff Erickson and Dave Thomson finally wrapped up the 65-48 Williams win in the next to last event, the optional diving.

The win avenges a 74-39 loss in the Bears' den up north last winter.

The Purple Poolsters opened the contest with a 400 yard medley relay win as freestyler Phil Wild blew wide open the clear water given him by butterflyer Guy Hoelzer, but Bowdoin's super middle-distance and distance freestylers nabbed 13 of 18 points in the next two events and the Ephs were back to square one.

"We were tight and that encouraged them, something you should never do for a team like Bowdoin," said Williams coach Carl Samuelson. "We really gave them a chance to explore their potential."

Tom Beckett and R. J. Connelly's 1-3 finish in the 50 free followed by a Todd Piper first and a gutsy Peter Howd second place in the 200 individual medley put the wetmen back in control, but things were touch and go until the diving put the Ephs over the top.

Wild was positively unstoppable, splitting 49.2 and 48.5 in anchoring two winning relays, and going 49.1 from a flat start to take the 100 free. Don Cameron and Dave Amlicke swept the 200 backstroke and Guy Hoelzer and Todd Piper finished 1-3 in the 200 butterfly to retaliate for Bowdoin's domination of the longer freestyle events. Bears Jeff Cherry, Brian Connelly and Jeff McBride (a.k.a. "The Brunswick Bombshells) held the Ephs from more than one second place in the 200, 500 and 1000 freestyles.

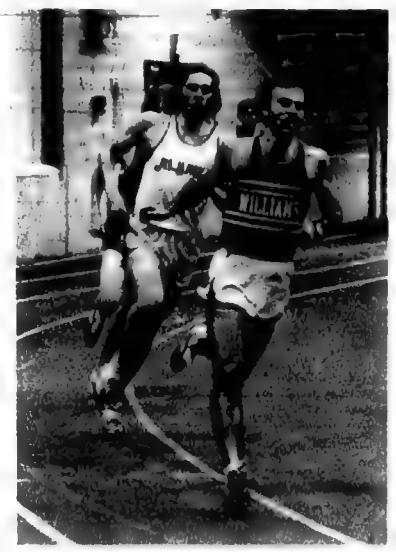
Frogkicker Bob Pellegrino kept Bowdoin alive in the late going, smashing Muir Pool and college records with a dandy 2:15.8 win in the 200 breaststroke.

The Eph natators seek their third home pool win in as many weeks and a 5-2 record when Red Silvia's perennial New England dynamo Springfield College squad visits the Berkshires Saturday at 2 p.m. The Chiefs lost a lot in diver Bill Gallagher, flyer Paul Fuller, and medleyist Dave Cline. They lost a lot more in Robert Muir Award winner and multi-event, national Division II champion Tim Allen, but the Ephs will have their hands full with distanceman Mike McCombs, breaststroker Mark Schubert, freestyler Jeff Germaine and a passel of just plain talented Maroons.

In other words, it's going to take some fine swimming, but the Ephmen could repeat their 65-48 Muir Pool upset of the downstaters two years ago. Any way you look at it, it's going to be a hummer.

Squash surprises Penn, 6-3, bows down to Princeton, 7-2

by Evan Bash



Those Eph faithful who attended both of last week's varsity squash matches with Penn and Princeton gorged themselves on excellent displays of squash by two of the nation's foremost teams. Actually, make that three of the nation's best. Williams proved itself to be a bona fide collegiate power by stunning favored Penn 6-3 Thursday and then giving Princeton a slight scare before falling 7-2 Friday.

Led by Coach Dave Johnson, the Ephs have compiled a neat 6-3 record, the other two losses coming at the hands of Harvard and Yale.

Penn strolled into Williamstown expecting the hosts to surrender at the first sight of the Quaker's red warm-ups. But Williams wanted badly to end Penn's dominance of the series between the two and this year's well balanced squad was just what was needed.

Captain Marc Reinhardt, again drawing one of the best players in the East, fell in three tough games while Arnie Cogswell jumped out to a quick 2-0 lead and then held on for a 3-2 win. Chip Lindquist kept coming from behind but fell just short, losing 3-2 after being down 2-0. No. 4 Martin Goldberg was all over his man right from the start for a strong 3-0 victory, while Jim Little just could not do it losing in three games.

Ephs ice UMass; smoked by Salem

by Tim Layden

Somewhere on the University of Massachusetts campus, hockey goalie Dana Redmond is still dodging flying pucks in his sleep. The talented net-minder stopped some 50 Williams attempts Tuesday night, but the four that got by him were enough to get the Ephs in the win column for the seventh time this season, 4-2.

Williams picked up its third win in Division II on the wings of one of its best opening periods of hockey in the '76-'77 campaign. Outskating and outshooting the highly-touted invaders from Amherst, the Ephmen scored twice in the first ten minutes of the contest and took a 3-0 lead into the locker room.

Early in the game, sophomore center Chick Johnson put his red-hot stick to work. The team's leading scorer flew down the left wing and snapped a wrist shot across in front of Redmond and into the far corner to give the Ephs a 1-0 lead just 1:32 into the contest.

The hustling Ephs made the visitors appear to be skating in quicksand in the early going and an apparent Ben Heintz goal would have put the Ephmen up 2-0. The shot, however, was disallowed as the official claimed that goalie Redmond had covered the puck. Junior Geoff Daley's first goal of the season rectified the situation just twelve seconds later. Daley zipped a turnaround forehand past the surprised Redmond to give Chuck Cremens a two-goal bulge.

Redmond and company started to wake up as the period progressed, moving the puck well, and missing several easy shots. Much to the delight of the now-increasing crowd, Chris Egizi pumped home a power play goal with only 41 seconds left in the period to take the wind out the UMass sails and send McCormick's squad into the dressing room three goals up.

The second period, a penalty-filled affair, belonged to Redmond. The junior made nice stops on Jim Rooney and Peter Gonye breakaways and even made one save without the benefit of a stick, (courtesy of a John Bessone hit) trapping the puck between his shin pads. Frank Snow's tip-in at 12:11 made the score 3-1, Williams at the end of two periods.

Senior wing Jim Hield notched a "breathe-a-little easier" goal at 10:26 of the final stanza. Hield slapped home a Rick Zeller rebound on a power play for a three-goal Williams edge. Freshman defenseman Wade Smith notched his third assist of the game on the play.

Immediately following the Hield goal, Williams launched nine shots at Redmond in another power play attempt. The Minuteman defense apparently harbored some sort of grudge against Redmond as they were able to dump the puck only once in two power plays against the Purple Pressure.

Right-winger Carl Burns of the visitors set the final score at 4-2 with a 2 on 1 score past Cremens, as the Minutemen lost their second game to Williams in the last three and their second straight in Chapman. Cremens stopped 29 UMass shots on the evening, as most of the action was in the visitors' end.

McCormick's Ephs ran into a somewhat tougher foe Friday evening in Salem, Massachusetts. The Ephs could manage just one goal (Zeller, from Egizi & Johnson) against All-American goalie Gerry Gagnon and dropped a 4-1 decision. The loss dropped the Ephs to 3-6 in ECAC Division II play.

Women stuff Cardinals, fall to UVM hoopsters

by Nancy Rhein

It could have been the upset of the season, but lackluster shooting and a lack of the characteristic drive caused the Williams women's basketball team to be defeated at the hands of University of Vermont, 79-61 Saturday.

Although the Ephs had entered the contest with hopes of a victory, their "make them run" strategy was not effective against the height and hustle of the UVM squad. The visitors took control of the scoreboard early, moving from 6-6 to 12-6 in a one minute span. Using their height to grab the rebounds, UVM dominated the first half action.

The Ephs, unable to box out the Northerners, turned to a full court press as they fell behind 26-10 after 10 minutes. The usually well executed plays looked sloppy as the Ephs were unable to get the baskets despite repeated efforts by Maggie O'Brien and Leigh Wilson. Attempting to break UVM plays, the defensive duo of O'Brien and Leslie Milne, was aggressive, only to find themselves with three fouls each with five minutes left in the half.

Behind 39-19, Williams coach Sue Hudson sent in Robin Ellett who took charge of rebounding for the Ephs, but the Northerners held fast on the strength of Mary Eddy, going into the lockerroom with a 15 point lead.

Coming on strong in the opening minutes of the second half, the Ephs went to a man to man press and defense. Cutting the lead to nine points, O'Brien hit two quick shots and with the help of Wilson put the score at 49-40. Despite their increased control, the Ephs were unable to keep up the

by Frank Carr

The indoor track squad hosted a quadrangular meet on Friday evening and extended their season record to 5-3 with wins over Lowell University and Albany State. An awesome Springfield group easily pocketed the meet honors with an impressive 65 point performance. The Ephmen recorded a tally of 31 followed closely by Lowell with 26 points, while Albany brought up the rear with a skeleton team effort of 9 points.

Senior Rich Remmer returned from the sunny Florida beaches after a rather comfortable Winter (?) Study and took a first place in the shot put by an even 7 feet. The "Big Man" used a Brian Oldfield type spin and catapulted the ball on a journey of 53 feet to set a new college record. Jim Holmes gave the Ephs a third place in the pole vault with an 11' effort, while Jamie Rouse scored in the sand as he leaped to fourth place in the triple jump at 40' 11¼". Rouse returned for the high jump and added the final Eph points in the field events, springing to third at 5' 10".

Once again, captain Ken Leinbach dominated the Tartan surface, winning his third mile race in four attempts. Leinbach traded the lead with Springfield's Jim Young before pulling away for the victory at 4:20.8. The Ephs were not as successful when the distance contested shrunk to 60 yards, but captain David Bass came through with a fine effort, stopping the watches at 6.6 for a fourth place result.

The hosting athletes were shut out in the 600 yard run but following that event, the track became paved with hurdles which allowed the Ephmen to pick up a much needed six-point-package. Freshman hurdler Vernon Davis led the way as he knotted down

Classroom conservation

Williams begins energy probe

by Keron Walker and David R. Ross

Director of Physical Plant Peter P. Welanetz has announced that he is conducting a study of the efficiency of College classroom buildings as part of the continuing College Energy Conservation Program.

The study will consider the feasibility of closing certain buildings earlier and opening them later to cut heating costs. To date, Williams has consumed 33,000 more gallons of fuel in the last five months than in the corresponding period last year (see accompanying article).

Peter Welanetz

Many class room buildings are already on a two-tiered heating schedule according to Mechanical Engineer John C. Holden. These buildings have two thermostats one set for 65 degrees and the other 60. or even 50. A clock regulates which thermostat setting will be used.

Besides closing some buildings earlier, Welanetz has been considering other proposals which would further trim costs. "It gets tougher and tougher as we curtail costs to cut them back anymore. Obvious steps would cause discomfort or would cost a good deal to implement.

"We have studied the feasibility of a computer controlled Environmental control system, which would, from one point, regulate the temperature of several major buildings on the college campus," Welanetz said. The system, however, would cost about $200,000 to introduce.

Another proposal would involve installing large, slow-moving fans in the ceilings of high buildings in order to cause the re-circulation of warm air which has risen.

"It sounds far-fetched, but if things keep going the way they have for the past couple of years, we'll continue to look at anything and everything," Welanetz said.

Holden indicated that several conservation steps will probably become economical in the next few years. Solar heating units are "just about to the point where you can get a payout in under ten years" of use, he said. Current plans for the proposed music building extension to Chapin Hall include arrangements for adding a solar heating unit at a later date.

The heating system for the Sawyer Library could also easily accommodate a solar heating unit, Welanetz said.

Both Welanetz and Holden agreed that the biggest conservation savings would come from changing attitudes by those who use College buildings. In a contest to cut electricity use in residential housing, use was cut by from nine per cent to 21 per cent for the winning house (Perry-Bascom).

"The trouble with contests is that they don't lead to permanent drops in consumption," said Holden.

Welanetz noted that the goal is to make people more energy conscious. This is no easy task. The College distributed to students, faculty and staff an Energy Conservation Policy statement with suggestions for conserving energy. Of a group of students

Keller tightens meal checking procedure

Stricter checking procedures, necessitated by unauthorized use of College dining rooms, will go into effect at campus eating facilities in the next few days. "It is too bad that we have to go to a more aggressive, more expensive system," said Ross Keller, Director of Food Services. "If there is a problem, we have to control it, and stop the dissipation of board money."

The cheating seems to come from three areas: non-boarding students, recent alumni and guests. Keller noted that "students complain until it involves them and their guests."

No exact figures on such food cheating are available, according to Keller. "If we could count them, we could control the problem." However, Keller continued, "Judging from the number of people caught, I would say there is a substantial problem. We have a gentle system. It's not hard-nosed, and some people are taking advantage of it."

To solve this problem, Keller said, there is a "vast range of options," though at present Food Services will simply "try to make the present system work better." At Baxter, for example, the checking procedure will become more formalized, and people will have to present their ID's at each meal.

Row Houses, by their nature, pose a separate difficulty. "Aside from putting people at the door of each dining room," said Keller, "there is no real way of controlling each meal."

CC plans referendum

The College Council approved the final two articles of the proposed constitution Wednesday night, and voted an $185 appropriation to WHEW for planned activities during the upcoming Winter Carnival.

Article VIII of the proposed constitution includes a provision stipulating that council committees may remove a member by a two-thirds vote if he is guilty of "malfeasance." Council members also adopted an amendment by Don Toumey that will allow the council to expel student members of student-faculty committees who fail to regularly attend meetings.

Council members voted to hold a referendum on the proposed constitution during the third week of February.

The council granted $185 of WHEW's request of $200 to finance activities at the Winter Carnival on February 18-19. According to Harry Kelly, who spoke for WHEW at the meeting, the money will be used to purchase 5 kegs and 7 cases of beer.

WHEW also requested $1500 for other all-college activities, stipulating that the money would not be used to purchase alcoholic beverages. The council delayed action on the request pending consideration by the Finance Committee.

Larry Mitchell announced that the CEP has voted not to move the deadline for papers in courses without a final exam to the end of reading period. The system currently stipulates that such papers be turned in by the final day of class.

D. C. alums discuss careers

The Washington Alumni Association and the Office of Career Counseling will present two panels on "Careers in Washington" in 105-6 Bronfman this Saturday.

The day will begin at 9:30 with an opening address "A Washington Perspective" by John Anderson, economics editor for the Washington Post. Following that, at 10:30, participating Williams Alumni from Washington will give two panel presentations. The Alumni will discuss their careers in Washington and how they got them. They will talk about current opportunities in the public and the private sectors in Washington and what it is like to live and work in the Capitol. These panels will be repeated at 1:30 to give everyone a chance to listen to all the participants.

The panelists represent many fields and perspectives from both the public and private sectors. They are John W. Anderson '50, Washington Post; Richard W. Beckler '61, Department of Justice; Robert P. Myers Jr. '60, State Department; Jack Talmadge '58, National Science Foundation; D. Heyward Hamilton Jr. '60, Energy Research and Development Administration; A. Stephen Telkins Jr. '62, U.S. Information Agency; Brewster C. Rhoads '74, Coalition for a New Foreign and Military Policy; Radford J. Byerly Jr. '58, Congressional Committee on Science and Technology; Robert M. Gordon '72, Congressional Budget Office; Kirk White '60, Mayor's Office; and Robert T. Francis II '60, Aide to Congressman Studds, from the public sector.

From the private sector Thomas H. Fox '61, Volunteers in Technical Assistance; Frank W. Lloyd III '63, Citizens Communications Center; Margaret E. Clark '72, Covington and Burling Law; Randy McManus '73, Law; Richard E. Verville '61, Law; Charlotte L. Vaughan '75, NBC News; Anne R. S. Rives '74, National Geographic; and George L. Rebh '73, freelance illustrator and political cartoonist; will represent the Washington Alumni this weekend.

After the panels the Alumni will be at the Log to meet and talk with interested students. Traditional refreshments will be served, and all are welcome.

The Office of Career Counseling urges everyone to attend these panels.

Because of the political transition this year, the Washington Alumni should be especially interesting to everyone.

College escapes national fuel crisis

by David R. Ross

While record cold temperatures and the resulting shortage of natural gas have led to plant shutdowns and school closings throughout the east and midwest, Williams College is surviving the crunch remarkably well according to officials of Buildings and Grounds.

Director of Physical Plant Peter P. Welanetz cites the College's Energy Conservation Program, instituted in 1971, as the principal factor lowering the impact of the energy crunch on the College. Although degree-days have increased about 15 per cent over the past year, fuel consumption has risen only five per cent. Degree-days measures the difference between the actual average daily temperature and 65 degrees. Thus, the statistic 1628 degree-days for this January means that the average daily temperature differed from 65 to 53; or the average temperature for the month was about 12 degrees.

According to Mechanical Engineer John C. Holden, who oversees College energy use, there is little danger of fuel curtailments leading to a disruption in College life this winter. Roughly 90 per cent of heat on campus is supplied by the steam plant behind Prospect House. The No. 6 fuel oil used in the plant is in good supply in this area. The College's fuel shortage tank has a capacity of 400,000 gallons, roughly one-third of yearly consumption and more than enough to see the College past a short loss of supply.

Nevertheless, the cold and rising fuel prices have hit the College's fuel bill. The price of No. 6 fuel oil today is 34 cents a gallon, up six cents over last June. Thus, although fuel consumption is up only 5 per cent, the College's fuel bill has risen by a substantially greater amount.

Surprisingly, the College's heating situation is in better shape now than it was last fall. The College used only about 400 more gallons of fuel this January than in January 1976. This followed increases over the previous year before of some 12,000 gallons in September, 14,500 for November and 7,000 gallons for December.

Holden noted that factors other than temperature will also effect fuel consumption. Wind can be a major cause of heat loss. In addition, major

140 apply for Junior Advisor

The Junior Advisor Selection Committee received 140 applications (95 men, 45 women) from the sophomore class. Duff Anderson '77, chairman of the committee, said, "We will choose 23 female JAs as opposed to 20 selected in 1976 and 28 male JAs, a decrease of two from last year."

The committee consists of 17 seniors and 8 juniors, all of whom are present or former JAs, and three at large members selected by the College Council. Seniors were chosen to represent the various entries of last year. The total of 29 includes 18 men, 10 women, and Dean of Freshmen Lauren Stevens, also a voting member.

After a preliminary session on Tuesday, January 25, the selection procedure was finalized. Meeting at least three times a week for two and one-half hours beginning February 3, Anderson expects the final decisions to be made by the second week in March.

Anderson believes the committee members will work well together. He stated that they are using "the basic procedure from last year which worked well . . . and we're starting

A Free Lunch

A subtle but annoying decline in one aspect of student-faculty relations has become apparent to a number of students and faculty members at the College. As the College has grown, an important avenue of student-faculty contact—dining together at college facilities—has diminished. Fewer faculty members are to be seen in campus dining halls or row houses at lunch, dinner or guest meals than have been present in past years.

Official college policy as well as the physical layout of dining facilities at Williams are set up remarkably well to promote contact between students and faculty. A special faculty account exists which was designed specifically to allow faculty members to eat at the College facilities with students. It allows any faculty member to dine at any major dining hall or row house free as long as the purpose of such a visit is to interact with students. Many students don't seem to know about this arrangement and others don't seem to care.

Other factors which would logically work to promote student-faculty dining are the assignment of faculty associates to residential houses, the wide dispersement and diversity of dining facilities on campus, and house guest meals.

Nevertheless, the trend continues. Usage of the special faculty account is on the decline, according to a source in the administration. A number of houses don't see their faculty associates more than once or twice a year. Fewer faculty members are being invited to guest meals.

Responsibility for this decline, along with hope for any improvement, must lie largely with the student body. Faculty members are quite naturally somewhat reluctant to walk into student dining facilities without some assurance that they will find a student that they know. Students might be surprised to find out how easy it is to take the initiative.

One busy college dean stated that the ideal 11:00 class should always end in a discussion over lunch. A junior faculty member, when asked to stop for lunch at Perry House, said, that he had never been there but quickly agreed to give it a try. Students at Tyler House decided that they wanted to air some concerns and invited President Chandler down for a Friday dinner. Possibly familiar with the menu, he declined, but agreed to show up the following Monday.

The student handbook states, "Williams faculty and students frequently get together socially or to work on problems of mutual interest." The potential certainly exists but for many members of this college community that statement is a largely unfulfilled promise. We urge students and faculty alike to utilize meals as a way of socializing, a way of combating the trend toward bigness at a small college.

Memories and Realities

The recently published CUL report on the residential housing system at Williams is a solid piece of committee work that offers some thoughtful observations on the present state of student living at Williams. In its desire to affirm the benefits of a system based on diversity and randomness both to the college and to its trustees, however, the report seems to slide over some very real student concerns with the present system that may warrant further study.

It should be noted at the outset that the committee was not charged with evaluating the present residential house system as a whole but rather with examining the tensions which presently exist within that system. A great many of these tensions stem from the policies of diversity and randomness, the committee discovered, but while taking care to note several of these tensions in its report, the committee did not pursue either the causes or ramifications of such tensions in the depth that they may actually require.

In its report the CUL recognized the difficulties facing house officers in forming social programs under the present system and acknowledged that more homogeneity within houses might lead to a better college social life by producing greater house diversity across campus.

Yet while granting that the present system can be greatly improved socially through homogeneity, the committee reasserted that the educational benefits of diversity and randomness outweigh any move in such a direction.

"The primary goal of Williams College is education," the report states. "The argument in favor of forcing students of diverse backgrounds and interests to live together is based on its presumed educational value, rather than on any claim that it will maximize a particular dimension of student happiness."

The report went on to support its firm belief in the primacy of such an educational role by maintaining that random housing "is the only force outside the classroom that strongly pushes students of diverse interests and backgrounds together."

Students already have "ample opportunities" to band together with others sharing common interests, the report argues, "and (they) do not need reinforcement or protection in this area". The random housing system serves to provide some "counterbalance" in the opposite direction, the report concludes.

Unfortunately, the report does not pursue in any great detail either the underlying assumptions which form the basis of this counterbalance theory or its future ramifications.

By forcing students of diverse backgrounds to deal with each other, for example, does such a theory ultimately foster a cliquish atmosphere among students and in so doing cause irreparable damage to house development by driving students of common interests together with even greater strength in order to counteract this counterbalancing force?

Both the increasing number of private parties on campus and the development of social groups which cut across house lines, such as Stone Soup and All New Stuff, indicate that a growing number of students are struggling to find ways to satisfy their social needs outside the usual recourse of house activities because these activities are proving either ineffective or insufficient. Future studies should explore this area in greater depth.

Future studies should also consider the problems besetting house officers in more depth. The CUL report expresses sympathy for the officers' plight yet urges officers to redouble efforts to give social minorities an adequate say in house affairs and to make an extra effort to provide activities which might appeal to very small groups in an effort to make the disenchanted feel more welcome. "The notion that the success of a House party is based on the number of people attending should be abandoned," the report asserts.

One of the anamalies of the present system, however, is that officers are too often regarded by fellow house members as servants of the house, there to provide services to all dues paying members without any return obligation from those members other than to enjoy the services of their elected house "waiters." This wasn't the case with fraternities though and the question arises: how much of this attitude is a product of the system of diversity and how much of it is a product of our Admissions policy? Would Williams students join fraternities? Or are we working with a different sort of kid than we did in the '30's, '40's, and '50's?

Of a more fundamental nature than the problems facing house officers is the viability of the entire "house" concept under the present system. Houses today at Williams seem to be little more than loosely knit coalitions of conflicting interests with no binding interests save a computer imposed house affiliation.

And if this is true then how do we resolve the paradox of a system fed by fraternity memories and diversity realities in which the once hallowed concepts of house unity and house loyalty are either unobtainable or inapplicable goals fostered nevertheless by the lingering myths of a more social era?

These are just some of the questions which arise after reading the CUL report. The committee is to be commended for its efforts in enunciating the basic areas of concern in the present housing system at Williams. But future reports should explore this system in greater depth and question its foundations with greater vigor.

Sunday Service

The Williams Christian Fellowship and the Williams Newman Association will sponsor a community-wide service Sunday, February 6 in Thompson Memorial Chapel at 10:30 a.m.

Students have often voiced concern about the Williams environment. Notably, at the Dodd House panel of January 18, "What's Wrong With Williams," students raised questions relative to our competitive atmosphere and the values that it generates. Students were distraught by the superficial nature of many relationships on campus.

The service will provide a different forum for consideration of these questions. In this non-classroom setting individuals' values can be addressed in a situation which is stripped of the academic aspects which often prevent us from dealing with them in a meaningful way.

Oakley oversees personnel and curriculum as new dean

Williams "is a fine old College with a noble tradition," says Francis C. Oakley, a man who knows well the definitions of old and noble. The new Dean of the Faculty's specialty is medieval history and thought. "I take an old-fashioned view of the College as a society of teachers and students," says the English-born dean in a mild British accent.

But as Dean of the Faculty his major concern is teachers. Oakley says his primary focus is on "recruiting and retaining the best faculty within our (the College's) means." He is concerned with the "nature, quality and vitality" of the faculty.

Oakley serves on the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP), the committee which makes recommendations to the Trustees on appointment of new faculty members, contract renewal decisions and tenure decisions. The dean also said he plays a role in deciding salaries for faculty members.

A former chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), Oakley is now an ex officio member of the committee. He said he sees curriculum as his second major responsibility. The dean said he plays an important role when curriculum comes into contact with staffing. It is my concern when we have "curricular ideas with no personnel" who can handle them, he said.

Oakley said he views unfavorably a movement in educational institutions toward thinking in terms of three constituencies, student, faculty and administration, with an adversary relationship. Williams College is "small enough to bring the three closer together," the Oxford graduate said.

The 45 year-old professor grew up in Liverpool and lived in London and Toronto before coming to the states. He taught history and earned his PhD at Yale before joining the Williams faculty in 1961.

He is the author of four books including Creation: The Impact of an Idea, which he co-authored with Philosophy professor Daniel O'Connor.

Oakley said his new position will probably reduce his opportunity for scholarship, adding, however, that he has been able to devote much of the last year to scholarship. Oakley spent the first four months of his year long sabbatical finishing a book. During the fall he was a visiting fellow in the Yale history department doing research. The former British Army lieutenant also worked for four weeks at the British Museum at Oxford.

Oakley replaced Neil Grabois as Dean of the Faculty in January when Grabois became Provost. As Dean of the Faculty, he said he is satisfied with the basic tenure process at Williams. "It is a difficult one for everyone concerned." Those making decisions, he said, have the difficult task of looking thirty years into the future.

Oakley cautioned, however, that the tenure process is "not a closed system set in concrete." "We'd like to keep examining it if there are drawbacks."

One problem in recruiting and holding faculty members is that rural living can be lonely for single people "even given the shortage jobs," Oakley said.

Oakley should know about the loneliness of rural living. He lives in a section of South Williamstown which has no access to cable television. But the Oakleys do have a horse that the dean said he enjoys riding. He also claims to enjoy cross country skiing, skating, music and writing.

Recently appointed Dean of Faculty, Francis C. Oakley

John Stalvey '77 schusses to the base of Mt. Greylock after conquering steep trails and bitter cold on the courageous ascent to the summit.

Skiers defy elements

Greylock challenges the brave

by Reed Zars

Many people think gymnasiums are the place to run and golf courses the place to ski. They are close, warm and secure. The great thing about the Berkshires is that there exists an alternative yes in their very structure.

In the past week a strange collusion occurred. An unlikely band of cross-country skiers joined in an effort to run with undaunted courage the trailless flanks of our most prominent peaks. In some cases, this involved skiing all downhill, in some up and then down, and in most up and down, and down and up, and flat and down, and . . .

On January 27, with no loss of life, limb, or equipment, Hugh Calkins, John Stalvey, Henry Whittemore, Dirk Hovorka and Reed Zars burned off the Taconic crest and into the valley of Williamstown at Triple R Brook in an average time of 28:30:00.

The route is beautiful, falling through thick forest, opening into a large meadow, clinging to the steep bank of a creek bed, and ending on a frozen pond near Bee Hill Road. The course is repeatable but the descent time will stand as long as skiers stick to the golf course.

The same group, plus Jon Huss, negotiated the Greylock massif several days later. The trail was steep, the conditions biting cold and windy. Once at the summit, refuge was taken in the WAMC radio shack by arousing the operator who had retired at six that morning. To our surprise, this harmless communion with warmth was to lead one of us to the wills of the wind, unaccommodated, on the summit of Greylock. Luckily it was to be none of us. The operator, newly awoken, was to be spared for this fate.

As we prepared to leave for our timed descent, the kindly operator became more and more interested in this strange rack of fools. Watching the TV monitors all day was fun, but here were some people involved in a real experience. Yessiree. So he took it upon himself to step out in his cotton shirt and slippers, and witness the preparations.

Caught in the fury of the wind and the turbulent anticipation of a most daring ski, someone in the group shut the door to the shack. Everything changed. I mean everything changed. The operator, looking blandly around, said not what he thought, but what he knew; "I don't have my keys." It was beautiful. I hate to say that, but it was. So clean, so sharp, so perfectly opposite. Here we all stood with a "poor, bare, fork'd animal" newly transformed from an electrical technician of seconds ago. And it was colder than a meat locker in August.

That was the best of the story, but it continues. The windows were barred with galvanized mesh, the door was quarter inch steel, the walls; cinder block and cement. Cold, cold glass, steel, and cement. Quickly assessed, our only hope was a ventilation hole the size of a cinder block. It was ridiculously small. We looked around for the smallest member. Hugh eyed us like a cornered animal, "Not me, not me!" His cries went unheard, some must sacrifice. Unfortunately, his dimensions were not in congruence with the Golden Mean and he would not fit.

During this drama, the operator's slippers were filling up with snow. He had a pale countenance, and an empty, cold look about him. (This comes from staying up too late.)

Back at the hole, Zars was the next victim. Little did his cohorts mind when they heard the wool shirt ripping or the screams from inside as his body threatened to fell a $3000 oscilliscope on a rolling table. Money was no longer the ruler—time was. Through! The oscilliscope was saved, the shirt too (but for memories), and lastly, the operator.

We made it down in 37 minutes. Mount Greylock had reprieved a condemned man. Those tracks are covered, but many more are waiting to be broken. Value lies in contrast. So does death.

Aruba thaws Ephs

At 1:37 a.m. Saturday morning, emcee Tom Carey announced that Will Noel '78 and Jackie Glanz '78 held the winning Aruba ticket; by 7:30 they were on their way from the J.F.K. airport.

Prospect sold 156 tickets to the gala affair. This number was short of the goal and Noel estimated that the house lost $100 to $200—"not as much as expected." Noel, one of the night's main organizers, had bought four tickets because "until the last night of sales, Aruba night was tenuous and I wanted to help the house."

Glanz and Noel agreed, "We had a great time at just the party." Driscoll was turned into a miniature tropical island replete with banana trees made out of pillars, exotic drinks, and Hawaiian music. Throughout the night, ticket holders were eliminated a few at a time until the last six were announced all at once.

The first couple eliminated was given a free pizza at Constantine's while the first runners-up were each given a bottle of Chivas. Those who attended the party came appropriately attired in shorts, bathing suits, and sunglasses.

The couple stayed at the Aruba Sheraton and enjoyed 82 degree weather in Aruba's "coldest" month. They were given $200 spending money which they used to see shows; they went to casinos and toured the island as well. Among the activities they squeezed into three days were tennis, snorkeling, sunning, sea-jeeping (like snow-mobiling on water) and shopping. The couple returned to Williamstown late Tuesday night.

Victor Hill performs harpsichord works

Griffin Hall Concerts presents Victor Hill in a harpsichord recital of music by three lesser-known composers tomorrow and Sunday evenings at 8 p.m. The concert, held in Room 3 of Griffin Hall, is free and open to the public.

The program for the solo concert, includes Johann Pachelbel's set of variations on a German chorale and the "Ciacona in F minor," called Pachelbel's finest work, Georg Bohm's D major suite for harpsichord, in French overture style, and the intimate Suite 8 in F minor. The final work in the first half is the noble toccata which Bohm titled "Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude."

The second half of the program is devoted to the French viola da gamba player Antoine Forqueray. Six pieces by this composer, as transcribed for solo harpsichord by his son and daughter-in-law, will be preceded and followed by works composed in honor of Forqueray by his contemporaries Couperin and Duphly.

In commenting on the program, Hill explained that although Pachelbel and Bohm are often included under the demeaning title of "predecessors of Bach," they were both important composers in their own right and significant influences on Bach. "Both seemed to reach their greatest heights in F minor, a key that had great tension because of the tuning systems in use in the late 17th century. The musical and emotional parallels between the two Italian-style ciaconas on the program are striking, and both are pieces that wrap their dramatic intensity in a cloak of intimacy."

Forqueray, on the other hand, is the "Scriabin of the 18th century," a composer of lush sonorities and clashing chromatics, exploiting the rich lower register of the harpsichord. "This is music of passion and exhuberance; it has the abandon of Scarlatti coupled with the intricacy of Couperin and Rameau."

"Although these composers are justly described as lesser-known—the public knows Pachelbel for one Canon for strings and Bohm and Forqueray scarcely at all—the music is first-rate and deserves to be heard. I put these composers on a program by themselves precisely so that their music wouldn't be presented as a sort of interlude between works of the well-known giants of the Baroque."

Informal commentary on the composers and the works performed will be provided by during the concert by Hill in order to introduce the unfamiliar music.

Victor Hill will perform in a harpsichord recital in Sunday's Griffin Hall Concert.

Arts Council hosts workshops

The Northern Berkshire Council of the Arts, in cooperation with The Gallery at 85 Spring Street, will present a free "Talents to Share" workshop tomorrow as Frances Donaldson of Pittsfield demonstrates the art of Shaker tape weaving. Donaldson will demonstrate her skills using narrow woven cotton tape, which the Shakers used to make webbed chair seats. If there is interest, a short course will be given in two sessions. This workshop is part of a series sponsored by the Northern Berkshire Council of the Arts.

Theater Workshop

The Arts Council is also sponsoring a Theatre Improvisation workshop for adults with William White as the instructor. The class will stress the improvisational aspects of theatre. There will be impromptu skits and exercises and perhaps a final performance, if participants wish. Anyone with or without experience is welcome.

White has taught both English and music. He has extensive theatrical experience in playwriting, acting, directing and songwriting and has taught theatre workshops at North Adams State College, SUNY at Stonybrook, Shoreham Public Schools and North Adams Public Schools. His radio play, The Boy Who Found Christmas was performed this past Christmas Eve on WMNB.

The class will meet on Wednesday evenings beginning Fefruary 9, from 7:00 - 9:00 p.m. at a North Adams location to be determined. Further information regarding fees, registration, and location can be obtained from the Council office in North Adams.

First WCFG film

The first Williams College Film Group presentation of the Spring term is Josef von Sternberg's 1930 film The Blue Angel.

The film launched the career of Marlene Dietrich as the incomparable Lola Lola, a vulgar and sensual night club singer who shatters the respectability and self-importance of an English professor played by Emil Jannings. Particularly striking is the characterization of the club (the Blue Angel) as extremely dense and jungle-like. It makes "Cabaret" seem like a comparatively pleasant and innocent place to be.

As all Williams Film Group presentations, the film plays in Bronfman on Saturday evening. The Blue Angel will show at 7:30 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. tomorrow.

Takacs executes technical works with ease and dazzling skill

by Valerie A. Sarantos

"He broke a string on the piano this afternoon while practicing," said a grinning Charles Joseph, of the Williams music department before the third and final Young Artist Peter Takacs undertook an extremely difficult program in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The thirty-year old Rumanian-born pianist easily executed some of the most technically challenging piano literature ever written, with dazzling authoritative strength, flair, and control.

With never a dull moment from the beginning of Beethoven to the final notes of Chopin, Takacs exhibited his abilities as a pianistic powerhouse. Each note was crystal clear, rich in tone, and never was there a muddled glissando or a poor rendering of a difficult passage.

After warming up on Beethoven's Sechs Bagatellen, Op. 126, Takacs spoke about the following Mendelssohn Fantasy in F sharp minor, Op. 28, describing it as having "wild fingerwork". The pianist brilliantly machine-gunned Mendelssohn in this rarely performed piece with clean chords and piercing runs. He seems to thrive on this sort of playing.

Following an explanation of what he called the most difficult 20th Century piano piece, Trois Mouvements de Petrouchka by Igor Stravinsky, Takacs revealed a truly incredible display of pianistic fireworks. Hands moving so fast that they looked blurry, the pianist played Stravinsky in an appropriately percussive manner.

Takacs concluded his impressive program with Chopin's Twenty-four Preludes, Op. 28. Carefully molding the personality of each prelude, he was consistently clear and strong, but sometimes the strength obstructed the characteristic, quietly introspective Chopin melodies. That reading however, is preferable to an overly sappy, dramatic rendition which can be damaging.

'Roots' called gift to all Americans

Note: Williams College awarded Haley with an honorary Doctor of Letters Degree at Commencement 1975. The College commended Haley stating, "Your remarkable literary tour de force, The Autobiography of Malcom X, was a triumph of both listening and writing."

by Philip Cantelon

Nearly eight years ago I sat for over three hours in one of Jesup Hall's uncomfortable seats. If, as someone once observed, your backside is the best judge of the quality of a lecture, this one rated the highest marks. Indeed, the man and the topic were so fascinating, there was nary a squirm. The speaker was Alex Haley, author of the Autobiography of Malcolm X. I had been curious to hear Haley for he had conducted one of the finest interviews I had encountered, a conversation with George Lincoln Rockwell published in Playboy Magazine. What was surprising about that interview was that Rockwell was the head aryan of the American Nazi Party and Haley was black. Haley had pulled it off magnificently.

That evening in Jesup, Alex Haley mentioned his newest project: he was attempting to unlock the story of his past by tracing his ancestors back to Africa. The key, Haley told the crowd that evening, consisted of several words his aunt had told him on the front porch of her home in Tennessee. Kinte, known in the family history as "The African," ko, and Kambay Bulongo. And from these thin strands Haley had woven together the fabric of his family's history. He was the historian as detective.

First he told us of tracing the family name back to planters in Virginia one, two, three, four, five, six generations—to Kunta Kinte, "The African." The words, he learned were of Mandinka origin, ko meant guitar, bulongo meant river: Kambay Bulongo, the Gambia River. Hours in the National Archives in Washington, the Public Record Office in London and the Maryland Archives led Haley to the slave ship, Lord Ligonier, which, most likely, had brought Kinte to America in 1776. Then Haley made the pilgrimmage back to the village of Juffure on the Gambia. The cycle was complete. Thus, the roots of his family's past had been uncovered two hundred years later. All this, Haley promised, would result in a book about his search for his ancestors, his past.

Now Roots: The Saga of an American Family has finally emerged amidst novel fanfare, including a television series. And while it is not the book I thought Haley would write (he entitled it Before This Anger in 1969), it is a work which rightfully enjoys a wide audience.

Haley has produced neither a narrative history of his family nor an historical novel in the Kenneth Roberts, Mary Renault vein. Rather he has written a non-fiction novel in the tradition of John Hersey or Truman Capote. Haley calls Roots "faction"—fiction based on fact. Certainly he intended his work to be historically accurate. His research has led him to most recent scholarship on the institution of slavery from its African origins to middle passage to plantation life in the upper South. Yet Haley goes beyond the traditional historian—fictionalizing his family, injecting an historical understanding through his ancestors' conversations, emotions, concerns.

Two aspects stand out. First, Haley has demonstrated once again that he is the most talented person in the country in blending oral history techniques with first-rate literature. He cheats us on neither side. One can quarrel with his use of historical scholarship on slavery—his characters are suddenly plunged into conversation revealing the most recent news on the slave grapevine, including Toussaint, L'Overture, Denmark Vesey, or Phyllis Wheatley among others. The grapevine is so good, Abraham Lincoln has a beard in 1860, just as he has begun to grow it. Unfortunately, Haley awkwardly pastes conversations into these episodes, which place the family in the larger historical picture.

But this is a small matter when viewed with what Haley gives us. Roots represents for blacks in America what Oscar Handlin's The Uprooted did for those Southern and Central European immigrants of the late 19th and early 20th century: a place within the historical fabric of the United States. And the titles, too, should not be viewed as coincidental. For black Americans, seeking a usable past, African origins hold great historical import, a bridge between cultures, so brutally severed by the middle passage and the white man's world. The Uprooted did much the same for those Russian, Polish, and Italian immigrants. While these Europeans were able to make the choice to come to America, the cultural shock for that first generation was not unlike that experienced by Kunta Kinte. According to Haley, after being uprooted from Africa, blacks had to rediscover their roots. Thus Haley travels back in both time and space to uncover the origins of his family and, symbolically, the roots of most black Americans.

Finally, what Haley tells us is that despite the horrors of slavery, the family stayed together, passing down from generation to generation its history in the United States. He affirms Herbert Gutman's recent study which argues that black family ties were quite strong and not shattered by slavery. Indeed, Haley also echoes Melville Herskovitz's classic study of thirty years ago, The Myth of the Negro Past, in stressing the presence and importance of Africanisms (i.e., key words, oral tradition) surviving in his family. Roots is, then, an important literary work not only of historical research and oral tradition, but it also serves as a representative history of blacks in the United States. As my colleague Professor Dickerson points out, Roots is a marvelous bicentennial gift to all Americans.

and secretaries contacted by the Record only a few could name one or two of the suggested steps.

According to Holden, one of the biggest difficulties in maintaining conservation steps is getting feedback on what is working and what is not. For example, many students will complain if they are not getting enough heat, but few will complain if they are getting too much.

However, students, faculty and staff have offered suggestions which have been incorporated in the College's Energy Conservation Program. Following a suggestion by Reed Zars '77, the College insulated the 400,000 gallon fuel tank. (No. 6 fuel oil must be heated to flow smoothly and burn.)

Williams has kept in close touch with other colleges and institutions which are concerned with the energy problem and are developing methods of conservation. But, according to Welanetz, Williams has been the focal point of inquiries concerning the college's success.

The conservation program, began in 1971 when thermostats were lowered to 68 degrees. Welanetz and his crew have lowered hot water temperatures to 112 degrees, dropped low-occupancy building to 50 degrees at night and set thermostats at 65 degrees in laboratory and classroom spaces in subsequent years, which has saved the College over $200,000 in the past year.

JA selection begins

earlier this year."

Selection Procedure

Each candidate will have his-her three recommendation forms read aloud to the entire committee, beginning with the candidate's personal essay and followed by the recommendation of his former JA and a third form completed by someone "who knows you well." After the three forms have been read aloud, discussion of the candidate will ensue, with a time limit of 15 minutes per application. Following this time interval the committee votes to either "hold" or "reject" the candidate.

After all candidates have been reviewed once, each member of the committee will be randomly assigned four or five applicants for which he-she will lead discussion in the second round. All candidates are reviewed in this round, including those that were initially rejected. Thus, each candidate is quaranteed of two chances. During the second round, applicants are again placed in a "hold" or "reject" category. At the end of this round, the final selections are made from the people still in the "hold" category by means of a secret ballot.

All recommendations and related materials are destroyed at the conclusion of the selection process.

shifts in temperature can put strains on the heating system. Holden contrasted last January when temperatures dropped to around -20 degrees to this January when it was "steadily cold but not bitterly cold." Thus while degree-days rose by about three per cent, fuel consumption stayed about the same.

While most campus buildings receive steam heat from the central plant, roughly ten per cent are heated through more expensive means. Mission Park is heated electrically at costs roughly three times the cost of heating it with heating oil. "Of course, when it was built oil and electricity were competitive," said Holden.

Hoopsters upset Middlebury, 66-64

by Andy O'Donnell

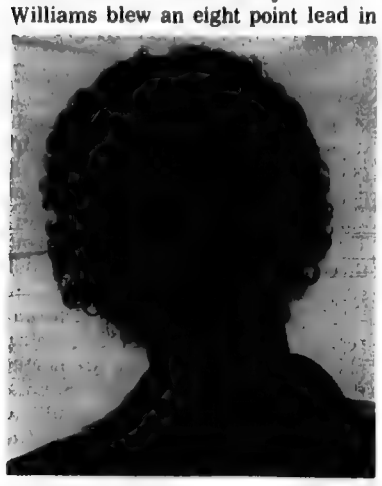
Sisyphus should have had it this good.

After rolling the proverbial ball up the hill with no luck for 35 of the most frustrating minutes that it has endured this season, the varsity basketball team finally snuck over the top with just 22 ticks left on the clock to post a thrilling 66-64 come from behind victory over Middlebury Wednesday night before 600 relieved fans in the cozy confines of the Lasell gymnasium.

The win, which evened the Ephs record at 6-6, ended a brief two game skid and erased memories of last week's debacle with Trinity in which Williams blew an eight point lead in the closing minutes of the second half and eventually went on to lose in overtime. This time around, however, the Converse were on the other guy's feet.

Principal architects of the triumph were Mike Tanner, the kid with Elmer's all over his hands and a jump shot that could clear Thompson Chapel, plus a frenetic Williams half court trap press that gave the normally methodical and slow paced Panther offense fits every time it crossed halfcourt. With Tanner exploding for 12 points in the final seven minutes and the press suddenly disrupting the Panther's disciplined style of play, things finally began to get interesting as the second half drew to a close.

Down 62-50 with 5:47 left in the contest, the Ephs went into the press and forced four Middlebury turnovers quicker than you can say Zenon Smotrycz. And as has been the case so often this season for Williams, once the defense got going, the long dormant offense finally woke up. With Tanner hitting nothing but net and with Matt Spangler chipping in with two clutch buckets, the Ephs reeled off 12 unanswered points to tie the game at 62 with 2:19 remaining.



Tanner then hopped on down to Spring Street's new telephone booth, added a cape to his purple uniform, and proceeded to mild manneredly sew things up for Williams. He first threw in a bomb from the right side to catapult the Ephs into the lead for the first time since late in the first half and then answered a Kevin Kelleher drive with his patented Sky Jumper to put Williams ahead 66-64 with 0:22 left on the clock. The Ephs then held their breath and weathered two Panther misses in the final seconds before sending their visitors north with their eighth loss in fifteen outings.

Tanner led all scorers with 22 points, hitting his last six shots from the floor and finishing with an 11 for 16 shooting night. Gerry Kelly, who kept Williams in the game through most of the first half with 12 points, finished with 18, while Brad Wolk and Spangler wound up with 10 apiece.

A brief reminder: Williams hosts two-thirds of Maine this weekend with tonight's game against Bowdoin starting at 7:00. Tomorrow AFTERNOON at 2:00 (note the unusual time) the Ephs entertain Colby and All-American Paul Harvey.

Brad Wolk passes as Mike Tanner and Bill Whelan look on Wednesday night. Eph cagers came back in the last few minutes to upset Middlebury 66 to 64.

Athlete of the Week Martin Goldberg '79.

Martin Goldberg is Athlete-of-Week

As a result of his two strong victories over tough University of Pennsylvania and Princeton opponents, squash player Martin Goldberg has been named Record Athlete of Week. Goldberg, playing No. 4, shut out his Quaker opponent in the Ephs 6-3 win over Penn while going on to grab one of two Eph victories against Princeton the following day.

Honorable Mention—Senior shot putter Rich Remmer returned to the track circuit last Friday night to smash the college shot put record with a 53 foot heave.

Natator Phil Wild also receives an honorable mention this week for his outstanding performances in the 400 yard medley and other races last Saturday against Bowdoin. Wild, splitting 49.2 and 48.5 in the anchor position in the relays, also won the 100 yard free with a time of 49.1.

Ephs outskate Huskies, 5-2

by Tim Layden

Overcoming the frigid temperatures provided by the hosts' outdoor rink, the Williams varsity hockey team warmed up early and coasted to a 5-2 win over the University of Connecticut Tuesday night. The win left the Ephs with an overall record of 8-6, with a 4-6 mark in the division.

But for Coach Bill McCormick's skaters, it's out of the ice bath and into the sauna this weekend as the Maine version of Scylla and Charibidis strolls into town for a weekend doubleheader in Lansing Chapman rink. The Ephs entertain powerful Bowdoin Friday afternoon at 4, before facing Colby Saturday at the same hour.

Against the 4-8 Huskies, Williams got on the scoreboard early, as senior Rick Zeller continued his strong play of late, registering a score just 37 seconds into the contest. Freshman Jim Rooney and senior Jim Hield assisted on the goal.

Bob Duffy's unassisted tally at 6:00 of the period gave Eph goalie Eddie Weiss a 2-0 cushion before UConn's Ron Kirtland brought the hosts within one goal just 27 seconds later. Junior Weiss was on the way to turning back 33 Huskie shots on route to his third victory in the nets in as many tries.

Sophomore Chris Egizi, the team's leading goal-getter, broke the game's longest scoring drought with a 4 on 4 goal at 18:02 of the second period which returned the two-goal bulge to the Purple.

UConn winger Larry Langevin netted the second home goal of the game at 3:51 of the final period to bring his team back within one, but a pair of Williams goals later in the same period sealed the win, the 10th for the Ephs in 12 tries against the Huskies.

Duffy scored from Peter Gonye and Ben Heintz at 7:32 and Gonye scored from Zeller on a power play goal at 13:59 to wrap up the victory.

In Bowdoin, the Ephs will be facing one of the strongest teams on the schedule. The Polar Bears have copped the ECAC Division II title in each of past two seasons and stand at 7-1 in the current campaign. Bowdoin topped Williams 6-4 on their own home ice a year ago, and just last weekend dropped a heartbreaking 4-3 overtime loss to powerful Merrimack.

Colby has been an easy mark for Williams, as the Ephs have won each of the past four contests against the Mules. Under Coach Jack Kelly, a one-time Colby mentor and now back from the pro ranks, the school is attempting to rebuild its program. Judging from last weekend's stunning upset of Northeastern, it appears that Mr. Kelly is headed in the right direction.

Ephs and Jeffs at top in Little Three track tilt

by Frank Carr

Once again it's "Little Three" time on the Towne Fieldhouse tartan for coach Dick Farley's track and fielders. Tomorrow afternoon at 1:00 p.m., Lord Jeffrey Amherst will return to his "former residence" with a basket of talent to wave under the nose of Uncle Ephraim. Wesleyan and Trinity will also be on hand to round out the quadrangular contest, but will likely take a back seat when Eph and Jeff resume their feud. According to Farley, Amherst will present the stiffest competition for the Ephmen, with Wesleyan and Trinity supplying enough athletes to spread the points around more evenly.

The Little Three title in track, unlike most other sports, can be decided on the spot, in one afternoon. The battle for this particular "Conference Championship" has never made the cover of "Track and Field News", but this has never prevented the Lord Jeffs from putting a pair of Nikes on the manager of the Math Team if he can fall far enough forward to pick up a single "Little Three" point in the long jump.

In order to retain its Little Three crown, Williams must compensate for a lack of depth by placing first in eight key events. The weight events will likely be a breeze, but most likely a purple hurricane; look for Rich Remmer to win the shot put by at least his own body length and be sure to watch out for a 35 lb. flying object which will touch down in first place after blasting off from a spinning launch pad known as Larry Tanner.

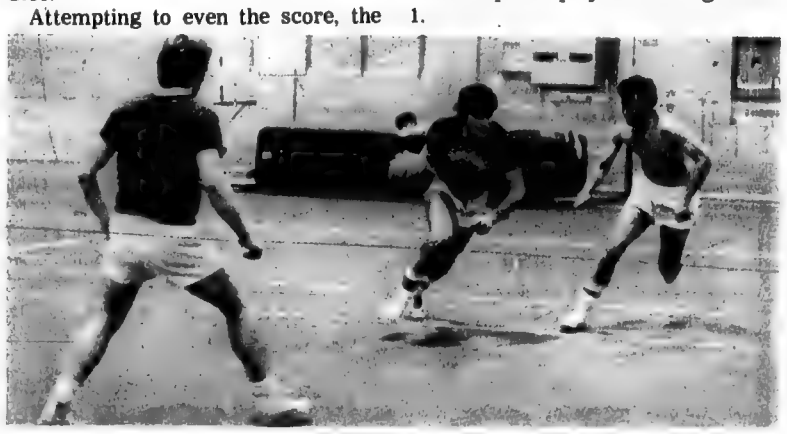
Farley will count on Jamie Rouse and Greg McAleenan to out distance the field in the high jump and long jump respectively, while 60 yard hurdlers Ron White and Vernon Davis should easily float to first and second in that event.

Co-captain Ken Leinbach leads the "conference" with clockings of 4:17.9 (mile) and 2:17.2 (1000 yd. run) and his road running teammates Joe Kolb and Frank Carr will bolster the Eph attack with a 1-2 purple punch in the 2 mile run.

Amherst has the ability to counter the Williams scoring flood by mopping up with a powerful mile relay quartet, a double threat in the pole vault and a rather swift 6.5 second 60 yard dasher. Farley may have a bit of trouble keeping the Little Three crown on his head but should receive enough support from his athletes to retain the "hardware" for another season.

Lady pucksters remain unavenged

In an attempt to avenge an earlier 3-0 loss at the hands of Middlebury, the Williams women's ice hockey team came up short Tuesday night, losing to the Panthers 2-1.



Opening the scoring on a poor shot at 13:07, the Middlebury line deflected a centering pass behind Eph goalie Byttie Miller. The Panthers went on to dominate the remainder of the period, with Miller and fellow defensemen fighting to keep out post hitting shots.

With 4:26 left in the first period forward Sarah Baldwin put one in for the Ephs on a good play from behind.

Although Miller held off the still dominating Panther line early in the second period, she was replaced by teammate Lisa Halperin who had several fine stick saves in the game's final minutes. The Panther pressure proved too tough for Halperin however, as the visiting line tucked one in the side, going up 2-1 with only 1:50 left in period.

The early minutes of the third period saw some better play for the Ephs as Mary Fish skated well for the team. As the Panthers took charge, Halperin continued to keep the Ephs in the contest, turning away strong shots, including one blue line shot at 2:50.

Attempting to even the score, the Ephs pulled Halperin but a last minute penalty was the end for the squad which managed to hold off a Panther power play to end the game 2-1.

Residences convert to student houses

by Stu Massad

"As soon as weather will permit and contracts can be made" the College will begin transforming Keck and Woodbridge houses, former faculty residences, into student housing for this fall at an estimated cost of $75,000, according to Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad.

The trustees decided on the change last month because, said Roosenraad, they recognized that additional housing is "badly needed." This year's large freshman class and the probable loss of the use of Dewey House in a year because of zoning rules led administrators to look for new housing. Roosenraad further noted that the two houses are now empty.

Although final decisions have yet to be made, President John W. Chandler, Roosenraad and Housing Committee Co-chairman Sally Coney said that Keck will probably go to the Perry-Bascom housing group. It faces Bascom across Stetson Court and will hold 13 students. Roosenraad remarked that the addition would move the overflow from Perry-Bascom, now housed in Currier, closer to the main houses.

Woodbridge House is expected to hold Garfield residents next year while their house is renovated. Its 13-person capacity will house most of next year's Garfield seniors. "It seems to me to be the only reasonable way to house the members and keep them together," Roosenraad said.

The permanent addition of Woodbridge to the Gar-Wood complex might make excessive demands on existing kitchen facilities, Roosenraad noted. He and Coney agreed that the house, located behind the Faculty Club, might go to Spencer-Brooks to replace Dewey House. The Student Housing Committee will make final decisions over the next few weeks.

The change from faculty to student housing will cost between $35,000 and $40,000 for each house, Roosenraad said. In Keck House, the garage will be converted to permanent interior space. Both houses must be brought up to the standards of the state's building code and the College's building policy.

Roosenraad and Coney noted the possibility of the College using small frame houses like Keck and Woodbridge as co-op housing. In this, off-board students would be able to live in college housing while cooking their own meals in house kitchens. Roosenraad remarked that this would not be done next year, though it might be considered in the future to give students an alternative between dorm and off-campus living.

Woodbridge and Keck (l. to r.) are former faculty residences being converted into student housing. Keck is tentatively in the Perry-Bascom group. Woodbridge will house Garfield residents ousted during renovation.

Architects interviewed

Art, music facilities to be enlarged

by Paul Thomas

The building committee in charge of planning the proposed addition to Lawrence Hall will begin interviewing architects in March according to art department chairman Whitney Stoddard. The addition, which will probably be located south of Goodrich and Lawrence, will house art facilities. No date has been set for the start of construction.

The committee has been engaged last semester in evaluating existing art facilities and in formulating recommendations for the new structure. In a report released in January, the committee outlined its proposals. The report cited as inadequacies in Lawrence the lack of storage space, the absence of sufficient space for display and for the shipping and handling of visiting art exhibitions, the limitations of the art studio, and the need for art history classrooms.

To remedy these deficiencies, the report includes plans for two new galleries, space for storage and handling, a print room, an architectural studio and drawing room, a multi-purpose room, and the enlargement of painting and senior seminar rooms.

A figure for the cost of the building has not been calculated, but Stoddard estimated that it would cost "less than two million". In keeping with the policy set by the trustees, the project will not get final approval from the board until enough money specifically earmarked for the construction can be raised. Most donations of this sort come from alumni.

This past year, gifts intended for the Lawrence addition have not been forthcoming according to Director of Development Willard Dickerson. Although it was a "record year" for the Alumni Fund, Dickerson noted, money for the new construction has been slow in arriving.

The architectural firms to be interviewed in March have been sent copies of the building committee's report to familiarize them with the requirements of the project. The nature of the project, Stoddard explained, is unique in that the design must integrate itself smoothly with the existing building and terrain. Although the committee has visited other campuses to view their art facilities, such trips were of limited value because of the uniqueness of the Lawrence project, he added.

Research and development plans have been drawn, and a model built of Phase Two of the music department's three phase improvement program, although the actual construction plans have yet to be started according to Irwin Shainman, chairman of the music department.

Levine details Carter energy policy

Natural gas shortages in the northeast and midwest can be effectively relieved by raising the regulated interstate price of gas, giving southwestern producers a greater incentive to sell to those hard-pressed states, a top-level member of President Carter's transition team told a Williams College audience last night.

Ken Levine, who during the transition oversaw the Congressional relations aspect of all federal departments dealing with energy and environment, said that intrastate gas prices are unregulated, while interstate prices are regulated by the Federal Power Commission. As a result, he said, there is a surplus of natural gas in Texas, Oklahoma, and other southwestern states as the producers there, who own the reserves, sell most of their gas intrastate, or refuse to produce all they can, hoping for federal deregulation of interstate prices.

Carter's Emergency Natural Gas Legislation, approved last week by Congress, is not meant to be a long-term solution, Levine said. The legislation empowers Carter to allocate gas between interstate pipelines, and gives the Federal Power Commission authority to allow states to purchase gas from southwestern producers at the unregulated intrastate price of about $2.25 per 1000 cubic feet. The regulated interstate price is $1.42.

But Carter and the FPC only have this power for 180 days, not enough to make significant sales, Levin claimed. Natural gas is usually sold through long-term contracts.

One solution, which Levine said he favored, though he didn't indicate whether it was Carter's position, is to have the FPC raise interstate prices to a regulated level that would ensure producers "a reasonable rate of return" without seriously disrupting the economy. He didn't give any figures on this could be done.

Another solution, Levine said, would be to deregulate interstate prices and then establish a windfall tax on the 300 to 400 per cent profits the producers would make. The tax would offset partially the disruptions to the economy caused by the deregulation.

Levine, who headed Carter's western Michigan campaign last fall, said that the President's energy program, to be released in late April or early May, will stress conservation rather than long term goals in meeting the energy crisis.

Among the conservation programs to be stressed will be the 65-degree maximum in homes heated by natural gas. Levine said that this program, in effect for the past week, "has saved more energy than was saved in the two years of the Ford Administration."

Long-term goals mentioned in the program will probably be greater uses of coal and solar energy and a lesser emphasis on nuclear energy, Levine said.

"It's not clear where the energy policy of this Administration will go, but the transition and high-level people are pretty good appointments from the consumer and environmental perspective," the Harvard Law School graduate claimed.

Honor Committee defines plagiarism

by Randy Wang

The Honor Committee is making a determined effort to communicate with both the students and faculty of their obligations to the quality of Williams College, Don MacDonald '77, student chairman said. "Most people don't read the Student Handbook statement until they get caught," he added.

The committee will visit all the freshman entries during the week of Feb. 13-19 to explain clearly the college policy on honesty. The members said they feel that they hold the responsibility to make sure students understand the implications of plagiarism.

They sent a letter to professors emphasizing the need for communication. The members said they hope that the faculty will not handle violations itself, but instead will use the committee process so that each

Mission Park - taking a closer look

This is the first in a series of articles describing each of the five housing categories. Other housing categories will be examined in future issues of the RECORD.

by Peter Rintels

Mission Park grows on you. After living there a while, the initial drawbacks, specifically the small rooms and the annoying blank, white walls, become less annoying and instead one begins to appreciate some of its unique advantages, such as never having to brave cold weather to catch a meal.

I speak as an inhabitant of Mission who did not first intend to live there, but who, after having been cajoled into it by some friends, has actually come to like it.

From the outside, Mission Park looks like an elongated mass of concrete and glass that might more descriptively have been named Mission Control. Its location is moderately good: not as convenient to Sawyer as the freshman quad or Lehman, but no worse off than the bulk of upperclass housing in this respect. The science quad is about a ten minute walk.

Mission Park rooms all share one thing in common—size, or more accurately, a lack of it. Indeed, one of the first challenges of moving in in the fall is arranging the furniture to take advantage of every cubic inch of the living space.

Shuffling furniture about is complicated by the one thing Mission Park rooms don't have in common—shape. Some have as many as four right angles, others have none at all, shaped instead like an extremely irregular hexagon.

Another disadvantage of Mission is its drabness on the inside. No building I have seen at Williams seems to suffer so much from a sterile modernity than does Mission. From the concrete stairwells (some of which were painted as part of an art WSP a few years ago) to the white walls and ceilings of both suite hallways and rooms, there is a remarkable blandness to the surroundings.

One thing the modernity has contributed is quiet. The walls have been soundproofed, making it very easy to study in your room here. Big parties downstairs do not bother people grinding upstairs.

Rooms come in suites of four, five and seven, so seven people is the

More students leave this semester

More students have left this semester on exchange or for what the Dean's office labels "personal reasons" than at the same time last year.

In the latter category, 41 have left Williams including two exchanges and seven freshmen as opposed to 35 including one freshman, last year.

The number of students abroad (20), on twelve college exchange (2) and those who have transferred (4), are only slightly above last year's figures. Those who went abroad are in London predominantly, then Bogota, Rome, Paris, and Japan. A sophomore male is at Wellesley and a junior girl at Smith.

The total number abroad for the year is 24. Among the 14 who transferred, the largest number went to Californian universities while others are attending music school, Cornell and Tufts.

Where To Live

The choice of an upperclass housing arrangement is one of the more important decisions that a first-year Williams student must make. Unfortunately, such decisions are frequently made with little knowledge or forethought and are often the product of last minute scrambles and compromises. The result, for some students, is unhappiness and a housing hassle that can last for three years.

Under the current house inclusions system, members of the freshman class will be required to rank their preferences for each of five housing categories no later than March 4. We urge them to make an effort to learn about the different atmospheres and lifestyles exhibited by residential houses now, before the crunch of second semester really begins.

Descriptions of the various housing options will be included in an initial mailing by the Housing Committee. In addition, beginning this issue, the Record is running a series of features on housing choices. These sources of information are useful but are no substitute for a little legwork. All upperclass houses will be having "open-house" sessions in the coming weeks. Freshmen should take advantage of these as an opportunity to examine house facilities and talk to house members. Meals can also be an excellent opportunity for both meeting house members and sampling the discrepancies found in campus cuisine. We believe that a little exploration now can save alot of headaches later and urge all students to make the upcoming inclusion process as smooth as possible.

They Write By Night

Bloody House is "Bloody Good"

It takes a lot of guts to revive plays from certain literary-historical periods and make them palatable to modern audiences. But that's exactly the kind of nerve exhibited in the current production The Bloody House of Miguel Sanyei (originally titled The Bloody House of Miguel Sanchez) which continues through February 13 at the Adams Memorial Theater. Theatrical wizard Jean-Bernard Bucky has shown considerable directorial skill in updating the famous 17th century Spanish comedy of manners, and if author Raphael Saavedra - Vasco - Primo - Porfavor (hereafter R S-V-P-Porfavor) is indeed turning in his grave, it is probably in a belly-laugh! As with his celebrated production of Equus last spring (which was set in a Puerto Rican laundromat during the depression, making good use of an all-gay cast) the boldest and most successful stroke in Bucky's production is its setting. Who would have thought of an electronics firm in modern-day Japan as an effective setting for this comedy? It's that kind of imagination—and obliviousness to the rantings of the stuffy literature professors—which makes the AMT the stimulating theater that it is.

The plot is familiar to all. Miguel, cheated of his birth-right, disguises himself as his evil brother Alemane, who is not really evil, but terribly misguided by his evil mentor Marquez. Disguised, Miguel travels through drawing rooms across the Basque territory, in an attempt to meet and kill the brother whom he is impersonating. The climax in Andorra (any killing on the 17th century spanish stage had to be set in a country other than Spain), making use of fast exits and entrances, not to mention countless numbers of doors, malapropisms, and mistaken identities is a classic scene in theater history.

Bucky's production takes place in the main factory of Chinoyta Electronics, Rtd. Kevin O'Rourke plays the undisguised Miguel, a small (three lines at the beginning, a dying moan at the very end) but difficult role. The double role of Alemane and Mugiel-disguised-as-Alemane is challenging for the most seasoned professional; but student Dianne Thompson handles it with ease, providing deep and thoughtful characterization. The more cynical members of the audience found Miguel's transformation from the hefty O'Rourke to the svelte Thompson difficult to swallow. More awkwardness was felt in the climactic scene when Miguel (still disguised) confronts his brother Alemane, learning of his brother's genuine love for him. Most productions use two actors, make-up to look alike. Leave it to J-B Bucky to make use of a cleverly positioned screen from which Dianne Thompson would dart back and forth, playing both roles at a breakneck pace. We found it easy to remember which brother was which because she would arch her eyebrow when she was Miguel-as-Alemane, and would make her eyes really wide when she was Alemane. Good use was also made of a tape recorder hidden behind the screen:

Thompson (Miguel): How did you know it was me?!

Tape recorder (Alemane): . . . Testing, Act I scene 4, cue 23 . . .

My only real complaint would relate to the unsatisfying sword-fight scene. It was performed completely behind the screen with Thompson groaning, first in a low voice, then in a higher one. When Alemane mistakenly kills Miguel, O'Rourke darted back on stage to resume his role as the unmasked, dying brother.

The oriental setting allows Bucky some stylist innovations. He completely ignores R S-V-P-Porfavor's stage direction which calls for "the bleakest, dustiest, most desolate enivron possible" as the setting of the play. Instead he makes use of hot pastel colors in both the set and the costumes.

Minor roles are played by Peter Bergethon (who plays the "foreign military officer" with a convincing German accent), Gwen Seliger and Earl Childs (the siamese-twins), and a cameo by Bill Driscoll '76 who plays himself, (a role written into this production by Mr. Bucky.) Special attention is deserved by Don Frazier, who plays the madman.

All in all it's a great night of theater. I don't want to give anything away, but when the eighteen-foot calculator is lowered on to the stage (giving a fresh, new twist to the ancient "deus ex machina" concept), you'd better hold your sides, for I was sure mine were about to split! Tony Spaeth

Letters: Leif, Olympic thanks, spoof

Leif Bredenberg

To the editor:
An open letter to the Williams Community:

Perhaps many of you have heard, but for those of you who haven't Leif Bredenberg, class of '76 and 1976 president of the Williams Rugby Club died suddenly on December 27, 1976, while in Japan fulfillling a teaching assignment. Leif was struck down by a cerebral hemmorhage which had put him in a coma on December 20, 1976 and finally ended his life on December 27, 1976.

We, the Williams Rugby Club, especially mourn his death. For his devotion and commitment to the club as both a player and an officer, while serving as a constant inspiration to all of us, will never be forgotten and always be treasured. Leif's incessant enthusiasm for life at Williams infected everyone he met, as all who knew Leif will quickly agree.

Finally, knowing how much Leif meant to so many of us, I wanted to simply take this opportunity to inform the Williams' community of this tragic loss of one of its members.

Sincerely yours,
Bill O'Reilly

Food service

To the editor:
An open letter to Ross Keller:

Concerning your newsletter of February 3, 1977: I have several questions about the two statements printed sideways along the body of the letter.

Statement one: "The world is full of cactus, but we don't have to sit on it." Are you announcing a new vegetarian dish? Can we have the cactus and the salisbury steak, or should we come back for seconds? Or is this a euphamistic reference to the crap we are served on, say, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday nights? Are you recommending that we eat out on such nights? The snack bar, perhaps?

Statement two: "What we see depends mainly on what we look for." Hmmmmmm. Is this a misprint? I thought the official policy was, "What you see is what you get." Or is this a new strategy for the students? If we anticipate barbequed beef on noodles for dinner, we won't be half as crushed when the woman announces, "liver or pizza?" Will this work, students?

Recommendations for the next newsletter:

"You're only as sick as you feel."

"Ask not what your food service can do for you but what you can do for your food service."

"Today's is the first meal of the rest of your life."

Tony Spaeth '77

Olympic thanks

To the editor:

We have some positive things to say about the Williams College Community. Without the generosity of many people, the Mission Park Olympics would have been impossible. We sincerely thank the contributions made by the Food Service, the Athletic Office, Security, the Coffee House, the Williamstown Highway Department, and Buildings and Grounds. Individuals of particular assistance were Mr. Dewey for his town council contacts, Coach McCormick for his brooms, Mr. Jankey for the loan of the snow removal equipment, and President Chandler for his eloquent Greek and quick torch. No one acted out of obligation and such service is appreciated.

Radio news

To the editor:

We, at WCFM, agree that an alert radio station does "have an advantage over the printed media because it can get information out faster." (Record, 1-26-77) Unfortunately for the Record, WCFM reported every one of the stories found in the Record's 1-26 issue several days before the paper hit the dorms. Certainly in the case of the Ross Keller scandal, the WCFM deep background sources proved far superior. Nevertheless, we believe the Record deserves a hand for a job excellently done.

We would also like to point out to our listener that the WCFM 5 O'clock Report is changing its name and time. Our new time is 7 PM. Our new and provocative name is the 7 O'clock News.

In the weeks ahead, WCFM News will be bringing you live reports from the opening ceremonies of the destruction of Garfield House and the impeachment proceedings of College Council President Steven Piltch. WCFM will also be bringing you more on the Keller scandal. Remember, WCFM is always first with all the news, all the time.

Sincerely,
Joe Avellar
News Director, WCFM

Discussion group

To the editor:

We would like to take this opportunity to announce the formation of a discussion group dedicated to political and economic comment from a conservative standpoint. A rational discussion of conservative principle has been lacking on this campus and we feel that in filling this void, our group can be interesting and informative for those of any political hue.

Our as yet unnamed group will meet twice each month in informal hour-long sessions with students, members of the faculty and community leaders, beginning at 7:30 on Tuesday February 15 at a place to be announced in the next Register.

We hope that our membership will include not only hard-line Republicans, but anyone interested in discussing current political and economic issues.

CUL report doesn't say what the Residential House system is

by David R. Ross

After three semesters in the making, the Committee's on Undergraduate Life "Final Report on the Residential House System" deserves wide attention and discussion. The report isolates major tensions and inequities in upperclass housing. Unfortunately, the report does not address the Residential House system as such. I must confess to having looked forward to an explanation of just what this system which replaced fraternities is and what it should be.

The CUL apparently assumed that readers of the report would understand the basic form and goals of the system, would agree with the CUL that the system is "working well," and would agree that the few prescriptions suggested in the report would indeed lead to an improvement in upperclass housing. That the first assumption isn't true is the primary weakness in this otherwise well considered report.

Check the description of the Residential House system in the Student Handbook. It talks a lot about faculty associates, but doesn't tell one much about what it is like to live in one of these "Houses." We all know what fraternities (good or bad) are like, can understand dorm living and can come to understand the explicitly defined quad systems of Harvard or Yale. But, this Residential House system is a bastard child, born out of the marriage of the wrenching dismantling of fraternities and a unique but bizarre scattering of housing space on campus.

This system (and system may be too kind a word) never developed a real identity of its own. Many of the tensions the CUL report notes are the result of various students and faculty members having different views of what upperclass housing is. Some Houses seem to want to be frats and dorms all at the same time.

The Angevine Report, the report which in 1962 represented the catalyst for the long and rather bitter dismantling of fraternities, declared that the post-fraternity College should

"While the CUL report addresses visible problems with housing, it fails to deal with the nature of housing and what housing should be."

"organize a substantial part of the total educational experience around relatively small units where there can be a blending of classroom life and a life of conversation and discussion, together with opportunity to find and enjoy the values, disciplines and pleasures of small-unit living, eating, and social life."

The report suggested that campus life would center around these small units—each containing about 100 people—with space for dining, studying and social activities associated with each unit. Upperclass housing at Williams has not fulfilled this vision. While the CUL report addresses visible problems with housing, it fails to deal with the nature of housing and what housing should be.

Either the College should work to move toward the system envisioned by the Angevine Report or it should stop giving lip-service to a non-existent system and instead define the system that has evolved.

While many of the CUL's suggestions will improve upperclass life at Williams, they should be seen as short-range, pending a full-scale reevaluation of housing at Williams. This should be conducted as soon as possible by an Angevine-type committee of students, faculty, alumni and trustees.

A few points for the committee to consider:

The strength and stability of a House come from its members, not from the house officers as the CUL report seems to suggest. Too many students fail to see their House as something in which they have a stake. Thus, in many Houses there is little concern for the appearance of the House and for the welfare of other House members. Too many students perceive house officers and student waiters as second class citizens—people somehow chosen to serve the rest of the House. Houses should work as close, almost family-like units. For example, all members should be required to be waiters, help set up parties and even do minor repairs and cleaning around the House.

Overflow housing and the technical affiliation of students living off-campus with particular Houses should end. It is unreasonable to expect students of diverse backgrounds, living miles apart to "find and enjoy the pleasures of small-unit living, eating and social life" together.

The view that Houses consist of various dominant and minority groups which must constantly be appeased should be tossed aside as an unhelpful paradigm. Houses like families should consist of diverse individuals who despite disagreements can get along and work together. The CUL's apparent belief that House officers can and should be responsible for bringing Houses together shows incredible naivete. It is only the acceptance of the rights and interests of others by each individual that will lead to a friction-free House. Without that acceptance, the greatest diplomat in the world could not be a successful House officer.

The College cannot have the concept of House autonomy both ways. As much as possible the College would like to see Houses police their own daily lives. Yet, increasingly the College is suggesting how social dues should be spent, making rooming changes without adequate consultation with House members and permitting the Food Services Budget to dictate the eating and social atmosphere of houses. There is a growing tendency for campus social life to flow away from the Houses to party interest groups such as All New Stuff. The College Council is the avenue the Administration uses for discussing issues with students. It might be more productive to use faculty House Affiliates and House meetings to take the student pulse on campus issues.

I strongly disagree with the idea of different levels of social dues. The moment a House does this it legislates the existence of different divisive groups. Isolating women, blacks or one-eyed New Yorkers as "groups" requiring special treatment does little to foster good intra-house relations.

It is somewhat difficult to maintain that diverse living arrangements as maintained at Williams have widespread student acceptance when some 120-140 people choose to live with friends off-campus, when a larger number seek to change Houses each spring, and when the Record's society editor reports that the highlight of the campus's social life this weekend was the TDX frat party in Pownal.

The College will someday come to grips with the fact that there are limits on the amount of diversity and homogeneity of housing situations Williams students are willing to accept. I am confident that the CUL realized that this is the principal conflict lying behind many of the tensions it isolated. However, this issue was lost in the midst of the CUL's attempts to create patchwork solutions for problems which are really merely symptomatic of more fundamental tensions and uncertainties in the Residential House system.

case will be treated equitably.

Plagiarism appears in many varied states and it is not always understood. As explained by MacDonald, there are four types:

The first is the most obvious, the case when students, in taking notes from a source, verbatim or in the form of ideas, do not cite the source in the paper, whether it is as a single word, phrase, or thought.

The second form has often gone unnoticed: self-plagiarism. Students should receive permission from the professor before using an earlier paper as a source, and then footnote it in their new paper.

In the sciences, there occasionally is a problem with one student using another's results. Again, footnotes are necessary.

Finally, the committee hears cases on exam cheating. Some academic departments presently have students sign the honor statement: "I have neither given nor received aid in this examination." Many professors institute alternate seating, but in very large classes, physical size limits their ability.

During a hearing, three-fourths of the committee must be present, and a vote of guilty by three-fourths of those present is necessary for punishment. The student has the right to be present during the accuser's statement. The student also has the right to present his case in the absence of the accusor.

Punishments vary greatly, and the committee has almost limitless power in dealing them out. Dismissal is the most extreme, and approval must come from both Dean Berek and President Chandler. Following this in decreasing severity are suspension, probation with and without restrictions, and a letter of censure.

The Honor Code

The Honor Code covers all aspects of academic honesty, including the writing of papers and other course work as well as all quizzes, hour tests, and examinations.

In written material, students are expected to acknowledge the sources of their work. Careful observance of accepted standards of reference and attribution is required. The basic rules are summarized below, but students are advised to consult a recognized style manual in order to avoid the possibility of even unintentional plagiarism. While literary honesty does not demand a footnote on statements of common fact, it does require that a student provide clear footnotes or other appropriate documentation and give credit in the bibliography to ideas, interpretations, and facts that particular sources have contributed to the student's final work.

1) A direct quotation (whether a single word or a phrase, sentence, paragraph, or series of paragraphs) must always be identified by quotation marks, by indenting and single spacing, or by reduced type size of the quoted material, and a note must be used to state the exact source.

2) A paraphrase of the work of another must be acknowledged as such by a note stating the source.

3) Indebtedness to the specific ideas of others, or the summarizing of several pages, even though expressed in different words, must be acknowledged by a note stating the source.

4) Every instance of the use of another student's laboratory reports, computer programs, or other material must be acknowledged by a note.

5) Even the use of a student's own previous work must be acknowledged; thus, a student must obtain the prior permission of all instructors concerned before submitting substantially the same paper in more than one course.

Individual instructors will define how standards of academic honesty apply to their own courses or laboratories. They may set any type of final examination or hour test, ranging from closed-book, alternate-seating classroom exercises to open-book, "take home" examinations or papers, and any requirements for laboratory exercises. Some instructors encourage cooperation between students but others do not. It is the responsibility of each student to determine what conduct is appropriate in any course or laboratory; students uncertain about a particular situation should ask the instructor or a member of the Student Honor Committee. An open and highly individualized system can only last as long as both the students and the Faculty work together to create a true academic community.

maximum crush on a bathroom at any one time. Some suites have living rooms. All of the rooms have telephones and large picture windows. In rooms with a northern exposure, the large windows allow an impressive view of the surrounding mountains.

In addition to the food's being good, it is also very convenient. One never has to go outside for it, and in this respect it is unique.

Socially, Mission falls short of the congenial atmosphere of the row houses. The arrangement of suites, most of which have their doors closed, is not very conducive to incidental trafficking with other members of your house.

Of all the places one might apply for upperclass housing, Mission Park is by far the most known quantity. If included into one of the 3 park houses, you'll know you have a single and you'll have a good idea of its size and shape.

Stetson harbors music memorabilia

by Gail Hupper

On some wintry weekday afternoon when you find yourself with some free time on your hands, walk over to Stetson Hall. Go to the information desk on the main floor and locate Tier One. Now make your way to the staircase which connects the old and new wings of the building. Walk down to Tier Three, make your way through offices and classrooms to Tier Two, and pray that you will find the staircase that will deposit you onto Tier One.

Assuming you have come this far, walk down that staircase that blind chance has led you to, then, at the bottom, walk through the fire door onto Tier One. If all is well you should be standing before an imposing-looking door covered with cartoons and signs.

If you walk through that door you will be transported into another time and another place. You will immediately be confronted by walls covered by photographs, cabinets filled with trophies, an unlikely statuette of a very fat man, an old banjo, and a miniature cream-colored piano lettered "Bing", on top of which the banjo lies. Walk further and you will come upon two rooms brimming with manila folders, manila envelopes, some magazines, and a few small tables, all neatly numbered, catalogued, and in place.

The place you have reached is the Whiteman collection, home of the 4,000 orchestrations with scores and parts, the over 1,000 recordings, and the endless memorabilia which make up the largest existing collection of the effects of Paul Whiteman, jazz musician of the '20's and '30's. Although best known for his numerous tours across the United States and Europe, as well as his 1924 performance in New York of Gerschwin's "Rhapsody in Blue", written especially for "The King of Jazz", Whiteman's musical career went far beyond these. He played hotel ballrooms and vaudeville circuits across the country. His orchestras played for numerous Broadway shows. He was paid huge sums of money for everything he did—from $10,000 for a private party given by the Prince of Wales, to $440,000 for the Universal Pictures production, "The King of Jazz." Collection Curator Irwin Shainman, aptly termed Whiteman "the biggest thing around," during his time.

The secret of Whiteman's success lay in several factors. Shainman emphasized the importance of the musician's "nose for talent" and his "ability to play"—Assistant Curator Carl Johnson reported that Whiteman usually paid his orchestras some two or three times as much as did other band leaders of the time. Also significant, said Johnson, were the "skilled publicity men" Whiteman hired. "They created for him the image that earned him the title. 'The King of Jazz'."

Both Johnson and Shainman said they felt, however, that the title is a misnomer. Said Johnson, "The title he much more richly deserved was 'The King of Entertainment Music.'" Certainly the present concept of jazz hardly fits Whiteman's music. Shainman felt that "the unusual thing about Whiteman at the time was that he took popular tunes and arranged them for a small orchestra. At the time everything that wasn't classical music was 'jazz.'" Shainman agreed that "entertainment music" was a far more apt label than "jazz" for Whiteman's music.

"No one really understands why it is that Williams received Whiteman's effects," Shainman said. "One explanation is that one of Whiteman's public relations ladies had earlier been secretary to Williams history professor Tyler Dennett. So when Whiteman's effects began to pile up, it was suggested that Williams receive them." The explanation to which Johnson subscribed was that Whiteman decided to give the collection to an educational institution. "It happened that one of his lawyers had two sons at Williams, so Whiteman offered the collection to the College." The collection arrived in full in the late 1940's; according to Shainman, "we still don't have it entirely organized."

Both Johnson and Shainman emphasized that the collection is "a working research facility." It is used for papers and other projects by students and members of the community; the curators also send material to recording houses, authors, and performers all over the world. "We're pretty busy around here," says Johnson, who himself has recently finished a report on Whiteman's career. "But I enjoy it." Johnson grew up in Whiteman's heyday, and heard him play live. He described the music as "slow and easy to dance to . . . the kind of thing that middle-class, middle-aged New Yorkers, out for an evening of dancing, would appreciate."

Durrenmatt's The Physicists opens this Thursday the 11th and continues on the 12th, and 17th-19th.

Boyd stages satire

The Williams College Theatre's production of Friedrich Durrenmatt's The Physicists will open at the Adams Memorial Theatre this Friday at 8:30 p.m. and continue Feb. 12, 17, 18, and 19th. The modern comedy is an early work of the Swiss playwright whose other plays include The Visit, The Marriage of Mr. Mississippi, and Play Strindberg. As the play's director, Gregory Boyd, explained, "The Physicists is typical of Durrenmatt; dealing with profound moral questions in a highly satiric manner. The play is full of savage and bitter humor, unexpected plot turns and sudden revelations. Durrenmatt uses elements of the murder mystery, the gangster melodrama, and the espionage thriller to great comic effect. The result is what one might call a grotesque farce—comic and disquieting at the same time."

The play is set in a lunatic asylum, run by a hunchback female psychiatrist and inhabited by only three patients. Each of the inmates is a nuclear physicist and each has a peculiar delusion—one imagines himself to be Sir Issac Newton, another thinks he is Albert Einstein and the third believes he is receiving visions from King Solomon. The play moves quickly through a series of events (including violent crime, sharp reversals, and unexpected discoveries) to an unusual climax.

Tickets are available at the AMT Box Office, or by calling 458-3023.

WCFM sets program

WCFM announced its spring semester schedule this week, making a number of changes in programming. From 8:30 until midnight on Sunday through Wednesday WCFM will air progressive and contemporary rock, while after midnight (1:00 on weekends) WCFM will feature progressive and contemporary jazz and soul.

The WCFM news department is making a major change. It will move its half-hour news summary from 5:00 p.m. to 7:00. The new Seven O'Clock News will place a new emphasis on news and events of the College and community. The weekend edition of the Seven O'Clock News (Friday and Saturday) will be shortened to 15 minutes. A new feature will be the Williams Scoreboard, which will provide a summary of all Williams College sports each day. A regular presentation of the Sunday news will be opinion, and anyone from the college or community who wishes to express their opinion on any issue of concern can do so at that time.

Special programs will be a very important part of WCFM's programming this semester, and will be aired Sunday through Thursday nights from 7:30-8:30 p.m. with other times as well. What's New, Thursday nights from 8:30 to 12, will present the latest album releases, reviews and information plus a special Album of the Week at 10:00. In addition, on Wednesday and Thursday mornings from 10-12 new albums will be played in their entirety.

The Gospel Beat will be moved back one hour from its present time to begin at noon on Sunday afternoon. At 1:00 that afternoon Martha Williamson will present Broadway Baby!, one hour of the best of Broadway show tunes. Following that will be The Music of . . . which focuses on the history of a particular artist each week. Also on Sunday, from 7:30 to 8:30, Tim Treadway will continue with Roots: An American Music Perspective. This show brings together a wide variety of music from the American experience, such as classic blues, and jazz, country, calypso, gypsy, and others. Two foreign language additions to the WCFM schedule are Cajon de Sastre, Monday 7:30-8 PM and Dingsbums, (Thursday 7:30-8 PM beginning Feb. 10) programs produced in Spanish and German (respectively) by the cooperation of students and faculty members.

Carl Johnson will continue to bring the Williamstown community From Ragtime to Swing (Wednesday, 7:30-8:30 PM) and Dave Studenmund will present the Hodgkins Hour (Tuesday, 7:30-8:30), a special production show including radio drama and other specially produced shows, and always featuring the legendary Ephman series (produced at WCFM in the late 1960's). Because WCFM is broadcasting virtually all of the Williams College basketball and hockey games, both the Hodgkins Hour and From Ragtime to Swing will begin on March 8 and 9. Also beginning that week will be the People's Revolutionary Midnight Theater (Thursday 12-12:30 beginning March 10) produced in cooperation with the BSU repertory company. Ecological Forum (alternate week beginning Feb. 14, Monday 8-8:30) will present interviews with knowledgeable people in the ecological field.

Thursday nights at 8:00 the WCFM Sports department will present Sportstime, with interviews, features and talk about the sports world. Oldies! will be on Saturday night from 10 p.m. to 1 a.m. this semester.

WCFM will also present FOLKTALK, a series of selected folktales from around the world. Produced by Dennis Doyon as a WSP 99, the FOLKTALK extends part of the oral tradition of five cultures to the Northern Berkshire radio audience.

Cabaret at Log

More fun is in store for Williams College students and affiliates as the Log presents the Williams Cabaret in performance this Thursday through Sunday evenings from 9 to 10 p.m.

Though the Cabaret usually highlights the work of a single composer, this one concentrates on songs from the current Broadway hit musicals A Chorus Line, Godspell, Pippin, and The Magic Show, the former written by Marvin Hamlisch, the latter three by Steven Schwartz.

The Williams Cabaret, which has performed earlier this year at the Williams Inn, features Martha Williamson, Gwen Nichols, Joe Trimboli, and Skip Adams with Peter Gloo at the piano and Doug Gernert on drums.

Adams commented that the informal setting of the Log is conducive to the Cabaret's music and style, and the show will be "an hour of entertaining song and dance."

Contest lauds poets

Poems are now being accepted for the annual Academy of American Poets Contest. The competition this year at Williams will be judged by Gregory Orr, author of two collections of poetry, Burning the Empty Nests (1973) and Gathering the Bones Together (1975). Orr, who teaches at the University of Virginia, will be at Williams April 25 to give a reading of his work.

A prize of $100 will be awarded to the best poem or group of poems written by a student. Manuscripts should be submitted to Dene Lane in the English Department Office. The deadline is April 7. Contestants should limit their submissions to no more than five poems. Additional details concerning the contest are available in the English Department Office.

A winner (or winners, if there should be a tie) and two or three Honorable Mentions will be chosen, and will be invited to participate in a joint reading sponsored by the English Department on Monday afternoon, May 2.

In the past, the Williams winner had been announced at commencement and the deadline for entries was May 1. This year, the contest deadline and the announcement are earlier thereby giving the winner more recognition. Williams is one of 82 colleges chosen by the Academy to sponsor the contest.

Poetry Reading

There will be a poetry reading by Lawrence Raab of the Department of English Thursday at 8:00 p.m. in 3 Griffin. Raab, a native of Pittsfield, is the author of two books of poems, Mysteries of the Horizon and The Collector of Cold Weather. His awards include a Book-of-the-Month Club Fellowship, a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, and the Robert Frost Fellowship from the Bread Loaf Writers' Conference. For the three years before coming to Williams he held a fellowship from the University of Michigan Society of Fellows. The poet Donald Justice has said that Raab's style "is sure and unwavering, and his lines, in their flowing relaxations, suggest the music of good expansive talk."

Fremery gives concert

Phillip De Fremery, classical guitarist, will perform this Friday at 8:30 p.m. in Jesup Hall auditorium as part of the Thompson Concert scenes sponsored by the Department of Music. Admission is free.

The program will be John Dowland's Forlorne Hope Fancy, Francesco da Milano's Fantasia, J. S. Bach's Chaconne, Jean Philippe Rameau's Two Minuets, Francisco Tarrega's Prelude No. 2 and No. 5 and Marieta, Heitor Villa-Lobos' Etude No. 11 and No. 1 and Prelude No. 4, and Manuel de falla's The Miller's Dance.

Free guitar recital

Phillip De Fremery, classical guitarist, will give a free public recital Friday at 8:30 p.m. in Jesup Hall auditorium.

Teacher of numerous master classes, de Fremery is currently instructor of guitar at the five colleges in the Connecticut Valley, Mount Holyoke, Smith, Amherst, Hampshire, and the University of Massachusetts, Amherst.

owdoin, Colby slap skaters

he Sioux should have been so kind uster. Thoughts perhaps lingering the mind of Williams hockey ntor Bill McCormick following the ekend's back-to-back losses to wdoin (10-3) and Colby (4-3). The werful Polar Bears pillaged and ndered Chapman rink to the tune of r first period goals, while the proving Mules scrapped from ind to net the game-winner with t over two minutes remaining.

he Ephs thus drop to 8-8 on the ason, including a 4-8 slate in vision II. The two weekend losses tually eliminated the Ephs from st-season consideration, barring a fect finish.

he haughty Bowdoin squad olled into Williamstown with two aight division II crowns in their cket and a sparkling 7-1 slate for 6-77. The invaders from the North ickly showed Williams why. wdoin scored first at 10:16 of the t period, and crammed three goals into six minutes against Chuck Cremens. Bowdoin outshot Williams, 22-7 in the opening period and 51-20 on the game as goalie Mark Menzies was seldom tested.

Williams pulled to within 4-1 on junior Barney Walsh's first goal following a long absence, but Bowdoin later took leads of 8-1 and 9-2. Other Williams goals were netted by senior Brian Norris and junior Pete Elkind, both in the fourth period.

In Colby, Williams faced a squad which was attempting an upgrading of its schedule which was to take several years under veteran coach Jack Kelly. If the type of guttiness which the Mules showed Saturday afternoon in coming from two goals back is any indication, the playoffs are not far off.

Williams came out flying early, and grabbed a 1-0 lead on Rick Zeller's goal which beat most of the late-arriving basketball fans to the net. Geoff Daley scored some six minutes later to give the Ephs a two-goal cushion.

At 15:23, the visitors moved within one goal following a scramble in front of Ed Weiss, but Jim Hield's deflection two minutes later returned the two-goal margin to the Purple.

A pair of Colby breakaways, resulting in fine goals, evened the count at 3-3 early in the final period. Despite a third period dominated by the Ephs, Colby managed to sneak out a winner, as defenseman Larry Sparks swiped a Williams clearing pass and netted the game winner at 17:44. And the worst is yet to come, as the Ephmen travel to the lion's den (Achilles Rink) in Schenectady, N.Y. to face the powerful Union Dutchmen.

Game time is 8 p.m. tomorrow.

le frosh Tom Beckett went his test 100 yards of the year at 50.1. he crucial difference in the race eared to be in the pick-ups: the remely well-drilled Chiefs made ir exchanges ever so slightly faster n the cautious Eph foursome. he Ephs did a super job in bringing own to the last event against last r's number two team in New gland and number five finisher in NCAA Division II meet. Things n't looked very promising earlier the afternoon when the Maroons raced to a 23-11 lead with wins in h of the first four events. Only 2-3 shes in the 1000 and 50 and licke's split in the 200 kept things n getting too lopsided.

he Purple came back behind Todd er's team high seventh individual nt win of the year in the 200 yard individual medley and Peter Howd's second consecutive runner-up performance in that event. Jeff Erickson and Dave Thomson put the Ephs on top, 27-25, with a one-two sweep of the next event, the required diving.

Hoelzer and Piper salvaged a 2-3 in the 200 butterfly before Wild's 100 free win, but Springfield retrieved the lead for good with a sweep of the 200 backstroke.

Then came the event that kept Williams in the meet until the free relay, the 500 freestyle. Stuart Deans swam a strategically beautiful race, hanging back early, grabbing the lead after 400 yards and holding off the dreaded kick of triple event New England champ Mike McCombs. McCombs, already a victor in the 1000 and 200 fly, finished second with senior Duff Anderson half a second behind.

Skiers ready for Dartmouth winter carnival

The varsity ski team, in preparation for the upcoming carnival circuit against Division I NCAA Champions Dartmouth, and top ten teams Middlebury and UVM, has been involved in a series of races during winter study.

Competing in the tough Eastern Ski Association Cup Race at Waterville Valley N.H., Williams skier Andy Mikell placed tenth in a race which included US ski team members. Eph's Don Tarinelli and Roger Prevot also had good showings for the squad, placing sixteenth and twentieth earlier this month.

In Tri-State action, team co-captain Chris Welsh tucked his way to two second place finishes at Jiminy Peak.

The women's alpine contingent, led by Marty Epstein looked good this past weekend at the Plymouth State College carnival, although the team has not been competing in ESA races.

The Nordic team has also been busy, traveling to Salisbury, Connecticut where Scott Berry placed second in Class B competition. Berry, placing sixth earlier in January at Middlebury, shows signs of improvement as do teammates Will Schmidt, Tom Dodds, and Andy Kelly.

The cross country team, led by Ann Waters and Jeff Magoon, have met the stiffest competition of any team. After racing in the Dannon Yogurt Invitational Series, the squad took part in the Hanover Night Races with Waters and Rachel Potter grabbing eighth and tenth respectively. In the men's division, co-captain Gary James, returning to action after having broken his arm, finished sixteenth, trailed by Magoon in twentieth.

The ski team traveled to the St. Lawrence Carnival January 21 and 22 finishing well, as Schmidt grabbed seventh in cross country competition, Wally Chambers in seventeenth.

The two-mile runners continued their tradition of being the scoring hot spot of the Williams attack by chalking up a fat nine point bulge. The distance duo of Joe Kolb and Frank Carr lowered Dick Farley's blood pressure with first and second place performances in the event. Kolb strided to a relatively slow 9:36.5 followed by Carr's 9:45.7, while Steve Polasky, after returning from a WSP in Michigan, cranked out a time of 10:02 for the no. 4 position. Dave Seeger then sealed the Williams victory with a tactical 2:22.5 first place performance in the 1000 yard run.

In the final event of the afternoon, four Ephmen gave a mini-course to their rivals entitled "How to Blow Doors in the 1977 Little Three plus One". Co-captain Dave Bass took care of the lead off duties for the mile relay quartet and handed off to Paul Untch with a lead over the traditional trio. Untch held on to the margin and gave the stick to O'Reilly who stretched the lead into a mammoth expanse of green tartan. The comfortable margin over the second place Amherst quartet was then given to White who added his own personal version of a quarter mile anchor leg and crossed the finish line in first with a 3:34.9 team clocking.

Williams closes out the dual meet season next Saturday when it hosts Westfield, Worcester and Fitchburg.

Hoopsters top Bowdoin, Colby; up record to 8-6

by Andy O'Donnell

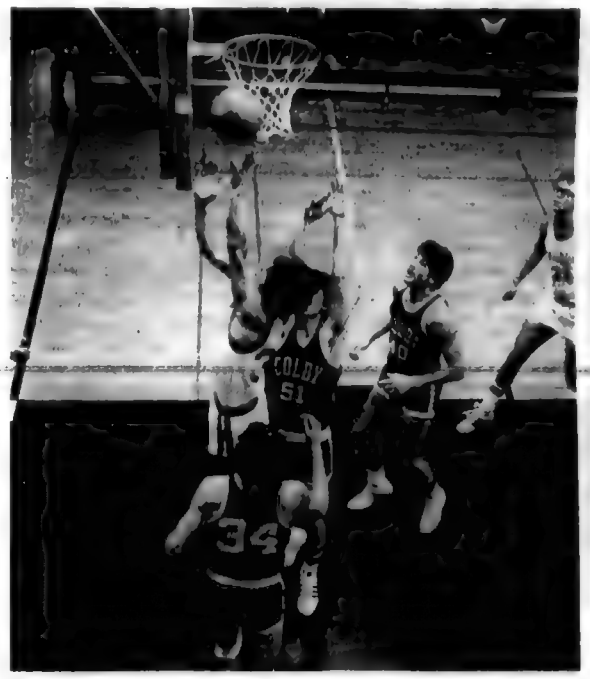
Their record now stands at 8-6, the best it has been in over a year. And for the second time this season they've put together a three game win streak. But the good news ends there, for it's going to take a much better effort than was displayed this past weekend if the varsity basketball team is going to have any sort of success in a murderous six game stretch that begins tonight in Troy against R.P.I.

Playing just well enough to win in each instance, the Ephs came from behind in the second half Friday night to tip a well-coached Bowdoin five 67-63 and then eased past Colby 79-67 fourteen hours later.

Both games were marked by a lethargic Williams offense and an uninspired defense which allowed two teams that should have been run out of Lasell to remain in the contests well into the second halves until the crowd finally got the Ephs sufficiently fired up to deliver the death blow.

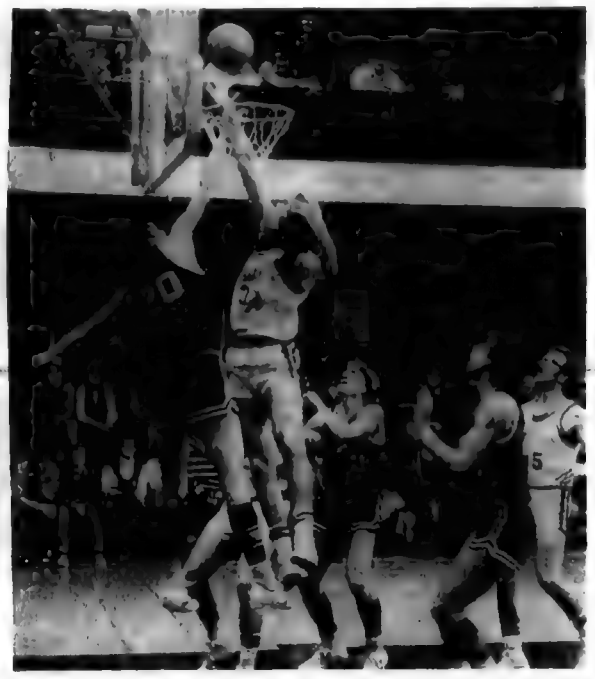
Against Bowdoin, for example, the Ephs drifted through a first half that saw the score tied eleven times before a Brad Wolk tip-in sent Williams into the locker room with a slim 34-32 lead.

The Polar Bears quickly asserted themselves as the second half began, running off ten straight points to take a 47-38 lead and then controlling matters through most of the half until Williams decided to get serious with 8:33 remaining and Bowdoin ahead 55-49.



With four different players scoring, the Ephs ran off ten straight points to finally forge into the lead, 59-55. Gregg Fasulo responded with a pair of hoops for Bowdoin, however, and it was up to Matt Spangler to alertly pick up a loose ball underneath and put the Ephs into the lead for good. Mike Tanner and Gerry Kelly then wrapped things up for the Ephs with some clutch free throw shooting in the final two minutes.

Kelly and Spangler led the Ephs with 15 points apiece, followed by Tanner with 14. Bill Whelan chipped in with 9 in a strong first half effort.



The script was almost the same against Colby the following afternoon as the Ephs again had trouble getting their engines started in the first half. Tom Balderston was the lone exception to the rule, coming off the bench midway through the half to pour in 14 points and give the Ephs a 34-28 halftime lead.

Balderston continued his outstanding play in the second half, combining with Tanner and Spangler to ignite a 13-2 explosion that put the Ephs in the driver's seat for good, 57-42, with 9:23 remaining. Balderston finished with a season high 22 points, while Kelly added 15, Tanner 14, and Spangler 13.

Following tonight's game the Ephs travel to Waltham Saturday night to battle Brandeis, perhaps New England's top Division III team at the moment.

Two Ephs a leaping spelled trouble for the visitors from Maine this Weekend. Tom Balderston netted 22 against the Colby Mules, while Bard Wolk rebounded and tipped-in shots effectively against the Bowdoin Polar Bears. (photos by C. Read, Gledhill)

Racketmen smash Bowdoin, MIT

by Evan Bash

In just one trip to M.I.T. Saturday the varsity squash team came away with two wins and, no, those figures are not part of some "new" math the men at M.I.T. have come up with. The Ephmen doubled their fun by way of sweeping a triangular match in which they routed both Bowdoin and M.I.T. by identical 9-0 scores in the space of only 3 hours.

By averting a letdown in the wake of their strong showings a week ago, Coach Dave Johnson's squad raised their record to a lofty 8-3 mark. Williams played steady, although not outstanding, squash to propel themselves into the final part of what may end up being their finest season in years.

In the first match of the day the Ephs were pitted against Bowdoin, a team with only one man back from last year. The Polar Bears were strictly out of their environment on the stuffy, 60 degree M.I.T. courts and were easily taken advantage of as Williams dropped but one game in the match.

Captain Marc Reinhardt showed no ill-effects from a muscle pull he suffered last week as he and no. 2 Arnie Cogswell each breezed through three game wins. Chip Lindquist won easily after last week's close losses and Athlete of the Week Martin Goldberg showed them why with another strong outing. Also playing well and winning in three was no. 5 Pete Thayer, who moved up two spots on the Eph ladder from last week.

Jim Little rebounded from his recent slump with a victory in four games. Tim Belk at no. 7 and Charlie Haines at no. 8 both breezed through their opposition while Jim Parsons saw his first action of the year at no. 9 and proved the depth of the Eph squad with an easy three game win.

Not even the finest engineers at M.I.T. could have developed a plan to keep Williams from victory. The Ephs were now well adjusted to their host's hot courts and the young M.I.T. team wilted under Williams' continued pressure.

Reinhardt and Lindquist proved unbeatable again as each swept in three easy games. Facing somewhat stiffer competition, both Cogswell and Goldberg surrendered a game en route to their seemingly inevitable victories. Thayer had no trouble concluding his second rout and Little finished off his man in three games this time around.

Neither Belk nor Haines wanted to be outdone by the other as each scored in three games. Parsons concluded the trouncing by winning in four.

by Nancy Rhein

Psyched up and ready to repeat Thursday night's 81-55 pounding of Smith, the Williams women's basketball team took over Lasell prime time Saturday with visions of grabbing one of those Ivy League upsets that only occur in the "cozy confines". But the dream soon turned to a nightmare as Radcliffe's superior outside shooting and effective man to man defense paced the Cliffies or Crimsonettes to a 76-58 victory over the Ephs.

Although Radcliffe led throughout the contest, the Ephs made it clear that this game was not going to be a repeat of last year's 60-29 blow-out, as they came within four points midway through the game.

The squad, on the strength of Leslie Milne, Maggie O'Brien, and Lisa Capaldini showed real hustle, but turnovers and missed lay-ups cost the team the game.

Moving to an early lead, the visitors went ahead 20-9 keeping up the pace throughout the period. Williams, in zone, forced Radcliffe to go to the outside, a situation which they used to their benefit, as Radcliffe's freshman New Mexican duo kept pumping them in.

Down 32-15 at 5:38 coach Sue Hudson sent in sophomore Louise Van Dyck, still shining following an 11 point performance against Smith, to Van Dyck, hitting 3 for 3 got the team rolling and with Wilson and Milne, brought the score to 38-32 at the half.

The momentum continued into the early going of the second half, as Capaldini successfully shot the long one to bring the Ephs within four at 16:14. But four was the closest the Ephs would get, as Radcliffe put on more pressure in their man to man, forcing Williams turnovers.

Although Hudson attempted to settle down the squad by sending in frosh Jeannie Weeks and captain Robin Ellett, it was too late for the team, behind now by 16 points. Hudson again tried for the inspiration of Van Dyck, who could only manage to hit the last shot to finish the contest 76-58.

Hot outside shooter Capaldini played well for the Ephs grabbing 15 points and 14 rebounds to lead the squad in both categories. O'Brien had 10 rebounds and 14 points while Milne added the last big chunk with 12.

The sloppy plays and mistakes which cost the team Saturday's victory were nowhere to be seen Thursday night as the Ephs crushed Smith 81-55. This time it was O'Brien who couldn't miss from the outside, or from the inside for that matter, going for 22 points.

Hitting the road tomorrow, the squad, now 4-3 will meet Vassar and then travel to Dartmouth Saturday.

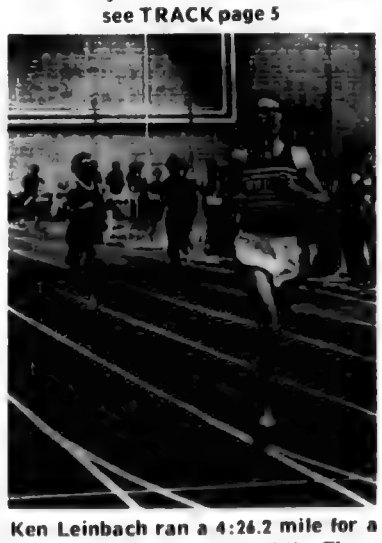
Eph runners win Little 3 title

by Frank Carr

In a close race for the Little Three title, the Williams trackmen pulled out victories in the final four events to defeat Amherst by a ten point margin. The Ephs retained the conference crown with a 59 point total, followed closely by the Lord Jeffs with 49, while Trinity scored 21 points and Wesleyan rounded out the Little Three plus One with a skimpy 12 point effort.



Amherst grabbed the early lead in the contest, taking 1-2 in the long jump with Greg McAleenan netting two points in third place. The Ephmen bounced right back in the 35 lb. weight throw, racking up 8 big ones to tie the score at 10. Larry "Mongo" Tanner easily took first place honors in the event as he broke his own college record in launching the weight on a 53' 1" journey. Rich Remmer added three more points to Tanner's victory, finishing second with a 45' ½" toss.

The Jeffs then constructed a five point lead during the next two events going 1-2 in the pole vault and adding a fourth in the triple jump. Sophomore Mark Eckert followed the updraft of the Amherst duo placing third in the vault, while freshman Jamie Rouse dented the sand pit at 40' 1¾" for third place in the triple jump. Once again the weight crew kept Williams in the meet as Remmer and Jim DeSimone netted first and fourth in the shot put to give coach Dick Farley a not-really-very-comfortable one point lead. Rouse and McAleenan kept the slim lead intact by closing out the purple field event scoring with third and fourth respectively in the high jump.

The running events started off with freshman Mike Behrman leading the mile field through a 62 second opening quarter, while co-captain Ken Leinbach cruised safely in the pack. Leinbach fought off a cold and kicked in the last three laps to break the tape at 4:26.2. Behrman felt the effects of the swift early pace and eased into fourth with a 4:42 clocking. Fellow co-captain Dave Bass added three more points to the Eph cause as he streaked across 60 yards of tartan in 6.7 seconds for the runner-up spot. In the next event, the 600 yd. run, Amherst runners snuck into second and third place as Terry O'Reilly followed in fourth with a 1:17.3 clocking. At this juncture in the contest, Uncle Ephraim's "sons of illegitimate birth" were back in the lead by two points with only four events left on the bill.

Then, out of the far corner of Towne Fieldhouse, junior Ron White came to the rescue. The tall and graceful hurdler showed the crowd why he is tied for second in the New England rankings by high-stepping the barriers in 7.5 seconds for his third victory of the season. Tom Selden added 2 more points with a third place performance giving the lead back to his teammates and putting the score at Williams 40, Amherst 38, Wesleyan and Trinity: too far out of it to make

by Dennis O'Shea

It took a pool record effort to do it, but Springfield anchorman Jeff Germain and his Maroon relaymates held off Phil Wild and a hungry 400 freestyle relay quartet to smoke the Williams' natators chances for a second home pool upset of the Chiefs in three years.

Germain held on to just about an angstrom's worth of a nearly body length long lead his colleagues had whipped up before Wild went to work, but a micron's as good as a mile when it comes down to those seven points in the final relay. Springfield took it, and Coach Red Silvia's charges slipped back downstate with the slimmest of wins, 62-51.

If meets were decided by time differences rather than points, meet referee Bob Muir would have needed a top of the line Omega system, a Hewlitt-Packard calculator and a couple of high-powered actuaries to unravel this one. First, second and third places in the 50 freestyle, one of the great synchronized swimming events since Esther Williams, were all timed at 22.5. Germain punched in a 49.7 equal to Wild's winning time in the 100, and Dave Amlicke trailed Germain by only a tenth in the 200 free.

Both sprint relays were clocked at six-tenths faster than U.Conn's 3:18.4 pool standard time, a drop of over two seconds for the Ephmen from their previous best at Hamilton last month. The swim puts the Williams relay fourth in the New England rankings behind Maine, Southern and a previous Springfield time. Three Ephs, Wild, Amlicke and Guy Hoelzer, posted sub-50 second splits

VOL. 90, NO. 34 — WILLIAMS COLLEGE — FEBRUARY 11, 1977

Council allocates $750 to WHEW

The College Council allocated $565 to WHEW Tuesday night, and passed a resolution requesting that President John Chandler eat at a major campus dining hall at least once a week.

Council Vice-President Randy Sturges discussed balloting procedures for the referendum on the proposed constitution, to be held February 16. Copies of the constitution are currently posted in all residential houses and freshman entries. Sturges also mentioned that the Elections Committee would begin its publicity drive for the March all-college elections immediately after it obtains the results of the referendum.

Treasurer Clarence Otis explained that WHEW funding is contingent upon matching contributions from residential houses, including a proposed $250 from the Freshman Council, which would entail a donation of 50 cents from each freshman. Mark Lanier announced that the Freshman Council would decide tonight.

According to Otis, WHEW will use the $565 to sponsor all-college activities at the Winter Carnival and other major functions. The council has already granted WHEW $200 for non-alcoholic expenses at Winter Carnival. The Council's constitution stipulates that no council appropriation may be used for the purchase of alcoholic beverages.

Council members favored overwhelmingly Don Toumey's resolution to request that Chandler eat with students at a major dining hall at least once a week. In addition to increasing Chandler's contact with the student body, Toumey said, it would allow him to "get an idea of how the food service is run."

Inclusion discussed

Fewer to live off campus

by Stu Massad

The Student Housing Committee discussed Williams Health, Education and Welfare (WHEW), freshman inclusion and time limits for open parties at Monday night's meeting.

Dan Felizberto, President of WHEW, presented plans for funding WHEW, which he said is now approved by the Finance Committee for $750, subject to approval by the council. (The CC approved the Finance Committee's recommendation for the full funding on Tuesday night.) He announced that his funding goal for this year is $1,500, although he said he expects to reduce that next year. Some $550 of this would be assessed each house at a rate of 50 cents per dues-paying member.

He also described his plans for WHEW this year, proposing to organize five all-College mixers for each housing group this spring, as well as presenting activities over Winter Carnival and Spring Weekend. WHEW would use its entire treasury to fund each mixer, guaranteeing to refund money contributed by houses and hoping to make a profit.

While the committee discussed freshman inclusion and transfer, some houses asked to have inequities in the ratios of men and women and of the different classes eliminated by selecting freshmen and transferring students. Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad remarked that although priorities can be set up in the random selection process to do this, he thought that using priorities would violate the recommendations of the Committee on Undergraduate Life to keep the housing process random.

Roosenraad stated that the number of students allowed to live off campus next year might be limited to only "75 to 100," in contrast to approximately 140 this year. He and Charles Jankey, director of student housing, cited overhead costs and the need to open "close to full" as limiting factors.

The fate of Woodbridge and Keck houses, two former faculty residences, was referred to a subcommittee. The subcommittee of Joe Kolb, Frank Carr, Bronson Fargo and Glenn Shannon will consider rearrangement of house assignments in the housing groups, made possible by the introduction of Woodbridge and Keck to the housing system.

Woodbridge House probably will take Garfield residents next spring while that house is being renovated. The number of Garfield residents next year should be close to the 13 that Woodbridge can hold, so the house should not be broken up. The subcommittee will discuss how to house these students in the fall, while Garfield is still open.

Roosenraad noted that according to the College's attorney, there may be time restrictions on open parties under the state's Alcoholic Beverage Control Act. Williams residential houses do not fall under any of the classifications in the act, Roosenraad said, and stated that the attorney is trying to determine their status.

Parties held in commons areas—outdoors, in dining halls and between houses and entries—probably have time limitations, according to Roosenraad. He emphasized that private parties in rooms and suites are not limited.

Committee members said that limiting the 50-cent assessment for WHEW to dues-paying house members would decrease revenue by $300 to $400 under revenue acquired by assessing the house 50 cents for each house affiliate. The committee postponed any decision on funding WHEW until next week to allow members to consult their houses.

Redford to receive degree

The Record learned from numerous members of the Honorary Degree committee that actor Robert Redford has been asked to come to Williams to receive an honorary doctorate of humane letters. Recipients are required to attend the June commencement in order to receive their degree.

A representative from Redford's New York press office told the North Adams Transcript that though the actor's schedule could not be confirmed this far in advance, that he would attend commencement and accept the degree.

The College will award the L.H.D. degree in recognition of Redford's "distinctive contributions to American life and culture as an actor and active proponent of environmental concerns," said the spokesman.

College officials have been reluctant to speak of the choice. As a woman in the President's office said, "I cannot confirm or deny the fact. I can tell you we have not received word whether he is coming." She added that the College will not reveal the names of honorary degree recipients until "a few weeks before commencement."

When asked to confirm the decision, President John Chandler laughed and said, "It is the practice of the College not to discuss honorary degrees" before the official announcement is made. "Once one begins to discuss one recipient," he added, other such discussions would inevitably follow.

Robert Redford

Redford's press agent, Lois Smith was not available for comment, although the agency's secretary was apparently familiar with the arrangements.

Redford has starred in several films, including All the President's Men, The Sting, and Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid. Redford is also an active environmentalist, serving as a director of the Environmental Defense Fund, Natural Resources Defense Council, and the National Wildlife Federation.

Subcommittee hopes to revive glass recycling

The subcommittee of the Committee on the Campus Environment concerned with the College's participation in the newspaper recycling drive has drawn up plans to involve Williams in an attempt to recycle bottles and other glass.

The general success of the newspaper recycling program has led Bryne Kelley and others to attempt to establish a viable program for glass collection. They are presently cleaning six sheds for the purpose. Julie O'Leary, another member of the subcommittee, will co-ordinate the collection with Williamstown officials and the town conservation commission.

"We began to clean the sheds during winter study," Kelley said, "but the project came to a halt when our volunteers became involved in other activities. The actual program is probably at a standstill until the second semester gets in full swing and people find the time to help."

The drive will be a campus-wide campaign. According to Malinda Bergamini, another member of the committee and director of the freshman participation in the newspaper recycling program, Kelley will design a logo for several permanent posters which will be displayed in all the residential houses.

Ralph Iacuessa, General Foreman of the College's physical plant, commented on the success of the newspaper collection. "So far we have heard no complaints from the town. Everything seems to be going extremely well."

The College Council will conduct a referendum on the proposed new constitution Wednesday, February 16, according to council vice-president Randy Sturges. Ballots will be placed in student mailboxes Wednesday morning, and should be returned to the ballot box outside the mailroom between 10 a.m. and 1 p.m. or between 5 p.m. and 7 p.m. that same day. The Record will publish the entire constitution in the Tuesday, February 15, issue. Copies of the constitution are posted in all residential houses and freshman entries.

Alumni Fund exceeds goal of $1.1 million

The Alumni Fund reached a total of $1,111,897 this year, according to Director of Annual Giving James R. Briggs '60, a new college record. This year's total is $11,000 over the goal of $1.1 million, and $89,000 over last year's amount.

The Fund, given by alumni, parents, friends of the College, and corporate matching funds was collected in a four-month campaign ending January 31. It will pay 10 per cent of the College's operating expenses, and 10 per cent of the costs of financial aid, said Briggs.

More than 58 per cent of all living alumni contributed to the fund, he added, the highest percentage ever, and "possibly the best participation of any college in the country." Eighty-eight per cent of the class of 1932 participated, more than any other class. The class of 1976, however, set a new record for a recent graduating class, with 56.96 per cent.

The Parents' Fund, collected from parents of undergraduates and alumni who did not themselves attend Williams, totalled $95,989, short of the goal of ten per cent of the entire Alumni Fund, but still a college record.

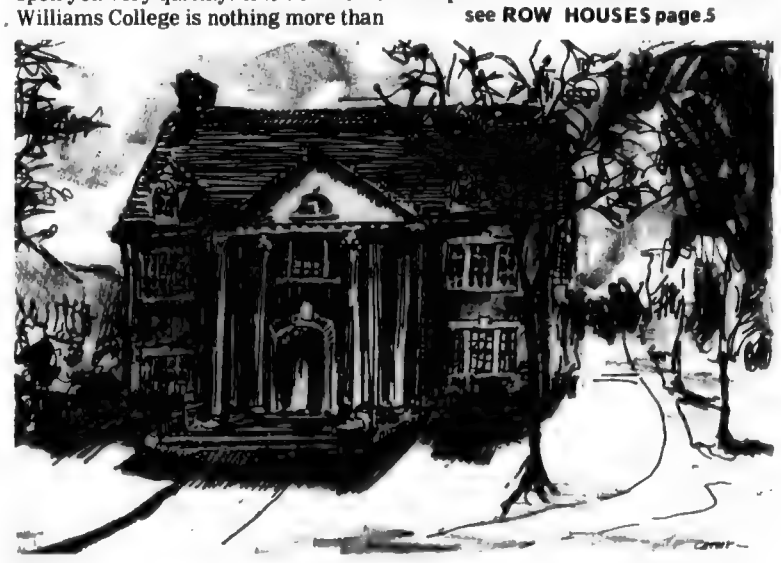
The class of 1942 contributed the highest total, $64,610, of which half was given by one member of the class who matched the gifts of the remainder of the class.

Freshman Inclusion

Row houses radiate homey aura

This is the second of a series of five articles which will focus on each housing category open to freshmen in the inclusion process. Last week the RECORD ran a feature on Mission Park.

by Andy O'Donnell



If you are a freshman and find that you've never been in a row house, don't worry—not many upperclassmen have either. In fact, perhaps the most frequent comment voiced by upperclassmen arriving at a row house party is an extreme incredibility at the luxuriousness of the surroundings. "If I had only known these places were this nice when I was a freshman," the ditty usually goes, "why, you can bet that I would have gone row house first choice."

In order to avoid the mistakes of your less than learned elders, then, don't rely on your roommate's girlfriend's description of a former boyfriend's spread over in Agard or solely on propaganda such as this article—take advantage of the touring schedule set up by the Housing Committee on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings and find out firsthand what these beloved brick bastions are all about.

What you'll discover, with apologies to Dodd and Tyler Houses, is the most comfortable, the most diverse, and the most opulent living accommodations available on campus couched in an atmosphere that's extremely homey and which tends to spoil you very quickly. If it's true that Williams College is nothing more than an overgrown country club, then the row houses are its club houses.

Under this year's inclusion set-up, four houses fall under the row house aegis: Perry-Bascom, Garfield-Wood, Spencer-Brooks and Fort Hoosac. With the exception of the Fort, all are located in the western part of the campus in the same area as the

Gallery: Chapter Two

Gallery: Chapter Two

They all laughed when David Ross sat down at the typewriter five months ago. "You're really not going to write that article, are you?" they asked somewhat incredulously. "After all, just how important is a byline to you?"

Ah, but David knew what he was doing and early this week he received his just rewards—he finally made it into Gallery magazine.

Now Gallery is not one of your high class skin magazines, as we explained in some detail the last time we touched upon this affair. On the porn rack in the News Room on Spring Street, for example, it's usually tucked away on the upper shelf along with some of the more tasteless slick offerings. Only Playboy, Penthouse, Oui, and Hustler rate the bottom shelf.

"I'd imagine we sell 8 or 10 each of the top shelf ones in the course of a month," estimated Bill at the News Room the other afternoon. "We usually go through 150-200 of the bottom shelf magazines, though. Hustler sells like hotcakes. We usually can't keep enough in stock."

Now if porn can sell that well in Williamstown at $1.50 to $2.00 a shot, you can imagine the business it pulls in at the Harvard Square newstand. There's many a buck to be made in this business, and with Hustler publisher Larry Flynt currently being fitted for pinstripes and work pants, there's an opening in the market to capitalize on.

Therefore, while David helped Gallery acquire some socially redeeming value, I shelled out $1.75 in an attempt to find out what the devil he'd gotten himself into. I'll leave the judgment to you.

Gallery comes encased in a white wrapper that you have to break through in order to get to the table of contents. Symbolic, I guess, but a nuisance. The front cover is incredibly unappealing: a hazy picture of a Latin American nymphomaniac named Babette who "after today—after tonight", we learn, "will know it all."

In the neighborhood of Babette's right shoulder are four headlines proclaiming Gallery exclusives. "Learning the Ropes of Bondage" reads one. "This is the truth," it cautions, "though it may be stranger than any fiction."

"Topless Clubs: The Men Behind the Women" reads another offering, but my favorite was "Exclusive Interview: The World's Biggest Cocaine Dealer."

"Breakfast was coffee, cigarettes, and a snort of cocaine," the story began. "After (Zachary) Snow poured a second cup of coffee, lit his fifth cigarette of the morning, assumed a comfortable position in an overstuffed chair, and said "Shoot", the interview began." Wow.

Few other stories could match this one, but a couple came close. This month's winner of the amateur "Girl Next Door" photo contest, for instance, was Nancy K., a 19 year old model from High Ridge, Missouri who's secret desire is "to make a stag film with my husband".

Then there was a review of Lou Reed's new album that began like this: "Lou Reed stares at you from the cover of this album, an ominous presence, a threatening, decadent thug with an intelligence sharp as a switchblade knife, pointed as an addict's hypodermic needle . . . His arty, minimalist brand of rock has acquired an almost demonic impetus, intimitating that anyone—yes, even you—might someday wind up hollow as 'Sister Ray', strung out on the deadly vitality of 'Heroin' . . ."

Finally, we have a piece entitled "The Pity of the Fight Game", written by Randy Neumann, formerly the sixth ranked American heavyweight boxer.

"People said things like 'Kid, you're crazy!' when they heard I was to take on the champ of the Garden State (Chuck Wepner)," Randy relates. "I kicked the shit out of Chuck that night and got the decision. He admitted that I beat him, but added that I didn't have to bite his ear in the process. His ear was bleeding, but I don't remember biting it. That doesn't mean that I definitely did not do it. Over the years I became a dirty fighter out of necessity. They did it to me first." We understand, Randy.

Where is David amidst all this literary splendor? Why, in the back of the magazine, flanked by an ad for a new, ribbed-head condom and an article on Irish Americans featuring Cardinal Terence J. Cooke. Symbolism, once again, I suppose.

Also writing are editors from Vanderbilt, Notre Dame, and Tulane. Each dutifully reports, as Gallery so succinctly puts it, that "among top status schools, selectivity does breed elitism". But if that sounds boring, don't worry. Next month's Gallery is a special issue devoted to "Sex in America Today." That is, as opposed to yesterday.

Letters: Praise, thanks, criticism

Mead Fund at work

To the editor:

In 1951 Williams College received a substantial gift from the Estate of George J. Mead. Mr. Mead expressed in his will an intention "that this gift shall be used to improve the quality of leadership and service in all branches of government, whether Federal, State or municipal, by encouraging young people of reliability, good sense and high purpose to enter with adequate preparation those fields of politics and constitutional government upon which must rest the future of this nation".

Last weekend's Careers in Public Policy seminars, conducted by the Washington Alumni Association, was an ideal example of Mr. Mead's intentions. The exchange between undergraduates and public servants which occurred can only serve to increase interest in public careers. Moreover, the enormous energy devoted to the weekend by the alumni and undergraduates, many of them participants in the Mead Summer Intern Program, underscores the serious commitment the Williams community has made to public service. The Mead Fund is proud to have cosponsored such an event.

Hap's thanks

To the editor:

I have always liked and backed Williams College, having been connected with it in one way or another for years, this includes all departments and students.

At this time, I would like to thank, one and all, for the concern and interest during my recent illness—visitations, phone calls, letters and cards. Especially I would pinpoint this note of gratitude to the students, (not knowing all the names) individuals and groups who took the time to stop at the hospital making a hard time a helluva lot easier to take.

Thanks,

Plagiarism clarified

To the editor:

Concerning the article appearing in the February 8 issue of The Williams Record entitled "Honor Committee defines plagiarism," there are two sentences which require correction and clarification. The Honor Committee is making an effort to inform the student body of the meanings and implications of the Statement of Academic Honesty adopted 1971 and found in the Student Handbook. As a result we will be meeting with Freshmen by entries on Wednesday and Thursday, February 16 and 17.

It is not necessary to receive permission from a professor to use one's own paper as a source, as stated in The Record. However, a student's own previous work, if used as a source must be acknowledged and a student must obtain permission of all instructors concerned before submitting substantially the same paper in more than one course.

If any students have any questions concerning the honor code, please feel free to contact me or any of the other members of the committee.

Thanks,
Donald Macdonald '77
Student Chairman, Honor Committee

Grammar crit

To the editor:

What is happening to the grammar of the Record's reporters and editors? In the article about WCFM in the February 8 issue a portion reads: ". . . and anyone from the college or community who wishes to express their opinion on any issue of concern can do so at that time." This is outlandish! And to make things worse it happened just a fortnight ago as well. In the article on the Robert Morris mirror piece at Clark Art Institute (Jan. 25) a passage reads in part: ". . . as the viewer moves through the real space of their own self-portrait . . ." It is ridiculous that a Williams College student should write such a bad piece of sixth grade grammar, but more unthinkable that an editor should miss it not once, but twice.

Since the Record staff seems not to understand simple rules of English, perhaps I can refresh you: When using a pronoun to replace a noun the pronoun must agree with the noun being replaced. For example, a singular pronoun is used for a singular noun, and a plural pronoun for a plural noun.

Democrats conduct food drive

The Williams ADA will sponsor a food drive in the Williamstown community on Saturday, February 12. Volunteers from the College will collect canned goods donated by local residents from 10-12 in the morning and 2-4 in the afternoon. The proceeds of the food drive will be donated to Western Massachusetts Labor Action to be placed in their Emergency Food Supply.

The February 12 food drive is being conducted to help restore WMLA food reserves, which are currently low. All students interested in working on the food drive may contact Cath Carpenter at 6387.

Lehman Council seeks volunteers

The Lehman Service Council seeks more volunteers for 12 of its programs, according to chairman Warren Pierce.

Pierce said the programs with a serious need for help are Psychiatric Services, conducted in Northampton, and the North Adams Helpline.

Other service council projects include Williamstown and Bennington Big Brother-Big Sister, Williamstown Boys' Club, Sweetbrook Nursing Home, Day Care Center, Berkshire Farm for Boys, Hydrotherapy, North Adams Tutoring, ABC Tutoring and North Adams Nursing home.

Interested students may contact the chairperson of each project directly or through the Lehman Service Council mail box (3205) before February 18.

Survey discloses campus attitudes

This article and the data presented here are the result of a RECORD survey conducted in December dealing with sex, drugs and politics at Williams. Thirty-eight per cent of the student body responded to the survey. The RECORD makes no pretensions about this being a statistically sound study or a definitive answer to the question "What's happening on campus." Nevertheless, we asked you and this is what you told us.

by John Rindlaub

It has been a lonely, cold winter. You are tired of the mixer routine, roadtripping, and the $30 phone call to a home town honey. You look out the window and sigh—it is snowing again and you have found Williams not to be the place for intimate companionship. Do not despair. You are of a 45 per cent minority of students who are unsatisfied with their sex lives, and although it is possible to spend four years at Williams without having sex, the odds are against it.

Thirty-two per cent of the 351 male respondents and 40 per cent of the 310 female respondents said they are still virgins. Williams is thus about 10 percentage points away from the sexual utopia that Playboy discovered on campuses nation-wide (26 per cent of the males and 26 per cent of the females still had more than their brains intact). A 55 per cent majority of the respondents, however, said they are satisfied with their sex lives, if not their G.P.A.'s.

The survey revealed that 85 per cent of the non-virgin male respondents and 80 per cent of the female respondents said they had sexual intercourse in December. These students are making it with their companions either in monogamous relationships (69 per cent of the women and 42 per cent of the men had a lifetime total of three or fewer partners) or through an active, casual sex life (33 per cent of the male non-virgins and 17 per cent of the women had six or more partners).

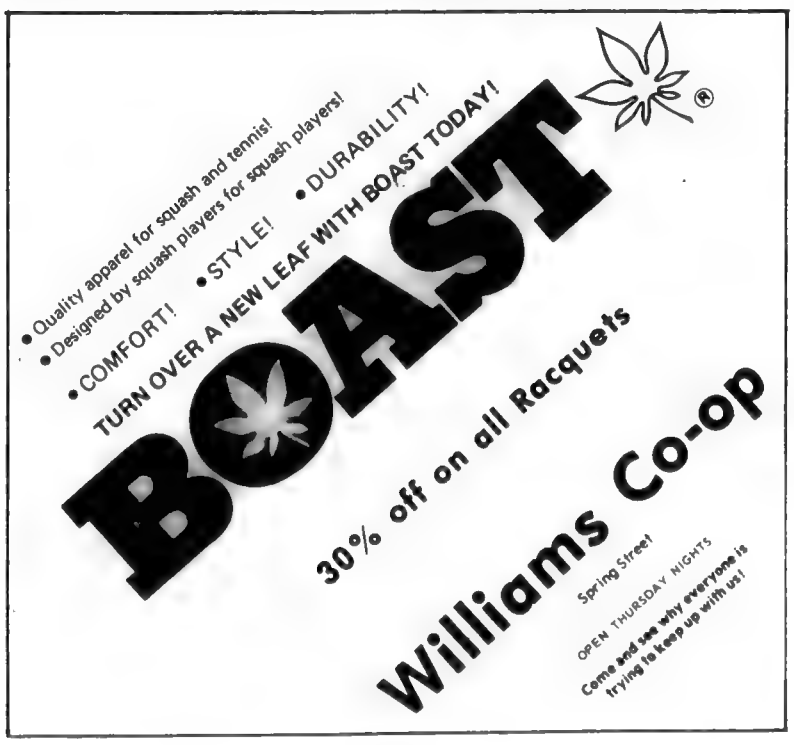
Sexual satisfaction was another area probed by the survey. Sixty-nine per cent of those students not presently dating expressed dissatisfaction with their sex lives. A full 79 per cent of male non-virgins not dating are dissatisfied (Jacqueline Susan must be right: Once is Not Enough). In contrast, 69 per cent of those dating several people were satisfied.

The majority of Williams non-virgins are monogamous—they do not sleep with more than one person a month. These numbers support the attitudes of the students. The vast majority of them and those nation-wide said they are willing to engage in intercourse before the honeymoon. Of women virgins, however, 30 per cent said they will wait until marriage.

A small percentage of students said they will make love at the drop of a book (The Joy of Sex?). Three per cent of the women and 5 per cent of the men would go to bed with a casual acquaintance (compared with 7 and 27 per cent nation-wide). The majority of men and women believe that love is sufficient grounds for sex.

Both sexes at Williams agree almost unanimously that women want sex as much as men. Williams students disagree with equal unanimity that "a woman should never take the lead in sexual activity." But why, if women are willing to lead, are there still so many virgins? According to Playboy, the double standard has come to an end. The Erotic Rights Amendment has been passed on campus—the women can and the men do not have to. Most Williams students wait until they find someone they like or love, and then they take care of each other.

Conservatives need not fear that doomsday is near as the moral fabric of society—and Williams—unwinds. A full 90 per cent disagree with the statement "I hope to have an open marriage which would include extra-marital sex." Across the nation, only 60 per cent of the college students disagreed.



The survey suggests that those who do have sex at Williams do so often. Forty-five per cent of the male respondents and 46 per cent of the women have sexual intercourse at least five times per month. As many as 18 per cent of the men and 21 per cent of the women boasted of an across-the-bed-performance of 13-to-24 times per month. A small group, 5 per cent of the men, claim to be real sexual athletes, boasting of 25 times per month. The women, with no one in this category, are more modest.

Alcohol, the Big A, is supposedly on the increase at Williams. The Committee on Undergraduate Life stated that alcoholism may be a serious problem (Record, Sept. 28). The survey found, however, that very few students drink daily. Most respondents drink once a week, and 15 per cent never drink. Men drink more than women. For example, 23 per cent of the men and only 12 per cent of the women drink 2 or more times per week.

Virgins have the highest percentage of teetotalers at Williams—37 per cent of the male and 63 per cent of the female virgins never drink or drink once in two weeks.

Marijuana does not even come close to bottle feeding in popularity. As many as 70 per cent of the women and 54 per cent of the men have never tried pot, far more than the nation-wide figures.

In general, the Record survey indicates that the equality of the sexes is not yet complete at Williams. Nevertheless, there is reason to be optimistic for the future. Admissions is almost sex-blind and most of the 36 per cent of the students who still have their virginity are going to lose to someday.

ACEC laments poor turnout for jazz

by Andy Clark & Paul Goren

Jazz music is one of the only true American art forms. Beginning with New Orleans ragtime, jazz quickly spread to the bandhalls and clubs of Kansas City, Chicago and New York. As it grew it diversified, and now encompasses musical styles ranging from Benny Goodman to Herbie Hancock. In the past few years, jazz has grown in popularity to the point where today it is beginning to challenge rock as the predominant musical form on the college campus. Record stores that ten years ago were primarily filled with rock and folk, now display substantial collections of jazz as well. Yet, as the recent jazz series has shown, the state of jazz at Williams has become uncertain.

Why did the jazz festival suffer in popularity? According to Jim Bowe, co-chairman of the All College Entertainment Committee (ACEC), the general level of interest in music at Williams is surprisingly low. "It's very hard to sell a concert here. People are reluctant to branch out of their own interests and take a chance on musicians they've never heard of."

Bowe explained that though the recent Lionel Hampton concert was an unqualified success as entertainment, it lacked something of the quality usually found in jazz music. On the other hand, Bowe admitted that the ACEC "probably made a mistake in getting Mingus." That show, which was considered musically sound, seemed inaccessible to the many who were less familiar with jazz.

His sentiments were echoed by Williams Jazz Organization member Ken Inchalik who emphasized the complexity of jazz. He pointed out that it "requires the listener's concentration. People want music to cook or study by, but not to concentrate on."

Even though the jazz series may not have been as successful as in past years, it is obvious that there is still stubstantial interest in jazz here at Williams. "The demand is here," commented Steve Robinson, leader of the Williams Jazz Organization Big Band. Robinson's group, along with the Williams College Jazz Ensemble, the ACEC jazz series, and WCFM, provide the major outlets for jazz on campus. Robinson claimed that the music department, except for an occasional Winter Study Program, has done very little in the area of jazz. "The interest is here and is significant," Robinson stated. "A one semester course in jazz appreciation could probably pack Chapin Hall."

Inchalik agreed that the effect of such a course could be "monumental," and Bowe too felt that "people would take that course," but acknowledged that it would probably have to be taught in conjunction with another department (American Civilization or Sociology for example). Bowe, Inchalik and Robinson all seemed convinced that a jazz appreciation-history course should be an integral part of the music curriculum.

According to music department chairman Irwin Shainman, however, it is "not as simple as it sounds. The question is not whether we want jazz or not, but what we want jazz instead of. We're interested, but we have a limited faculty." There are currently five full time professors in the music department, and Shainman believes that even if another was added, it is unlikely that the department would choose a jazz specialist. "In order to run any department, you've got to play the strengths of the particular faculty. Considering the amount of student interest, it doesn't make educational sense to use one sixth of our faculty for jazz." Shainman added, however, that an interdisciplinary course on jazz could conceivably be offered within the next two or three years.

The future of jazz at Williams clearly depends to a great extent on student involvement. If students demonstrate their interest in jazz by supporting the Jazz Organizations and attending the ACEC concerts, then jazz could become a permanent fixture at Williams.

Musical auditions to be held

Cap and Bells and the Williams College Department of Theatre will hold auditions this Sunday and Monday for the well known musical Guys and Dolls to be presented by the Williams College Theater at the Adams Memorial Theater this spring. The auditions are open to the public and will be held on the mainstage of the AMT.

Those interested should sign up at the AMT box office for audition times. The auditions themselves will be held on Sunday from 2 to 5 p.m. and 7 to 9 p.m. and Monday from 7 to 11 p.m. Jean-Bernard Bucky will direct the musical.

The production calls for a cast of 17 men and 12 women. While Bucky said that every role will be a singing one, he added that there are only a few parts which are difficult musically, and encouraged everyone to audition. Fred Penzel, the technical director of the AMT also noted that he welcomes anyone interested in any technical aspect of the production.

Responsibility for music lies with the Music Department. Irwin Shainman will conduct the full orchestra of students and faculty, while Stephen Dankner will assist as music advisor and pianist.

Cello-piano sonata premieres

Cellist Douglas Moore and pianist Paula Ennis will give a free public recital this Sunday at 8:30 p.m. in the Clark Art Institute auditorium. Featured works will be Bach's Suite No. 2 in D minor, Chopin's Sonata in G minor, Op. 65, and Foote's Sonata in E minor, Op. 78.

Highlight of the evening is the Arthur Foote work in its New England premiere and second world performance. The Sonata, edited by Moore, was written about 1913 by Foote, who was a well-known Boston composer of chamber music, songs, keyboard music, and orchestra works. Born in 1853, Foote studied at Harvard and was the first important American composer to receive his entire musical training in the United States. The Sonata was discovered in manuscript, and extensive editorial additions and corrections were necessary to assemble a performing edition. Moore played the world premiere in Washington, D.C. in October, 1976.

The Bach Suite for unaccompanied cello was written about 1720. For years it was considered primarily as a study work, but in the late 1800's Pablo Casals brought it to the attention of concert-goers as an important performance work.

The Sonata in G minor was Chopin's last completed work, written in 1846, just before his separation from George Sand. Although Chopin wrote little music for instruments other than the piano, he did compose several works for the cello, perhaps because his brother was an accomplished cellist.

Paula Ennis, a native of Idaho, is a graduate of Indiana University and expects her Doctor of Music degree from there this year. Her principal piano teacher is Menaheim Pressler. A member of the music faculty at S.U.N.Y.-Albany, she has performed extensively in the Albany-Troy-Schenectady area.

Douglas Moore is an Assistant Professor of Music at Williams College and is well-known as a performer in the area. He is a graduate of Indiana University, where he studied with Fritz Magg, among others, and has an M.M.from Catholic University, where he expects to receive his D.M.A. this year. He is cellist in The Williams Trio, as well as principal cellist in the Berkshire Symphony and the Albany Symphony Orchestra.

Students perform in Studio VI

Studio VI, one of a continuing series of student recitals sponsored by the Williams College Department of Music, will be this Tuesday, February 15, at 4:00 p.m., in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The free public concert had originally been scheduled in Chapin Hall.

Carol Beck '77, pianist, will play Hindemith's Sonata No. 2 (massig schnell and lebhart), and Olivia Garfield '80 will play Chopin's piano Nocturne in E flat Major. Jonathan Hammond '80, will play three clarinet solos by Stravinsky, and Carol Russell '79, flutist, accompanied by Cheryl Isaac '78, pianist, will perform a piece by Rameau.

Two string students, both accompanied by Peggy Duesenberry '80, will play: Melinda-Carol Ballou '79, has chosen Eccles' Viola Sonata, while Michele Hahn '80 has selected Beethoven's Romance in F for violin. Finally, a group of sixteen students under the direction of Tad Cavuoti '77, will sing Buxtehude's In Dulci Jubilo, accompanied on the organ by Cavuoti.

WCFG Presents Hitchcock's 'Shadow of a Doubt'

The WCFG presents Shadow of a Doubt Saturday in Bronfman with two showings at 7:30 and 9:30 p.m.

The film is about Charlie Cokley (Joseph Cotton) who comes to visit his family in Santa Rosa. They welcome him with open arms, but as the visit progresses his niece (Teresa Wright) begins to suspect that he is not so innocent and good as he would want them to believe. Throughout the film Hitchcock draws several parallels between the good niece and her questionable uncle, challenging our ability to distinguish good from evil. The film reaches its peak in an excruciatingly suspenseful train-ride. Of all the films that Hitchcock has made, this remains one of his favorites. Screenplay by Thorton Wilder.

Greylock quad and consequently share the same location advantages and disadvantages as that quad—i.e., they enjoy a proximity to the AMT and the Williams Inn but you'll have a bit of a hike to reach Hopkins and Griffin or the Log.

In addition to the male and female house propers, each row house has a number of smaller, satellite houses associated with it, such as Lambert, Keck, Dewey, Susie Hopkins, and Doughty. Although there is a great deal of diversity within each row house regarding both the number of satellites and their proximity to the house proper, in general they offer even better living accommodations than the house proper (especially for women) and are regularly the choice of many seniors.

Rooms in all of these houses feature real wood and substantial amounts of carpeting. In general, they vary from adequate—i.e. the size of a Greylock or Mission single—to practically palatial, with the majority falling into the latter category. Once again, there is great diversity from house to house: Spencer has some large suites as well as spacious singles, Perry has unique walk-through double system. Wood House offers the nicest singles in the prettiest house on campus, and the Fort and Agard have a wide assortment of singles with the characteristic row house features of slanted ceilings and odd shaped windows.

In order to qualify for a shot at one of these rooms as a junior or senior, however, you must pay a year's due in some of the poorer rooms in the houses or in that much maligned and much misunderstood creation called West College. And this brings us to the matter that has plagued every freshman considering row houses since the day they took the fraternity letters off the front door: where will I live sophomore year and what are my chances of getting into the house later on?

First, let's debunk a few myths that have cropped up in this area. To begin with, Currier Hall probably won't be housing row house overflow next year. And if you think West is a monstrosity, you should visit Currier, sample B & G's definition of renovation, and count your blessings.

Second, don't apply to Greylock or Mission with the intention of transferring to a row house later on: the transfer process is becoming increasingly strict and the choice you make in the next month will almost surely stick for three years.

Third, don't apply Greylock or Mission with the intention of breaking up your three years there with a stint in the quad as a JA: annually over 200 of you have the same idea and only 50 or so realize it.

"On the debit side of the ledger, row houses harbor a dangerous tendency towards isolation on the part of their members."

Fourth, there are several good points about West, not the least of which is the fact that it provides singles that start at the size of a Greylock or Mission room and work upwards. Furthermore, although living in West can't make up for the benefits of living in the house proper, the close knot atmosphere of row house living makes it imperative that you know your fellow house members well, particularly the ones in your class, and in that sense living almost solely with fellow sophomores in West for a year is a definite plus.

While some women end up in overflow housing, the overwhelming majority of women get into the houses as sophomores while the men must "suffer" for a year. Everything more than evens out when the men become seniors, however, and many senior men argue that they enjoyed the diversity of living somewhere else sophomore year.

In addition to attractive rooms, row houses have some of the most incredible "recreational" facilities on campus. The Perry House tube room is unparalleled on campus, as is the Perry House library, the Wood House dining room, the entire first floor of Spencer House, or the fireplace in the Agard living room. All of these are ornate yet very dignified as well and each lends a very distinct tone to the row house experience.

Because of the freedom and leeway afforded by such facilities (and also the cooks, which we'll get to momentarily), row houses have become the showplace for a wide variety of house parties, many of which have become individual house traditions over the years.

A homecoming at Perry House, for example, would not be Homecoming without that house's annual lobster dinner. Spring at the Fort would not be complete without their annual strawberry festival; fall in the Berkshires without Spencer-Brooks' apple hunt; April in Williamstown without Perry's annual Perrifest; football games without a GarWood post game cocktail party; and winter without a Spencer 3-D trivia contest.

More than anything else, however, the pulse of row house life is found in the dining rooms of each house and in the cooks that work there. For to a large extent, a row house's personality is a direct reflection of its cook's personality and a close relationship between individual house members and their cook is usually the norm.

Each row house has one dining room per complex. Perry House members eat in Perry, for example; Garfield members in Wood House; Fort Hoosac members in the Fort; and Spencer House members in Brooks House. Almost all of the meals are sit-down affairs with waiter service. Attendance is small—30 to 50 people—and a unique family atmosphere results. Row house food has a reputation as the best on campus (along with Dodd and Tyler) and row house cooks pride themselves in their ability to turn out special treats for house members.

"In addition to attractive rooms, row houses have some of the most incredible 'recreational' facilities on campus."

Because of the intimate dining room set-up, however, newly included freshmen often experience a difficult adjustment problem in the fall of their sophomore year. As you'll quickly realize, everyone in the house already knows each other while sophomores only know the kids they entered the inclusion process with and perhaps a few of the other sophomores in the house. To make it worse, you don't have 300 people to choose from as your dining partners as in Greylock.

On the debit side of the ledger, row houses harbor a dangerous tendency towards isolation on the part of their members. Houses can become too ingrown and you must constantly be cognizant of the fact that as nice as your house is, that it's just one of 15 and that there are a lot of kids attending Williams other than the ones in your house.

As a result, getting-to-know-you in a row house takes a good deal of effort and some patience on the part of sophomores. Usually, you won't really begin to feel at home until sometime in October or November, and at times it can be rather frustrating. If you make the initial effort, however, and keep at it, you'll eventually find a number of seniors and juniors as well as sophomores among your close friends.

with a 13th place effort, followed by Co-captain Gary James in 14th and Alan Eusden finishing in 18th.

Saturday opened with the crucial slalom race which, in the past, has been a strong event for Williams. The slalom team skied to a strong 4th place team finish despite a disqualification of Andy Mikell who was in second place after the first run. Leading the Eph charge which almost knocked off third placing Middlebury, was Donald Tarinelli in eleventh. Tarinelli's fine performance in the slalom marked the highest individual Williams placing of the weekend. Other slalom scorers were Roger Prevot in fourteenth and Josh Dembinski in nineteenth.

With the team well entrenched in fourth place overall, it was up to the jumpers to hold things together in the final event. The jumpers totalled 50 points to ice the fourth place finish for the Ephs, as they showed much improvement over previous outings. Tom Dodds, Scott Berry and Will Schmidt scored for the Ephmen, with all of them breaking into the top twenty.

With an excellent opening performance under their belts, the purple skiers will continue the 1977 Carnival season with the Dartmouth Carnival today and tomorrow. The squad will return to the purple valley next weekend when they host the Williams Carnival.

Union bombs Eph icemen; Lowell next

Coach Bill McCormick's Williams skaters ran into a freight train known as Union College Wednesday night in Schenectady and came out on the short end of an 11-3 count. Junior Peter Gonye registered his first Williams hat trick, netting all three Purple goals.

In running their season record to 16-2, Union's pseudo-Division II hockey team tallied five straight goals after Williams had taken a 1-0 lead. The loss dropped Williams to 8-9, including a 4-9 slate in Division II. The Ephs face another tough foe in Lowell Saturday night in Boston.

RPI routs cagers

by Andy O'Donnell

Thank goodness only two more away games remain on this year's varsity basketball schedule, for The Road and our Ephs have not enjoyed the most cordial relationship imaginable this year.

Tuesday night Williams dropped its sixth decision in seven road contests as they fell to an average R.P.I. team 79-60. The loss dropped the Ephs' record to 8-7 and halted another modest three game win streak.

The lackluster play that has characterized Williams' past three games once again plagued them against R.P.I. With the Engineers' Stever Dumas connecting for nine points early in the first half, R.P.I. jumped out to a quick 19-10 lead and then capitalized on several careless Williams turnovers and some good board work by Dumas and center Ken Kubiak to go into the locker at the half up by a 37-29 count.

Williams was just as flat as the second half opened, managing just two points in the first 6:17 of the half as R.P.I. breezed to a commanding 49-31 lead. The Ephs crawled to within thirteen, 55-42, with 6:08 remaining, but the Engineers quickly turned on their after burners and put the game out of reach with four minutes left on the clock.

Mike Tanner once again paced the Eph attack with 18 points while Matt Spangler chipped in with 11. R.P.I. evened its record at 7-7 with the win.

Tomorrow night Williams travels to Waltham to tackle a 10-5 Brandeis club that is currently ranked number 11 nationally among Division III teams and is 9-1 against fellow Division III clubs. The Judges lost to Metro Six powerhouse Memphis State by only 10 points (MS plays Louisville and Cincinnati among others) and stayed with George Washington, currently 17-2 and number 7 in Division III nationally, before losing in the final five minutes.

Squash Tufts 7-0, Radcliffe 5-2

Women's strength stuns opposition

The women's squash team, hitting the road with a record that fails to represent the true excellence of their play, stunned Radcliffe and Tufts Wednesday, winning 5-2 and 7-0.

Defeating their Ivy League opponent, the women relied on the strength of the bottom of the ladder as the team's two losses came on the top odd numbers, Jane Garvey at No. 1 and Becky Chase at No. 3. Garvey lost in the fifth game to a tough opponent while Chase fell in four. The rest of the squad grabbed victories with Janet Costikyan No. 2 and Marcia Johnston No. 4 winning 3-1. Numbers 5 and 6 Holly Boyer and Leigh Costikyan also won with identical 3-0 scores. Barb Ernst at No. 7 iced the win for the team, going five games for a victory.

Against Tufts in Boston as well, the Ephs were unstoppable winning every match 3-0 and demonstrating the team's real strength.

Prior to the Boston match, the women traveled to Philadelphia to split that triangular contest. Against Penn, Johnston at No. 4 and Boyer at No. 5 shut-out their opponents. Freshman Leslie Conant at No. 7 lost a tough one in five games, while the remainder of the ladder was more easily defeated by Penn.

In the second half of the competition, the racket-women blew Franklin and Marshall right off of the court dropping only one game all afternoon.

Perhaps the quality of this year's squad was best demonstrated at the recent Howe Cup competition in New Haven January 28-30. Competing in a round robin tournament, Williams finished fourth in the overall rating, behind powerhouses Princeton, Yale and Trinity. Winning their division which included Vassar, Bowdoin, Tufts and Middlebury, the Williams top five played tremendously. Freshman Becky Chase, who moves over from the women's tennis courts, really shone for the squad, shutting out all of her opponents in the division 3-0, averaging victories of 15-5 throughout the tournament. No. 5 Boyer's winning ways were similar to those of Chase's as she played well, going 6-1 for the tournament, dropping the only game to a tough Tiger opponent in the final round. Boyer, losing the Princeton match in the fifth game on a score of 16-15 brought the Ephs within one point of upsetting the Tigers, who won the match 3-2. The squad also lost to Trinity and Yale on identical 4-1 scores, to help secure a fourth place finish among 20 teams.

In division play, Williams shutout Bowdoin and Tufts 5-0.

Roadtripping to Princeton February 4 for another chance at the Howe Cup victors, the Ephs were again defeated by the Tigers, this time 6-1. Costikyan, avenging her loss in New Haven by defeating her No. 2 opponent 3-1. Once again, Chase at No. 3 looked strong for Williams going to five games before losing as did Johnston.

Following very impressive performances against Ivy League squads who always present a tough challenge, the racketwomen cannot be judged solely on their 5-3 record. The steadily improving squad with new coach Graham Hone '76 is playing without the experience of injured Martha Cook, eighth in the nation last year, who helped pace the women to a third place national finish last year.

Skiers win fourth at UVM

The men's ski team finished fourth in the UVM Carnival last weekend, giving Williams its highest major carnival placing in the last three years. The Ephmen moved closer to the big three powers (Univ. of Vermont, Dartmouth and Middlebury) than they have in recent years as they combined for a 41 point margin over the 5th place team New England College. Other finishers were UNH, Norwich, Univ. of Maine, Bates, St. Lawrence and Harvard.

The team opened up the meet with a fine showing in the Giant Slalom and moved immediately into fourth place. In this event, the Ephs were led by sophomore Andy Mikell in 12th place and Jr. Co-captain Chris Welch in 15th, while freshman Roger Prevot also scored, finishing in the no. 24 position.

The first day ended with coach Bud Fisher's squad holding a slim 4 point lead over NEC after the cross country results were in. The cross country skiers placed fifth as a team after NEC edged in just ahead of them. Jeff Magoon led the Williams contingent

by Evan Bash

To call it a disappointment would be an understatement at best. At its worst, Army's 6-3 dismemberment of the favored Williams' varsity squash team Tuesday at West Point takes the edge off of what has been a fine season to date as well as virtually erasing all Eph hopes for a possible number three ranking in the country.

The season record of Coach Dave Johnson's squad tumbles along with the team's spirits to an 8-4 mark with two dual matches and the national championships left to close out the year.

Coach Johnson tried to prepare his charges for the Cadet's tough, "military mentality" on the courts; give up on nothing and do not worry about making friends with the opposition. Army was in superb shape, however, and Williams became uncharacteristically frustrated as essentially all of their placements were retrieved from the warm walls of the courts.

The even numbered positions fought it out first and they left the courts with the outcome of the match up in the air, the score being tied at two wins all. Martin Golberg at no. 4 stretched his personal winning streak to nine with a 3-0 sweep and no. 8 Charlie Haines put on another strong showing to also win 3-0. The losses came at the second position where Arnie Cogswell couldn't get it together, falling 3-1, and at no. 6 where Jim Little was tripped by a strong attack 3-1.

With three matches still to play at the bottom of the ladder, the Eph's strength, the prospects for a close Williams win were good. But when the normally tough Pete Thayer (no. 5) wasn't on his game and lost 3-0 as did no. 7 Tim Belk 3-1, the Ephs had little remaining chance for victory. Captain Marc Reinhardt and Chip Lindquist were accountable for the last two losses as each dropped his match in four games. Only no. 9 Jim Parsons could salvage a Williams win in the second flite.

Trinity awaits the Ephs after a week's rest.

Wrestlers pinned twice

Traveling to Boston in anticipation of a difficult meet with MIT, the Williams wrestling squad met with double trouble last Saturday as they were handed dual defeats by powerhouse University of Pennsylvania and MIT 33-6 and 27-15.

Eph Hal Zendle at 126 was the one bright spot in the contest, winning both his matches in his best form of the season. Wrestling before Zendle, Joe Carrese at 118 lost to both opponents while the team went on to forfeit 134 once again. Freshman Mark Walsh looked strong against his MIT man, tying the match, although he went on to lose a close one to the Quakers.

Hugo St. John, was forced to forfeit his 158 class as he returned to the injured list. The 158 class, which has just been manned by senior Clarence Young had two strong wrestlers who went on to defeat the inexperienced Young. Team co-captain Scott Conant (167) in a good effort, also lost both matches, as did Keith Passaretti at 177. Returning to the line-up after an ankle injury, co-captain Jeff May decisioned his MIT opponent but could not manage to defeat a strong Penn wrestler. Once again, experienced heavyweights did in Colin Hart although he turned in a determined effort against a 240 lb. Quaker.

Left defense Jane Lester '77 positions the puck for a pass as left wing Liza Olsen '78 looks on in Wednesday's home game against Dartmouth. The Ephwomen pucksters fell 4-0 in play dominated by second team action on both sides. The loss brings the skaters to a 2-5 record as they sharpen up for Saturday's home contest against Colgate. B-ballers bounce Vassar Pulling off a close one, the Williams' women's basketball team defeated Vassar, Wednesday night, 57-55. Forward Maggie O'Brien, demonstrating characteristic poise and skill, sunk the winning basket for the team with :16 left in the game.

Ahead by four with two minutes left, the Ephs were unable to hold their lead, as Vassar tied it up with :26 left. Following the O'Brien shot, Vassar called a time out and attempted to force overtime play with :04 left. The hosts were unable to get off the shot however and the Ephs squeaked by.

Traveling to Poughkeepsie hardly expecting a close game, the Ephs fell victim to inconsistent officiating. The refs, often missing traveling calls, enabled Vassar to gain 15 points from the charity stripe while the Ephs only gained one point on a foul shot. In foul trouble at halftime, high scoring forwards Lisa Capaldini, Leigh Wilson and O'Brien each had 3 fouls entering the second half of the contest.

Leading 33-27, at the half as a result of the first half fast breaking scoring of Monica Grady, the Ephs were dragged down by the slowness of the Vassar squad. Sloppy plays and turnovers began to wear down the William's lead. Relying on O'Brien for the majority of the team's 24 second half points, the team was forced into the outside shots and once again it was O'Brien who was hot for the squad, grabbing 23 points. O'Brien once again led team scoring with Grady adding 16.

Maggie O'Brien is Athlete of Week

Junior Maggie O'Brien of the Williams women's basketball team has been named this week's Record Athlete of the Week after her stunning performance against Vassar Wednesday. O'Brien, hitting from outside for a total of 23 points, enabled the Ephs to squeak by Vassar 57-55 hitting the last shot. O'Brien with 22 points against Smfth last week paced the team to an 81-55 whitewashing of the visitors from Northampton.

Honorable Mention—Larry Tanner, junior member of coach Dick Farley's track and field crew broke his own college record in the 35 lb. weight throw last Saturday. Tanner launched the weight 53' 1" and picked up the Little Three title in the process.

Hoopster Tom Balderston has also been awarded an honorable mention this week following his season high 22 points against Colby on Saturday. Balderston's hot shooting paced the squad to a 79-67 win over the Mules. and capped off a three game win streak for coach Curt Tong's cagers.

Committee readies for Carnival

by Ann McCabe

Winter Carnival activities are once again contingent upon the weather, Carnival chairman Scott (Buzz) Imboden said Saturday.

Students and the Carnival committee worked Friday and Saturday on the ski jump. If too much snow melts at Berlin, slalom events will be held at Brodie. Cross-country races will be held at Savoy where the temperature has remained lower and it snowed Saturday night.

Last year the ski events and snow sculptures were cancelled due to the lack of snow. Carnival dates cannot be changed in such cases due to scheduled carnivals of other schools.

Brodie will be used as an alternative to Berlin Mountain for the downhill races. Henry Whittemore, head of the men's cross-country races, stated that there was a "good foot of hard packed snow" on Saturday—a decrease of about three feet in a few days.

Friday's events include women and men's giant slalom at 8:45 and 11:30 a.m., and women and men's cross-country at 1:30 and 3:00 (Savoy). Saturday men and women will compete simultaneously on a dual slalom course from 8:45 to 11:30 a.m. Jumping events will be held at 1:00 p.m. at Berlin. At 5:00 p.m., awards will be given in Bronfman auditorium.

Admission will be charged to Saturday's events "due to expenses." Imboden said, "We apologize to Williams students—try not to let that dollar keep you away." The Winter Carnival Program has a complete list of the weekend's activities and includes directions to Berlin and Savoy.

Approximately 210 skiers will participate from Dartmouth, Middlebury, UVM, UNH, Bates, Harvard, St. Lawrence, New England College, Colby-Sawyer, Cornell, and Jonathon State.

The carnival committee needs students to serve as gatekeepers, said Imboden. The organizational meeting is tomorrow at 7:15 in 106 Bronfman.

Others on the Committee include Co-chairman Paul Alexander, Gay Simington, (women's cross-country), Rich Spicer (the Jump), and Bruce Wilkinson (downhill races). Students are also in charge of communications, ski patrol, "person" power, scoring, the program, and publicity.

Many of the Poler Flat activities could well be held on mud rather than snow and ice. Snow sculptures are scheduled to be judged Saturday morning.

Friday events

1:15 trike race
1:45 tray drag racing
2:15 toboggan race
2:30 tug-of-war on ice
2:45 funnelating
3:15 snow jousting

New CC rules modify semantics but propose few revolutionary ideas

The proposed College Council constitution coming up for student approval tomorrow retains the framework of the current constitution, modifying the student government through a series of additions, deletions and revisions.

The document drafted by the By-Laws' Committee and amended by the council distinguishes itself from the status quo by

(1) codifying open meetings for CC committees and subcommittees;

(2) establishing student committees to parallel student-faculty committees;

(3) setting more stringent expulsion procedures;

(4) replacing six at-large representatives with two representatives elected from each of three classes.

At least two-thirds of the students returning ballots must vote "Yes" for the revised constitution to become law. Ballots will be placed in student mailboxes tomorrow.

Major Features

The council addresses open meetings in a section added to Article IV (Meetings): "All meetings of any Council committee or sub-committee shall be open meetings, unless a two-thirds majority of the committee or sub-committee vote to close the meeting. This action may only be taken while that committee or sub-committee is discussing a particular individual or individuals." By-Laws Committee chairman Stu Ginsberg claimed this had been the policy, but it wasn't always enforced.

The stated policy on CC meetings changes from "open to the student body" to "open to the college community."

A seventh section added to Article VI (Functions) sets up committees "paralleling the student-faculty policy committees." "Such committees shall solicit and organize student opinion and present it to the respective student-faculty committee." This clause, an amendment offered on the council floor, provides input into committees like the CEP and CUL in addition to the student members, Ginsberg said.

The new constitution changes the rules for expulsion of CC representatives and CC committee members and includes a procedure for removing CC representatives to student-faculty committees.

Article VII of the old document read

> Any house on the Council which is unrepresented without excuse for three consecutive Council meetings will have its representative expelled from the Council to be replaced by another representative from that constituency.

The revised article states

> If any College Council member is absent from three consecutive meetings of the Council, an automatic motion for expulsion of that member will be considered by the Council. A majority vote of the Council is required for expulsion.

Under Article VIII (committees), removal of a CC committee member for malfeasance now requires two-thirds vote of the committee or of the council; previous regulations stipulated approval by both bodies.

A new section of this article allows the CC to remove a member of a student-faculty committee for "failure to attend regular committee meetings."

By replacing six at large representatives with two representatives each from the sophomore,

60 students invited to attend "Special Scholars Weekend"

by Stu Massad

Some 60 of the "strongest candidates" for admission to the Williams Class of 1981 will receive invitations this week to visit the campus February 24 through 26 and experience Williams life in the Special Scholars Weekend, according to Admissions Director Philip Smith.

George Marcus, chairman of the student-faculty Admissions Committee, said the invited high school seniors have extremely good academic records as well as other strongly developed interests. He noted that these students tend to be the most sought after wherever they apply. The weekend is intended to help attract them to Williams, and many present students have cited it as important in their decision to matriculate here.

Of the 60 scholars invited, Smith said he expects some 20 to 30 will attend. In the past, he noted, some 30 per cent of the attending students would accept admission. Smith based his estimates on the results of similar weekends held during the past six years.

Marcus and President John Chandler will address the scholars at an introductory discussion the first night. Student hosts will help the visitors with meals and lodging. The scholars may attend classes, with their hosts or on their own, to follow up their particular interests.

Smith and Marcus both emphasized that expenses to the College will be mostly for meals. The scholars are not paid to come, Marcus remarked, and they have to obtain their own transportation.

Committee members Larry Mitchell and Larry Wu are seeking student hosts for the scholars. Mitchell stated that hosts will have "no real responsibility" for the visitors beyond meals and lodging. He also commented that he and Wu are asking for sponsors through the Register and individual contacts. Anyone interested in being a host should contact Mitchell, Wu or Admissions.

Freshman inclusion: Greylock

Quad planned for people who need people

by Eric Sundin

The upperclass housing choices at Williams are neither entirely bad nor entirely utopic. But the Greylock Quadrangle combines many of the positive aspects of other housing alternatives into a very attractive package.

The Greylock Quad is unsurpassed in logical planning and elegance. The red-brick and grey-concrete Bryant, Hopkins, Carter and Gladden Houses are pleasant sights for book-weary students. The landscaped quad, with its trees, bushes and grassy areas, seems an environment in itself. It is perfect for athletic buffoonery (for example, midnight football on the Gladden House lawn) and reminiscent of the Freshman Quad. Just step out the door onto the north field and you will find a cross-country ski area or driving range all your own.

Greylock succeeds very well at creating luxurious modern surroundings. The spacious dining hall has wood tables and chairs, wood and slate floors and high ceilings, different from the conjested surroundings and ubiquitous plastic of Mission Park's cafeteria. And because the dining hall is separated from the four houses, you will not have to contend with the aroma of Friday's fish in your room Sunday morning.

Each of the Greylock houses has from 60 to 120 members on its four or five or six floors. Each house is self-contained with a laundry room, T.V. room, basement for ping-pong or parties, a large living room with fire place and piano, and a kitchenette for late-night culinary experiments.

The room and suite arrangements in Greylock are initially very confusing. If accepted, you are assured of a single; depending on the number of desired roommates you can have a double (2 singles) with an adjoining small living room, or 4 singles with a large living room. As a senior, you can opt for a larger single.

The regular singles are not especially capacious in Greylock, but they are more logically conceived than Mission singles. While you will not get lost, you are assured of not getting an attic or closet-sized room once used for diminutive servants.

The rooms and suites each have Scandinavian simplicity in design and function. The waffle-iron ceilings might even let your decorative imaginations run wild.

The large bay windows for each room and living room afford panaromic views of the mountains and campus.

Greylock has its own homey aura in Bronfman to reduce hours

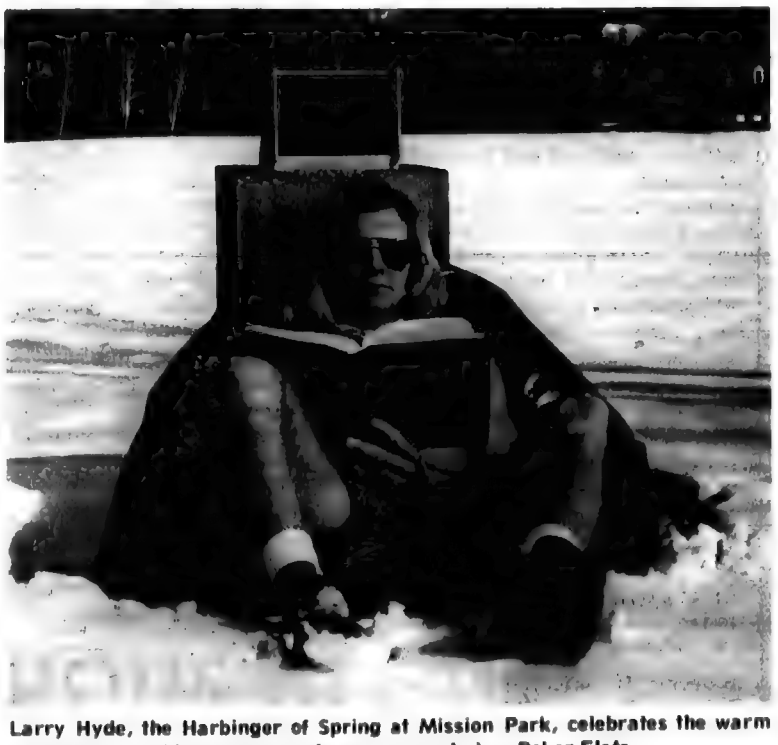
by Tim Wang

New energy conservation measures will soon be implemented in the science quad, according to C. Ballard Pierce, Coordinator of the Bronfman Science Center.



All science buildings will be closed to student use from midnight to 6 a.m. in an effort to reduce energy usage. Students found in any of the science buildings after 12:00 p.m. will be evicted from the premises, unless granted special permission. Students are also requested not to use lighted classrooms for studying at any time.

Lighting will be cut back in many areas of the science quad in order to trim energy consumption. Desk lamps will be substituted for overhead lights whenever possible.

The number of hours that the temperature is cut back to 55 degrees will be increased. In the near future, the thermostats in most of the buildings will be turned down to 55 degrees at 6 p.m. at the present, this temperature drop occurs at 11:00 p.m. or 12:00 p.m. Rooms containing plants, animals, or sensitive electrical apparatus will be maintained at a constant temperature by means of separate temperature control. Heat loss will also be diminished by closing the drapes and blinds during the night.

Most of the energy savings will occur in Bronfman, as the science center consumes twice as much energy as the other four buildings combined. The Bronfman Library, which costs $1.25 an hour to light, will be closed along with the rest of the science buildings at 12:00 a.m. The reserve room in Sawyer will stay open until 2 a.m. in order to provide extra study time.

Pierce expects a savings of 10 per cent from last year's electricity and steam expenditures. This should amount to approximately $15,000, as the science quad's energy costs run around $150,000 a year.

A Nice Dilemma

Students face a tough choice tomorrow in voting on the proposed College Council constitution. The choice is not between a good constitution and a bad one. Rather students must decide whether to ratify a College Council constitution which is marginally better than the one currently in existence or reject it in hopes of getting something better.

The proposed constitution is different from the existing one in fairly minor ways. (There is an article on page 1 listing the changes.) Improvements in the proposed constitution include its provisions for:

1. an increase in sophomore representation resulting from apportioning each upper class two at-large representatives. (II,1)
2. setting a specific date for CC elections. (III,1)
3. the standardization and recording of by-laws concerning procedural precedents and rules. (V)
4. the formation of CC committees which will solicit student opinion and present it to student-faculty committees. (VI,7)
5. a formalized, enforceable procedure regarding expulsion for non-attendance by CC representatives. (VII)

Clearly the proposed document is superior to the one in existence. Yet, students should realize that they pay a price for gaining these improvements. An overwhelming "yes" vote for the proposed constitution cannot help but be interpreted by the council as an endorsement of it. Thus, in accepting some minor improvements, students will also be implying satisfaction with both the proposed constitution and the activities of the Council. By accepting this new constitution, students will likely forclose any hope for another, and possibly far better, constitution for several years to come.

On the other hand, there is no guarantee that a rejection of the proposed constitution will move the council to draft another one. The council has spent a good deal of time drafting and debating the new constitution. It's rejection would likely end the council's desire for constitutional reform and its search for a raison d'etre.

A nice dilemma. May we suggest that 67 per cent of you vote "yes", with reservations, while the rest of you vote "no".

Letters: Misinterpretation of power

Czarist changes

To the editor,

Because food services at Williams College are so improved over last year, Food Czar Ross Keller has returned to his arbitrary tactics of "Food Service policy to change without notice." We refer to the events last Saturday at Greylock Dining Hall in which after several years of Saturday breakfast hours from 8:00 a.m. to 9:00 a.m., the hours were changed without notice from 7:15 a.m. to 8:45 a.m.

The change ostensibly was to accommodate early-risers. It only served to prevent many persons from having breakfast because they arrived after 8:45 a.m. Where were the early-risers who coerced Ross Keller into changing the breakfast hours? The kitchen staff agreed that the change was ill-conceived because very few people attended breakfast at Greylock before 8:00 a.m. Why were not Greylock residents consulted before this change was made? At the very least, we should have been notified in advance of these changes. Changes would have been better directed toward the quality of the food served and the imaginativeness of the menu.

Reporting criticized

To the editor,

I was happy to see that the Record 11-2-77, as the poll shows, is keeping up with current issues with a front page headline, "Subcommittee Hopes to revive glass recycling," and the excuse for an article that followed it.

My name is spelled Byrne Kelly but that wasn't asked of me on 10-2-77 when a waking phone call (or was it a dream) 'interview' took place. Deduction and the tone of the quotes implies my colleagues too must have been 'interviewed' anonymously by phone. All I recall is a woman's voice and she gave her name in the beginning, told me she was writing an article on the newspaper recycling, and then fired some questions. Did I leave out chunks of my answers which appear in direct quotes or is that you Mr. ed.?

We're not even sure if glass recycling is (as you put it) worth the 'viable' effort and energy it consumes—it varies according to which end-use function it is put to.

Your 'deadline' reporter did a poor job and your editing should keep things in check. I'd be happy to write you some facts on the 'committee.'

People's Inaugural

To the editor,

There is some reason to differ with the attitude expressed by Charles L. Hirsch in his recent article on the Inauguration: proclaiming a "People's Inaugural" does not necessarily produce a "People's Inaugural", and creating the image of a humble and candid Administration does more to serve the health of the media ego than to inform the public of any substantive issues of policy.

There is something beautiful and compelling about a People's Inaugural. It makes you feel like personally taking part in it. The United States, after all, has been having People's Elections for years, our economic system is based on People's Enterprise, and every ten years we immortalize ourselves in the People's Census. It was only a matter of time before the People took it into their own hands to run the Inauguration, too.

To prepare the proper sense of unity and communion for the big day, the People were offered a week of free cultural events at various museums and monuments in our nation's capital. Many of these concerts, readings, and dances were scheduled between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. to remind the People that most of them work during the day to keep this country great, and to show the Little People that there are many lessons to be learned about the Outside World while still in school.

People tend to get tired by early evening, even if this is their one trip East from Prairie Village, so additional events were scheduled to begin at dinner time, when the average worker feels most like attending a clarinet concerto. The People Who Run It ensured that as many of their brethren as possible would attend by publicizing starting times, confirmable by a special Inauguration Information Telephone Line, that were a mere hour behind the actual starting times. "Oh-ho!" People exclaimed as they mirthfully ribbed each other, "A week's not long enough!" All the tickets for the Union Station (Visitor's Center) folk dance were quickly given out, but many People who early assured themselves a place on the Station dance floor chose not to utilize it, causing, fortunately, no consternation at all to the other People, who were told not to go without a ticket.

The Inaugural Parade itself was a wonderful mixture of People and floats from all over the US, its neighbors and possessions. The large crowd was curious and good-tempered: most wanted to catch a glimpse of the People's People, while hawkers sold peanut butter and jelly sandwiches. Problems were limited to one block of the parade route: on 15 St. police guided the barely circulating crowd into the narrow space between the wall and the grandstand. Tempers flared and purse snatchers clawed for an escape as the stands above remained nearly empty, the $25-a-seat occupants discouraged by the cold and by the impatient parade marshalls who made the marching bands run by.

There was silence as the large, reflective USA float sped by. We looked at our brief reflection in the letters ". . . showing that it is you, the American People, who are the USA!" (We looked anxiously around—was USA stamped on our foreheads?) Whatever appeal that notion may have was entirely lost thanks to its presentation as a massive, garish monument forced upon the People in a vulgar display of self-adulation.

True, Carter has shown himself adept at maintaining the style that most of us (whether by choice or necessity) observe in running our daily lives: keeping personal staff size to a manageable number, taking a taxi (and not private transportation) to work at the White House, and travelling on foot up Pennsylvania Avenue to assume the Presidency of the United States. But style is not the same as policy and the quarter of the electorate that voted for Carter is not in the White House any more than the few who paid the price of attending a People's Party. Perhaps the next step is to call the Transitional Team the Provisional People's Government. It's only fitting for a Government of People, and not of men. Sincerely,

Referendum- no

To the editor,

If the College Council needs a new constitution, this is certainly not the one. The document on which we will vote tomorrow gives us a flawed system of representation, and incredibly ambiguous language for a few cosmetic advantages.

The reasons for changing from six at-large representatives to two from each of the upper classes, I am told, are to create smaller, more workable constituencies and insure that each class may express its views on issues before the council.

One representative cannot possibly represent 450 classmates any more effectively than 1800 students. Both groups are much too large.

Even more ludicrous is the notion that a sophomore's ideas will differ from those of a junior or a senior by virtue of his class year. There is no advantage to be gained from class representation.

More to the point, as structured in this constitution, at-large representation will create an in-grown stagnant council because we elect exactly two representatives from each class. With the incumbent's advantage, they are virtually assured re-election until they graduate, so no new people from these classes can get onto the council.

Article III, section 4 is a masterpiece of ambiguity. My reading indicates that sophomores, juniors and seniors will each elect two representatives to serve for the following year. This seems to mean that next year's sophomores will not be represented because, as freshmen this year, they receive no vote and no representatives. To add to the confusion, the class of '77 appears to elect two council members to represent them after they graduate.

Article VI, section 7 establishes a number of student committees to parallel the student-faculty committees. Their purpose is to seek and direct student opinion so that we have maximum input into the committee decisions. This is an admirable idea, but it won't work. If the student representatives on committees can't determine student opinion now, how is forming a committee going to solve the problem? It seems no one has sat down to think this out yet. It's not a bad idea, just another ineffective addition to the College bureaucracy.

Just below that, in Article VII, the council hopes to improve its expulsion procedure. In the past no member has been willing to sponsor a motion to remove a delinquent council member. By constitutionally requiring an automatic motion, no one member will be responsible for making a motion, right? But who is going to make this "automatic motion"? Someone must make a motion, albeit automatic, and bear the responsibility for expelling a fellow council member. As a result, nothing gets done.

Our current constitution is not the greatest, and clearly does need revision. But this alternative has not been completely thought out, and contains an incredible number of dumb mistakes (III,4 implicitly prohibits sophomores from serving on the council; III,3 and 4 require election by non-extant By-Laws; III,5 and 6 are vague about vacancy replacements, etc.) A "no" vote tomorrow will indicate not approval of our current disaster, but a protest against the way the council is trying to pass this shoddy document off on us. Let's make them re-work this by voting "no" on the CC referendum.

A.D.A. clarification

To the editor,

The representation of Williams A.D.A. in Friday's Record article "Democrats Conduct Food Drive" was misleading.

Americans for Democratic Action is a non-partisan liberal lobby organization whose membership extends into both political parties.

The Williams A.D.A. chapter which I entered two years ago as a registered Republican is similarly non-partisan.

More importantly, the A.D.A. defines and acts upon fundamental issues including civil liberties, income distribution, nuclear power, environment and defense vs. national defense schemes. At Williams, A.D.A. has lobbied against the representative S-1 Criminal Code, the B-1 Bomber, the sale of "Dumb-Dumb" bullets and has worked for Mass. tax reform, the ERA, and bottle return legislation. ADA has also worked with local organizers to combat local unemployment and poverty.

A.D.A. welcomes anyone, regardless of party, who wants to fight for progressive change and to learn about the need and role for activism at Williams and beyond college life.

The sex survey results printed in the last issue of the Record reported that 31 per cent of the Williams students responding had intercourse more than 25 times a month. The figure should have been 3 per cent.

'Physicists' full of surprises

by Thomas Herwitz

It is a familiar process—the tickets ripped in half, the program given out, the usher guiding you to your seat at the AMT. Settled down you look up, perhaps, at the stage and see a cluttered scene—a table, lamp and some chairs tumbled over, a body sprawling on the floor and a nun in full habit, then two, then two, looking unquestionably on. That first surprise is not the last the audience will receive during the evening as the Williams College Theater production of Durrenmatt's The Physicists progresses. The "comic melodrama" continues at the AMT this Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

The scene is set in the "Cherry Orchard" sanatorium run by a hunchbacked Fraulein Doktor whose main patients are three physicists—one who thinks he is Newton, another Einstein, and a third who believes he has visions of King Solomon. Partway through the play, however, things begin to unravel which give us a hint that there is a little bit more going on than meets the eye. Durrenmatt is writing, with his early '60's cold war mentality (Swiss though he is), a political work about the responsibility of the scientist in this nuclear age.

But Durrenmatt is, first of all, not writing about politics. With The Physicists he wanted to write a modern day version of the myth of Oedipus—a chain of events in which the hero goes to great lengths to avoid a disaster, yet everything he does only makes its occurrence more certain. In the end, though Mobius and the two other physicists have agreed to keep the great scientific knowledge out of the public's grasp to prevent the destruction of mankind, it turns out the work has fallen into the hands of the Hitleresque Doktor Van Zahnd whose totalitarian rule will exploit it to the harm of all mankind. The end is certainly pessimistic, but not entirely so, for most important in Durrenmatt's mind is what had to be said.

But all this talk of Oedipus, and pessimism must be put aside. For the beauty of Durrenmatt's "theater of paradox" is that given a subject such as the one he chose to attack in this play, his humor and ingenuity create a theatrical piece which is the quintessence of the tragicomic style; a play (as Durrenmatt has become so famous for) which entertains while it is being viewed, but leaves the audience with more than just a comic morsel to chew over and swallow. His work is—regardless of anything else—extraordinarily funny. Director Gregory Boyd, therefore, in light of the somewhat archaic theme, made a wise decision in emphasizing the comic elements (though certainly the universalization of the theme to a human responsibility as well as just a scientist's is quite possible and appropriate).

Once again, as this critic has had the opportunity of saying so many times before, the directorial genius of Gregory Boyd ensures a certain magic to whatever he seems to touch. The balance of outrageous comedy and performance against the subtler elements of detail is exquisite; the overstated Newton, the comic timing which was for the most part so right, the three knobby kneed lads with their outlandish Beethoven; the interweaving of suspense and humor, the well concealed surprises, and perhaps most important the marvelously structured sudden changes in mood—whose ability to catch the viewer off guard makes the impact all the more forceful. Certainly due credit must go to the playwright, but it was the director's dramatic tools and imagination which molded it so fittingly and beautifully together.

John Feltch was quite funny in his exaggerated and somewhat outlandish manner as "Newton", his face highly expressive, his presence almost assured laughter was on its way. Craig Elliott's "Einstein" was less outspoken. In smaller roles, the Mobius boys—Robert Berry, James Stone, and Steven Rebarber—snatched the audience's attention with their synchronized antics while on stage, the policemen—particularly Stephen Wertimer—were appropriately comic in their somewhat questionable and entirely tactless investigation, and the boxer attendants were less than boxerly. Kathy O'Reilly played reasonably well in her first major role at the AMT.

". . . the directorial genius of Gregory Boyd ensures a certain magic to whatever he seems to touch."

In the realm of difficult roles, one category, no doubt, is that of a straight character in a generally comic play. Faced with this hardship both Cecilia Rubino and Robert Gregory, whose talents are by now unquestionable, managed not only to overcome the difficulty but to lend credence as well to the seriousness of their outcries. Gregory's performance, contained dramatic intensity which was soberingly meaningful and important. Rubino demonstrated controlled characterization and climactic fury.

The settings, jointly conceived by Jean-Bernard Bucky, Frederick Penzel, and Boyd used, for the first time this year, a thrust stage. With a huge da Vinci logo and illuminated Roman numerals (to signify the presence of the respective physicists) in the background, the polished tile-like circular floor and the rather stiff furniture was convincingly sterile. It had, though, a slick contemporary feel and was highly attractive. Martha Hally's costumes were equally appealing and they once again bring an added life to the production—from the wonderfully matching boys' clothing to the extravagant clothing and wig which Newton wore. She has played such an important part in each of the Williams College Theater productions since she arrived this fall.

John Feltch, Robert Gregory, and Craig Elliott play the three physicists in the current Williams College Theater production of Durrenmatt's tragicomedy The Physicists which continues at the AMT this Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Review is on this page.

Finest Wine Selection in the Area

Track ends 11-3 season with quad-meet victory

by Frank Carr

In an exciting wrap-up of the 1977 season, the Williams trackmen pulled out three close victories on Saturday to give coach Dick Farley a fine record of 11 wins and 3 losses. With only four events remaining, the Ephmen were in last place in the quadrangular contest, but individual wins in three of those events gave the squad a winning total of 45½ points. Following the purple cow path were Worcester State with 34 points, Fitchburg St. right behind at 33 and Westfield St. finishing in fourth with 28½ points.

Employing the muscles of Larry Tanner and Rich Remmer, Williams inched its way to a one point lead over Fitchburg and Worcester after the weight events. Tanner faced a rather powerful opponent in the 35 lb. weight throw and finished one inch behind the winner with a 52' 2" heave. Remmer added a third in the weight throw and then notched a second place in the shot put at 49' 10". Freshman Jim Holmes closed out his rookie season with a fine 11' 6" second place vault, but the Ephs were now one point behind the leader Worcester. The margin began to widen even more, and when Greg McAleenan and Jamie Rouse had capped off the field events with thirds in the long jump and high jump respectively, the purple athletes found themselves down on the third rung of the ladder.

Co-captain Ken Leinbach tried to inject a first place dose of points into the anemic Eph total, but was outkicked on the last lap of the mile and finished second with a 4:20.2 clocking. Fellow co-captain Dave Bass negotiated a fourth in the 60 yard dash, followed by Terry O'Reilly's third place tie in the 600 yard run, but their efforts were not enough to keep the Ephmen from falling into last place, 6½ points behind the leader.

Junior Ron White, who should place very high in the Easterns this Saturday, continued his winning ways in the 60 yd. hurdles, stopping the watches at 7.8 seconds. Vernon Davis grabbed the runner-up honors behind White and Williams was back in business with now only one-half point, separating them from the first place Worcester contingent. The next event put the Ephs over the top, as Joe Kolb

Brandeis tips cagers, 103-100

by Andy O'Donnell

The record books will simply record it as their eighth defeat in sixteen outings, but the varsity basketball team's 103-100 double overtime loss to Brandeis Saturday night was in every sense of the word a moral victory for the Ephs. And it might also prove to be just the medicine the doctor ordered to snap the team out of its recent slump.

After struggling through four lackluster and lackadaisical performances climaxed by last week's thrashing at the hands of a so-so R.P.I club, coach Tong's charges finally performed with an intensity and desire that's been missing since the Amherst game.

The game should do a lot for the Ephs' confidence, for they not only demonstrated an ability to play well on the road but they held their own against a Brandeis club boasting enough pogo sticks up front to give Yale a go for its endowment funds and a pair of pesky guards with a propensity for throwing them in from the Mass. Pike.

This combination worked extremely well for Brandeis coach Bob Brannum in the early going as the Judges erupted for 20 points in the first five minutes of the game before Williams had a chance to cross-examine.

With Tom Balderston once again coming off the bench to supply the needed fire power, Matt Spangler asserting himself underneath, and Andy Straka catching fire from the outside, the Ephs clawed their way back from a 28-14 deficit to go out at the half down by six, 46-40.

Brandeis quickly upped the lead to 52-40 as the second half opened behind the sensational play of junior forward Joe Carter (17 first half points). Williams tied things at 64 on a Mike

by Bill Baldiga

Blythe Miller and Lisa Halperin turned away all but one of 21 shots on goal as the women's ice hockey team outplayed a strong Colgate team, en route to a 3-1 victory Saturday. Relying on three first period goals and tight defensive play, the Ephs withstood a last minute barrage as Colgate pulled their goalie in an effort to tie the game.

Betsy McGean set the tempo of the game early as she skated in alone on the Colgate net, only to have Sue O'Donnel make a fine stick save. Working in the corner, McGean got off a crease pass which Jeannie Dugan tipped by the startled O'Donnel, at 10:33. Two minutes later, Mary Fish whistled a high shot into the top corner of the net to create a 2-0 Williams lead.

Picking up the play, Colgate put pressure on Miller in the Ephs' net, only to have the quick skating Ephs break out on breakaways and two-on-ones. A minute later, it was Betsy McGean who again led the break into the Colgate zone. Not to be outdone on this rush, she shifted by the defender and sent a low hard shot under the pads of O'Donnel. The period ended with a fine shoulder save by Miller and the Ephs sitting on a 3-0 lead.

The second and third periods were not as free skating as the first, and the Colgate women peppered the Eph net with 15 shots. Colgate finally broke through at 7:59 in the third period as Sue Elkind put one behind Lisa Halperin after a scramble in front. Halperin went on to weather the Colgate pressure in the final minutes to secure the win for the team.

Women hoopsters defeat Dartmouth

It was almost better than a home game as supportive Ephs took time out from the Dartmouth Carnival activities to watch a visiting Williams' women's basketball team defeat the Big Green 58-43, Saturday.

The squad really put it together, adding the speed and eliminating the mistakes which had almost cost them last week's 57-55 victory over Vassar. Shooting a strong 49 per cent from the floor, the team was able to penetrate Dartmouth's 2-3 defense getting off the inside shots.

Moving to an early lead, the Ephs gave the fans a treat putting the recently dormant fast breaks and aggressive offense back into action. Frosh Monica Grady was back to her old form in the first half play going for twelve of her sixteen points early in the game. The team worked especially well together as forwards Lisa Capaldini, Leigh Wilson, and Maggie O'Brien grabbed the rebounds, setting up the field goal situations. Capaldini, leading in rebounds with twelve, was also strong from the floor grabbing fourteen points.

Up by eighteen at the half, coach Sue Hudson took out the starting squad who had been presenting quite a defensive challenge to the Big Green. Going man to man only in press situations, the Ephs were able to hold their hosts with a 2-3 defense, forcing outside shots. As it became clear that the Ephs superior speed had secured the victory, Hudson sent O'Brien and Milne, each with eight points, to the bench, allowing the much improving second string to handle Dartmouth for the remainder of the half.

The squad, hoping to maintain the good team effort and strong play, will meet Mount Holyoke away, tonight at 7:30.

Div. I Colgate mangles natators

by Dennis O'Shea and Andy O'Donnell

When you go up against a team that swims like an Indiana University alumni squad, and you have to swim them at their place, you usually dream upset but almost always end up having your doors blown off.

Well, Saturday afternoon Colgate added the hinges, frames, and mahogany paneling as well en route to a 107-26 dusting of the Williams varsity swimmers in Scenic Hamilton, N.Y.

The Division I Red Raiders, 10th place finishers in last year's Eastern Seaboard meet, and this year's upset victors over East Coast Conference titlists Bucknell, combined incredible depth with flashes of awesome speed to bar the Ephs from winning a single event and to monopolize first, second, and third places in four events.

"Colgate is without question an outstanding team," commented losing coach Carl Samuelson, "so we utilized the meet in preparation for the New England Championships." Three individual events were substituted for the medley relay which usually opens the dual meet program, and two others, the individual medley and the freestyle relay, were doubled in length to championship distances.

"We wanted to take advantage of swimming in a great facility to simulate conditions in the New Englands and to provide the kind of background that will help us there," Samuelson added. "Everyone did much more very hard swimming than we usually have the opportunity to do" during the regular season.

Senior co-captain Duff Anderson, for instance, swam well over a mile of competitive yardage in a two hour span.

Colgate is really the only team on the Williams schedule with whom they are not at all competitive, so Saturday's contest was a welcome opportunity to back off a bit from the intensity of most meets and swim loosely.

As a result there were few really quick times, but Samuelson was pleased that most Purple performances were aggressive and well swum, if not particularly fast.

"Some of our swimmers really took their races out hard for the first time this year," said the mermen's mentor. "We'll really need that at the New Englands." He pointed particularly to Don Cameron's fourth place 200 backstroke, Stuart Dean's second and third place distance swims, and Dave Amlicke and Phil Wild's two-three finish in the 200 freestyle as better races than the times would indicate.

Freshman Todd Piper led a fine effort in the 400 individual medley, posting a 4:30.212 third place clocking that's less than seven seconds from the frosh record and last year's winning time at the New Englands. Peter Howd added a fourth, just eight seconds behind his 13th place effort at the league championships last season.

Jeffs rob Purple Pail from grapplers

by Nancy Rhein

The advantages of the home mats and lots of spectators were insufficient Saturday as the Williams wrestling squad was unable to defeat a superior and more complete Amherst squad.

Travelling to Williamstown in anticipation of taking home the Purple Pail, a tradition between the schools, the Jeffs had reason to be confident of a win as the usual Ephs forfeits at 134 and 150 meant twelve easy points. The Ephs, trimmed down, had recruited shot putter Rich Remmer to wrestle heavyweight.

The match opened well, as Amherst unexpectedly forfeited 118, a sure disappointment for the ready Joe Carrese. The 126 match set the tone for the meet as Hal Zendle was challenged by a tough Amherst opponent. Leading 2-0 on a takedown in the first period, Zendle fought to pin his opponent, but escaped and reversals kept the score close, as it stood 7-7 with less than a minute left in the third period. Zendle then reversed his man and came out on top with a 9-7 decision.

Frosh Mark Walsh at 142 hung tough for the Ephs as his strong opponent dominated the match, winning a 6-1 decision. Walsh's point came on an escape in the final period. Walsh's loss, in combination with the 150 forfeit put the squad down 15-9, as co-captain Scott Conant took the mats at 158.

Conant also met a challenge as his Amherst man pressured, grabbing points for three near falls. Conant's only point in the 11-1 match came on a procedure penalty on the Amherst man.

Holding out until late in the second period, Keith Passaretti at 167 was pinned.

Behind 25-9, the squad sent in Jeff May who pulled off a big win. The Amherst man, grabbing two on a reversal in the third was unable to defeat May as the Eph's co-captain pulled off a 4-2 decision.

Colin Hart at 190 was not as fortunate as a tough Amherst man pinned the sophomore at 2:20 in the second period.

Knowing the match was lost, the Ephs spirits remained high as Remmer took the mats in an exciting match for the Eph fans. Remmer, with little recent wrestling experience, held on with brute size and strength as a talented Jeff's wrestling precision was worthless in the first period. Amherst took control, going up by three before Remmer could gain a two points reversal. A reversal-near fall combination put Amherst ahead 8-2, setting up the Jeff decision.

VOL. 90, NO. 36 WILLIAMS COLLEGE FEBRUARY 18, 1977

Republican club president Steve Aspis '79 watches J. W. Stryker attempt to refute Seymour Baron's pro-nuclear energy arguments Tuesday night in Bronfman.

Nuclear energy opponents debate power alternatives

Nuclear energy advocate Seymour Baron challenged opponent J. W. Stryker's vision of a "Faustian situation" with an argument for the safety and economic feasibility of nuclear power in a spirited debate Tuesday night.

"Nuclear power costs one half to one third as much as fossil fuel energy," he said, "and the radiation leakage is many thousands of times less than governmental safety standards. Sulphuric and nitrogenous emissions from fossil fuels hover around the maximum amount considered safe."

Stryker, a radiation biophysicist, agreed that nuclear energy is an alternative, but should not be considered paramount. "With changes in lifestyle, we can boost our energy efficiency so that with the development of solar energy, no more nuclear plants will be needed."

According to figures introduced by Baron, a vice-president of Burns and Roe, the firm which planned a fast-breeder reactor in Tennessee, present technology restricts the payback on solar energy sources to as much as forty or fifty years after they become operable.

"With conservation, the projected 25 per cent increase in the use of energy expected by 1985 can be cut back to only 3 per cent. Supplies of natural gas, oil and coal are nevertheless finite. The development of the light water, fast-breeder reactor is the most feasible alternative to present power sources," said Baron.

Stryker expressed apprehension about the spread of nuclear power to underdeveloped countries. "Widespread nuclear power would result in an increased possibility of terrorism," he said.

Baron, while agreeing that other alternatives must be studied before a total commitment is made, said he remains "a firm believer in the constructive need for nuclear energy and its safety." Baron reported that "once in every two hundred reactor years, there is the possibility of losing one or two lives," in the coal mining business, over 100,000 men have been killed since the beginning of the century."

Students reject constitution

CC referendum fails

Students rejected the proposed College Council constitution in the all-college referendum Wednesday. The final tally 2-1 with 14 abstentions left the proposal 52 votes short of the two-thirds vote necessary for passage. The total 392 votes accounted for a miserable 23 per cent of the eligible electorate.

Council members have many theories explaining the loss. Most blamed poor student attitude. This led to a high rate of apathy, manifested in the low turnout. By-Laws (the committee responsible for drafting the new constitution) Committee Chairman Stu Ginsberg '77 suggested that feeling was more anti-Council than anti-constitution. "I doubt most of the students even read it," he said.

Dodd House representative Cliff Mitchell '78 agreed, saying students were tired of "referenda in general and a College Council referendum in particular"

Representatives also cited poor publicity, a new voting system, low voter education and "lukewarm" coverage in the Record as reasons for the defeat.

Whether the proposed changes will die, or continue to be debated is still a subject of contentions. Both sides agree that Tuesday's CC meeting will determine the fate of the innovations.

Mitchell predicted future council reorganization would take place in the By-Laws. These do not require student approval; a simple majority of the council puts them into effect. Most representatives disagreed, feeling that another referendum was inevitable, whether in conjunction with the elections in March, or at some later date. At that time, Ginsberg noted, there is usually a big reorganization and this is the time to bring up such changes.

The Election committee put a ballot in each student's mailbox, and then left a committee member outside the door to collect marked ballots. Many students complained of the short hours in which they could vote, and at least one student voted twice using a discarded ballot he found on the mailroom floor. Committee chairman Randy Sturges '77 was not available for comment.

According to council vice-president Randy Sturges, the defeat of the proposed constitution does not necessarily prevent the organization of the parallel committees.

Transfer policy changes

The Housing committee agreed Monday that it should minimize, if not eliminate, any priorities built into the computer program that will run the transfer inclusion. "We should keep the transfer policy as pure as possible," Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad recommended, adding that "the process is new and it's going to be controversial enough as it is."

The committee voted to permit two special groups of students to circumvent normal procedure in changing their house affiliation. Those displaced from over-included houses and those who entered Williams as upperclassmen will be offered opportunities to transfer their affiliation prior to other transfer applicants.

The committee will allow displaced students to transfer their affiliation to their new residence or to maintain their present affiliation and return to the original house.

Other upperclass transfer students will have the option of entering the inclusion process with the freshman class or maintaining their College assigned affiliation.

The Housing Committee voted Williams Health, Education, and Welfare $550 from house treasuries, to be assessed of each house according to the total number of house affiliates, not strictly dues-paying members as WHEW president Dan Felizberto had originally proposed to the committee.

WHEW also received $250 from the Freshman Council treasury Sunday.

These funds will be spent on Winter Carnival and Spring Weekend events such as today's Poker Flats activities, and on "other all-College affairs" probably including spink and volleyball tournaments and all-College parties, said Felizberto.

In subsequent act on, the committee accepted a proposal to co-educate Brooks, a formerly female residential unit belonging to Spencer-Brooks House. House president Glenn Shannon reported that Spencer-Brooks member unanimously approved the proposal.

The committee also approved subcommittee recommendation concerning the affiliation of row house satellite and overflow buildings. The package included a proposal to switch Lambert, a seven bed unit located on Hoxsey Street, from Perry-Bascom to Spencer-Brooks.

Joe Kolb, Perry House president, told the committee that female members of his house did not object because they hoped to convert Perry's rear wing to female occupancy. The suggested reorganization has yet to come before the committee for approval.

As predicted in the February 11 issue of the Record, the committee assigned Keck to Perry-Bascom and Woodbridge to Gar-Wood. Woodbridge will be affiliated with Gar-Wood for one year only, during the renovation of the Garfield facility. In future years, Woodbridge will probably house men and women from Spencer-Brooks House, enabling Brooks to return to single-sex status, according to Shannon.

New parallel committees proposed

by Bill Dahling

The College Council approved Tuesday a statement by representative Mark Lanier which dispelled all rumors of financial impropriety concerning the Williams Republican Club. The council also debated a proposal for structuring the parallel committees specified in the proposed constitution.

Due to a "misunderstood decision" and a "lack of communication" said Lanier, the "stories of embezzlement" had resulted from "internal problems the club was having." Meetings with club president Steve Aspis and various club members led to this conclusion, said Lanier.

The treasurer's report noted that CC funds had not been misused, and that the club's books were in order. The report suggested that these allegations might have an effect on the future funding process of all clubs in general, but did not specify what this effect might be. Cath Carpenter stressed the usefulness of special forms all organizations must submit which detail all sources of financial income.

Five members of the Elections Committee submitted a proposal for the organization of parallel committees, "shadowing" the existing student-faculty committees to solicit more student input, pursuant to Article VI, Sec. 7 of the proposed constitution.

The proposal called for a Curricular Review Committee to parallel the CEP, a Campus Environment Committee to parallel the CUL, and a Standing Committee, from which subcommittees paralleling the remaining student-faculty committees would be chosen.

Harry Kelly summarized the philosophy of the proposal saying, "Those who make the policy should be those who implement it."

The council resolved that election of student representatives to the CUL and CEP would remain the same as last year; these representatives would be on the parallel committees.

Kelly and Goodell emphasized that their proposal established a linkage which would require members to actively solicit student opinion on relevant issues, and in turn act on this information in the form of concrete proposals to the student-faculty committees.

The College Council has opened self-nominations for elections in March. Nominations must include: name, class and office sought; and be turned in to the Dean's office by noon on February 28.

The offices for contention are:

—President

—Vice-President

—six at-large CC representatives

—one each member to the CEP from each division

—one CEP member at-large

—one each members to the CUL from the classes of '78, '79 and '80.

—two members to the Discipline committee from the class of '78

—one each members to the Discipline committee from the classes of '79 and '80

Freshman inclusion: Fitch-Prospect

Berkshire Quad offers options

by Bob Fox

In the Berkshire Quad sit two houses which have been variously maligned in the inclusion groupings the last few years and have been continually labelled as "less than desirable" housing. After two years, Dodd has been combined more sensibly with Tyler, which leaves Fitch and Prospect in a category by themselves—a combination which is due as much to the layout of the campus and the process of elimination as it is to the similarities between these houses.

The Berkshire Quad is located at the east end of campus, with Fitch and Prospect bounding the eastern and southern sides of that quad. The location is superb, with Sawyer, Hopkins, Griffin and the shops on Spring Street a two or three minute walk and the Science Quad and Baxter only a couple more. If you are a sports fan, whether of football, baseball or any winter sport, this is the place to be. Weston Field, Lasell, the hockey rink and the field house are so convenient that one tends to forget what the walk from Mission Park is like during January.

This location also has a unique quality when compared to other upperclass housing. East and Fayerweather, which form the western side of the quad, house one-fifth of the freshman class and there is at least the opportunity for upperclasspwesons to interact with this class outside of Baxter Hall.

Driscoll Hall is the main dining hall for these two houses and is only a very short walk across a flagstone patio from either house. Though the name has been changed, (until a year ago the facility was called Fitch-Prospect Hall), Driscoll still suffers from excessive noise levels and certain notoriously windy tables, caused by poor ventilation patterns. On the positive side, the quality and cariety of food have improved markedly over the last three years and the salad bar is one of the best on campus.

Upstairs from the dining hall is Driscoll Lounge, a beautiful circular room refurnished two years ago. The twin fireplaces, warm interior and comfortable furnishings provide the perfect setting for house functions.

Letter: Sexism

To the editor:

On Monday night, we, the undersigned, drafted a letter to the editor which set forth our objections to the events of the Dodd House Pandemonious Affair. Specifically, we objected to the half-price admission for women, the wet T-shirt contest, and the go-go girl entertainment because of their sexist nature. The first, in effect, would buy female attandance by attracting women at reduced prices. The latter two would require and feed on sexist attitudes for the audience's enjoyment. Over ninety (90) people signed our original letter.

Many who signed commented that the posters themselves were particularly offensive. Although further inquiry revealed that the posters were misleading (e.g. the "go-go girl" entertainment included men) we believe that they were an affront because they attracted people for sexist reasons.

We are pleased that Dodd House reconsidered the character of the party and we admire the flexibility of the house officers in doing so. The wet t-shirt contest was cancelled and the admission fee was equalized for both sexes. We hope this situation will not arise again and we hope the party was a success.

Sincerely,
Virginia Long

Reformer discusses corporate law

by Paul A. Untch

"The large corporation in our society today is an amoeba grown into a whale", said Mark Green, Harvard Law graduate (1970) and corporate lawyer, currently working with Ralph Nader on investigations of abuses by American corporate firms. Green spoke at a lecture in Griffin Hall on Monday.

The conglomerates existing today are "fundamentally different institutions" than the companies begun at the turn of the century, Green stated. He said he believes that there are two myths which most Americans believe concerning the roles of corporations and lawyers. The first is that corporations are competitive, controlled by shareholders, and democratic (which means accountable to the people). The second is that lawyers provide all citizens with the representation that they are entitled to by law.

In reality, claimed Green, large firms are "tantamount to small governments" and far more powerful than the law allows, having an impact on international affairs, communities, private citizens, and future generations. Eventually, people in a community no longer have control over "externalities" that effect them directly. Externalities are costs of production to society for which it can not be compensated—air pollution is a prime example. Green believes that "externalities have fundamentally changed the American capitalist system".

The power of the corporations stems largely from their size and number. A few, large corporations can "agree" to keep prices at a certain level, rather than compete among themselves, which lowers prices. This coordination results in a "shared monopoly", which, Green stated, characterizes two-thirds of the American market. Furthermore, the effectiveness of Federal regulation, which can control the monopolistic tendencies of large corporations, is dependent upon "who populates the regulatory committees, who has the data on which regulation is based, who funds the candidates that are involved, and who has the best lawyers."

Another factor contributing to corporation power is the existing state charter system. A charter is a contract obtained from a state that allows a corporation to market and produce. The charter restrictions in the state of Delaware are the most lenient in the country, and Green noted that 251 out of the 500 largest corporations are chartered in Delaware. The result is that Delaware "lacks the resources and capacity to tell General Motors what to do, because it is smaller." The state simply doesn't have enough people to enforce the restrictions of its charter.

Green proposed a number of ways to redesign corporate law. To begin with, he suggested that corporate managers should be made more accountable to "countervaling powers." Green added that equal funding should be required, that clusters of shareholders should nominate the directors, and that the board should have its own staff, independent from the managerial staff, that reports to shareholders. In this way other groups than the managers have authority in company decision-making.

Information flow must also be increased, Green claimed. "The system assumes that consumers know a lot, and can make accurate judgments," he said, "but this is not true for the conglomerates." The privacy an individual can claim by law to prevent large organizations from intruding into his life, is being claimed by corporations to "restrict the knowledge of people they influence." Green suggested that corporations be required to disclose their financial performance in more regulated ways than currently used.

"Deconcentration" is another necessary step in lessening the power of giant corporations. This means breaking up the shared monopolies that dominate the American market, to stimulate competition. Federal charters for the largest 700 corporations would be an effective tool. Green said he believes the system of state charters, which was set up when companies were smaller than states themselves, is now outdated.

Another important change that Green advocated is a Bill of Rights for employees. At present the civil rights and liberties of many workers are being violated. "A citizen can stand in the street and disclaim the president of the United States, but an employee of a giant corporation can not disclaim its president without fear of harassment", he said.

The greatest difficulty in describing this inclusion group characterizing the diverse housing accommodations. Prospect, the more uniform of the two houses, is divided into three entries which are connected by bathrooms and suites. The suites consist of four interconnecting rooms, which can be subdivided into triples, doubles and singles, each with its own door, an arrangement that allows for as much privacy as the members of the suite desire. All of the rooms have huge windows which afford a clear view of the surrounding mountains. They have well designed desk-study areas and many have panelled walls.

The basement of Prospect has a very large game room for pool and ping pong, a social room—home of the famed "JB Room" parties—a kitchen, and a large study room.

Fitch and Currier room arrangements are not as easy to describe as those in Prospect. Beginning next year, Currier will no longer serve as an overflow house for Perry; nor will it house freshmen. The entire building will be occupied by Fitch House members resulting in a slight increase in the number of house affiliates.

It is important to stress the flexibility inherent in Currier where all of the rooms are located along hallways. The number of bedrooms that share a living room can be determined by house members before room draw.

Fitch itself is divided into three entries with rooms ranging from very large corner singles to three-room suites consisting of two small bedrooms and a generous living room.

Along with more objective criteria and room dimensions, the Berkshire Quad promises many of those hard to value intangibles.

Athletes' lament: road-trip blues

Season records to date:

Hockey: home, 6 wins, 3 losses; road, 2 wins, 7 losses. Basketball: home, 8 wins, 1 loss; road, 1 win, 7 losses.

Explanation—as yet unresolved.

Solution—well, here's where it gets to be a little more fun. Let's examine some of the possibilities.

Athletic Director Bob Peck could arrange to have the entire schedules of all athletic teams at Williams played at home. Nah, I doubt either Jerry Tarkanian or Ned Harkness arranging such a deal is very likely.

O.K., let's put it in the hands of the players to break the spell. Have basketball co-captain and resident miracle-worker Mike Tanner fitted with a pair of ruby slippers. Then have the frizzy-haired senior stand at half-court, click his heels together three times, while chanting, "There's no place like home, there's no place like . . .", ah, better not, even the thought of Tanner singing "Somewhere Over the Rainbow" hurts my eardrums.

How about this. Dim the lights in Lansing Chapman Rink. Bring senior goalie Chuck Cremens out on the ice on an elegant palomino, strumming a guitar and crooning the strains of "Home on the Range." Probably wouldn't work either; and besides, the crew at the rink would not enjoy cleaning you-know-what out of the workings of the zamboni.

Perhaps assistant coaches Jim Rodgers and Bob Peck should get together and deliver an ancient voodoo incantation over the DuFour Brothers bus company to rid it of all curses and assure all Eph teams of wins on the road.

All kidding aside, it's basically been the road blues which have prevented the two major Williams winter sports teams from attaining a record which stretches very far above mediocrity. Yet, at home, the squads have been a match for anyone. Only Bill McCormick's skaters' 10-3 drubbing at the hands of powerful Bowdoin is an example of a rout.

Williams isn't the only place this has happened. Even after the departure of John Wooden and the fall from the top of the NCAA heap of the UCLA basektball Bruins, the perennial Pac-8 champs remained nearly invincible at home. Philadelphia's Flyers were outskated and out-bullied to the NHL crown last year by Montreal, but lost few times on their own home ice.

In the case of the Williams basketball team, one visit to Lasell Gymnasium will help explain the phenomenon. And one game in the creaky, electric structure will turn an opposing player into a nervous old man. Witness the Middlebury squad which is reportedly still suffering stomach cramps from the apples it choked on in the final minutes of a winter study loss to Curt Tong's cagers.

Lasell's hanging rafters and on-top-of-the-action bleachers make visiting teams feel as though the Christians had it good in facing just one lion at a time. Imagine having to do battle with five pumped-up basketball players and stands full of some 800 lions, foaming at the mouth and chanting DEFENSE! DEFENSE!

The ancient cage is one of the buildings which the school will probably make obsolete in two or three years. But, regardless of the team stats good ole' Lasell gets three sure assists this year, in the wins over Yale, Middlebury, and Bowdoin. Let's make sure it gets another one tomorrow night against Wesleyan.

The problem is a little more difficult to resolve in the case of the hockey team. The lack of a preliminary frosh or jayvee game always makes the time from bus to face-off a little shorter than in hoop, and this could be part of the problem.

Whatever the reason, the fans in Chapman Rink have helped the Ephs to key wins over Boston State and UMass, while being noticeably absent during tough losses to Bowdoin and Colby. A full rink could spell upset Friday night against the Middlebury Panthers.

Fans of Williams, the winter's two biggest sports have treated this bastion of academic excellence to some real spine-tinglers in the rink and the gym. Warm up the vocal chords for Friday and Saturday night, and get ready to do some yelling.

McCormick's skaters have no chance of a post-season berth, but a good deal of pride is on the line after a 6-0 loss to Middlebury early in the year. Watch for some good hitting, Patch Mason and co. are rumored to be fired up.

For Tong's cagers, Tuesday's W.P.I. Contest takes them into their biggest Little Three game of the year. Wesleyan (a vastly improved 14-3 club) took the Ephs by ten in Middletown in January and the Ephs are primed for revenge. Time to raise the roof of Lasell. Tip-off is 8:00 Saturday night. Face-off is tonight at 7:00. See you there.

Purple cagers gun down WPI

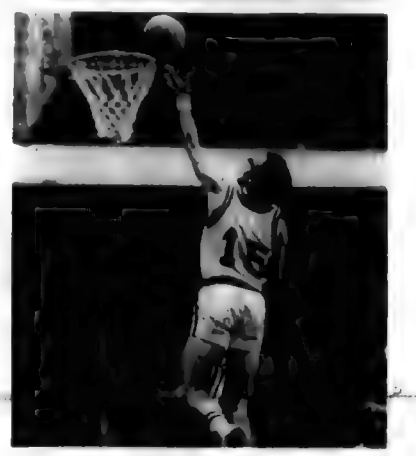
Matt Spangler had a total of 10 points against WPI.

by Andy O'Donnell

Take a little Rollerball, toss in a few Romans and some Christians, add a dash of Custer's last stand, sprinkle in a bit of the Alamo, and you'll begin to approximate the flavor of tomorrow night's Little Three showdown between our own Ephs and a 15-3 Wesleyan club that is every bit as good as its record indicates. Take notes, Dodd House, for this promises to be the definitive Pandemonious Affair.

The stage was set for the 150th meeting between the two schools Wednesday night as Williams utilized a 58-28 rebounding edge and a 27 point performance by Andy Straka to up its season record to 9-8 with an 89-77 triumph over W.P.I.

The Ephs will gladly put that win behind them and concentrate on the matters at hand, however, for simply put, they are in a must-win situation tomorrow night. Wesleyan is currently 2-0 in Little Three play, having defeated Williams (63-55) and Amherst (55-51) earlier in the year. Williams is 1-1, on the other hand, while Amherst is 0-2. Each team has two Little Three games remaining, but a victory by Wesleyan tomorrow night will clinch the Cardinals' first Little Three crown since 1972. A loss would leave all three clubs with a shot at part of the title.



The remarkable thing about the Wesleyan story this year is the fact that only three players returned from last year's dismal 5-15 team. But Coach Herb Kenny has ably mixed and matched some promising sophomores and a pair of surgically repaired veterans with that core of lettermen to form a solid unit that is a strong contender for a post season bid to the ECAC Division 11-111 tournament. The Cardinals won't impress you with any individual skills but as a unit they are definitely a force to be reckoned with.

On the other hand, the Cardinals will have to contend with Lasell, where Williams is 8-1 this season, and another jam-packed crowd that has been a major factor in those eight triumphs. The situation is very similar to this fall's football meeting between the two schools.

As already noted, Williams notched its eighth win at home Wednesday night against W.P.I. and the rebound statistics contain the story of the game. Brad Wolk, 18 rebounds, Matt Spangler, 13 rebounds, Tom Balderston, 8 rebounds. W.P.I., team, 28 rebounds.

With the Williams frontline controlling matters underneath and with Andy Straka connecting on 12 of 20 shots from the floor, Williams raced to a 43-37 halftime edge and then exploded for 12 unanswered points as the second half opened to comfortably put themselves in the driver's seat.

Mike Tanner followed Straka in the scoring column with 16 points, while Balderston, Wolk, and Spangler complemented their rebound totals with 12, 11, and 10 points respectively. As Wolk's 18 rebounds attest, the junior forward holds on to his caroms rather than drop them, and this reporter deserves to run three suicides with a hundred pound typewriter strapped to his back for incorrectly reporting that Wolk didn't control a rebound in the closing seconds of the first overtime against Brandeis last week. Wolk did indeed control the bound and managed to put up a last second shot that just missed.

Co-captain Mark Tanner racks up two Wednesday against WPI.

Squashmen top Trinity

by Evan Bash

The varsity squash team showed a flair for the dramatic Tuesday afternoon by providing Trinity with a glimpse of victory before suspensefully snatching it away through a come from behind 5-4 win. Williams' record advances to 9-4 with only next Tuesday's match versus Amherst remaining on the schedule.

Coach Dave Johnson was worried before the contest about the young Trinity team's potential for repeating Army's upset of the Ephs a week ago. As the match developed he had every right to be, for strong Trinity play and occasional Williams' complacency almost added up to disaster.

The odd positions played first and Trinity came away holding a surprising 3-2 edge. Chip Lindquist started the Ephs off on the right foot with an easy three game win and Jon Saunders followed suit, winning 3-1 in his first match at no. 9. Both captain Marc Reinhardt and no. 7 Charlie Haines appeared ready to almost put the match on ice as each won their first two games easily. They failed to put their men away, however, and Trinity received two important 3-2 wins. Pete Thayer never found his stride and lost 3-0 at position five.

And so the match hung in the balance as the evens took the court. At that point, No. 4 Martin Goldberg ran his winning streak to 10, meeting only token resistance in a 3-0 victory. Not quite so fortunate was Tim Belk at no. 7 as he dropped three straight close games. With the score now at 4-3 for Trinity, Jim Little pulled it all together when he needed it most, for a tough 3-2 win. Then no. 2 Arnie Cogswell clinched the triumph just moments later as he eked out the fourth game 18-17 for a personal and team victory.

Freshman Becky Chase (No. 3) readies a rail shot to pace the Ephwomen to a 7-0 victory over Dartmouth Wednesday. The netwomen also defeated Vassar Wednesday, 6-1. The victorious squad, now 8-3, easily shutout a weaker Smith team 7-0, on Monday.

13 schools arrive for Carnival skiing

Over 200 men and women skiers from 13 colleges throughout the East will compete in the 39th annual Williams Winter Carnival today and tomorrow. The carnival, which was cancelled last year due to warm weather, is third of four Division I competitions held every year in New England.

The University of Vermont and Dartmouth University, which finished first and second respectively in the first two carnivals hosted at each school, are ranked as favorite in the men's competition, while Middlebury is a definite favorite in the women's events. Middlebury will be defending its 1975 crown in both men's and women's competition. Williams won its own carnival officially for the only time in 1950.

Dartmouth, Middlebury, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Williams are entering both men's and women's teams, while Bates, Maine New England, Norwich and St. Lawrence are entering only the men's competition, and Colby-Sawyer, Johnson State, Plymouth State, and Cornell are competing in just women's events.

Ephmen finish fifth

The men's and women's giant slalom and cross country events were held earlier today, while tomorrow's events include the men's and women's slalom at 8:45 a.m. and men's jumping at 1:00 p.m., both at Berlin Mountain.

Williams finished fifth in both men and women's competition in the Dartmouth Winter Carnival last week. The men placed behind Vermont, Dartmouth, Middlebury, and Northern Michigan, while the women saw Middlebury win all three events to upset Vermont; Dartmouth finished third and New Hampshire scored two points more than the Ephwomen to take fourth. Williams finished fourth in the Vermont ski carnival two weeks ago, behind Vermont, Dartmouth and Middlebury.

Williams' Andy Mikell, who won two slaloms and was All-East Div. 1 first-team all-star last year, will face stiff competition from Middlebury's John Jacobs, who won the Dartmouth Carnival slalom, and Dartmouth's Jeff's Kahl, who won the Vermont Carnival slalom. John Macomber of Dartmouth, who competed last year on the U.S. Ski team and won his alma mater's giant slalom event this year, is favored in that event.

Fisher favors Mikell

Williams men's ski coach Bud Fisher will be looking to Mikell and Josh Dembinski to rack up points in the slalom and giant slalom. Mikell and Dembinski placed 10th and 12th in the Dartmouth slalom event, and 16th and 25th in the giant slalom. Captain Chris Welch placed 19th in the latter event.

Sophomore Jeff Magoon, captain Gary James, and NCAA qualifier Willy Schmidt lead the nordic effort for Williams. They finished 9th, 19th and 20th, respectively, last weekend. Schmidt, sophomore Tom Dodds and junior Scott Berry form the jumping contingent; Berry was 16th, Dodds 20th and Schmidt 32nd at Dartmouth.

"We continue to be fourth in the East," Fisher says. "We're really psyched about competing at home, and should at least maintain our fourth-place standing."

Women's ski coach Karen Fisher is also gearing towards a fourth-place finish this weekend. In their best effort ever, the women tied for second with New Hampshire in the slalom last week, behind high finishes (5th, 11th, and 16th) from Marty Epstein, Ashley Smith, and Marion Sherman. The women finished a disappointing 7th in the giant slalom, with Epstein posting an equally disappointing 13th, but Fisher hopes to see a fifth in that event this week.

The nordic crew finished 5th at Dartmouth, even without the strength of Anne Waters, a first team All-East selection last year and sister of Dartmouth cross country standout Ed Waters. Rachel Potter came in 14th, Ellen Toll 20th, and Gina Campoli, 23rd for Williams.

Poolpeople pursue Little 3, New England championships

by Dennis O'Shea

A fifth straight Little Three crown is the goal and the Wesleyan Cardinals the obstacle as the Eph swimmers celebrate Winter Carnival with their third and final junket down I-91 to Connecticut tomorrow morning.

Wesleyan's hopes for an undisputed Little Three title collapsed with a 61-52 loss to Amherst in the last relay several weeks ago, but a Redbird comeback in the season finale would create a three-way deadlock and keep the Ephs from outright possession of the championship for the first time since 1972.

Realistically, the Cardinals have little chance to upset their northern brethren, who knocked off the Lord Jeffs 75-38 in the season's first outing. Nine Eph Division III All-Americans grace coach Carl Samuelson's roster; Wes mentor Pat Callahan boasts but one.

That one, though, is diving threat Rick Dennett, 11th place finisher in the one meter competition at last year's small college NCAA's. With Purple boardwalker Jeff Erickson out of the water indefinitely with an ear injury, it's up to freshmen Dave Thomson and Greg Roux to thwart Dennett's clear shot at a pair of diving wins and 10 Cardinal points.

Wesleyan frosh distanceman Ed Denton is Callahan's only other real potential hotshot. Denton is ranked five places but only four seconds behind Purple paddler Stuart Deans in the 1000 free New England listings, and if he eats his Wheaties tomorrow morning he'll give Deans a real run for it in both the 1000 and the 500.

Rhode Island for New England Women's Swimming and Diving Championships this afternoon and tomorrow. Nine Williams women, rather than the usual three or four, are entered in this year's capstone to regional women's swimming.

"We finished about in the middle of the pack last year," noted coach Carl Samuelson, "but it's very difficult to predict how much we'll be able to improve on that this year." The Ephwomen's improved depth and the Ivy League's defection to their own conference meet should be of some help, but the Purples long layoff from competition since the end of their 5-0 dual meet season in November has to hurt.

As of this writing the final lineup had not been set, but Nina Murphy is expected to go the 50, 100 and 200 yard backstroke, while Carol-Ann Smalley handles the distance freestyle events. Keron Walker and Joanna Monroe will cover the butterfly, and Walker will join Marilla Pearsall in sprint and middle distance freestyle and the individual medley.

Samuelson will round out his entries with captain Randall Morrow and Ann Youngling in the sprints, Laurie Norton in the diving and Sue Tuttle in the breaststroke.

The Williams Record

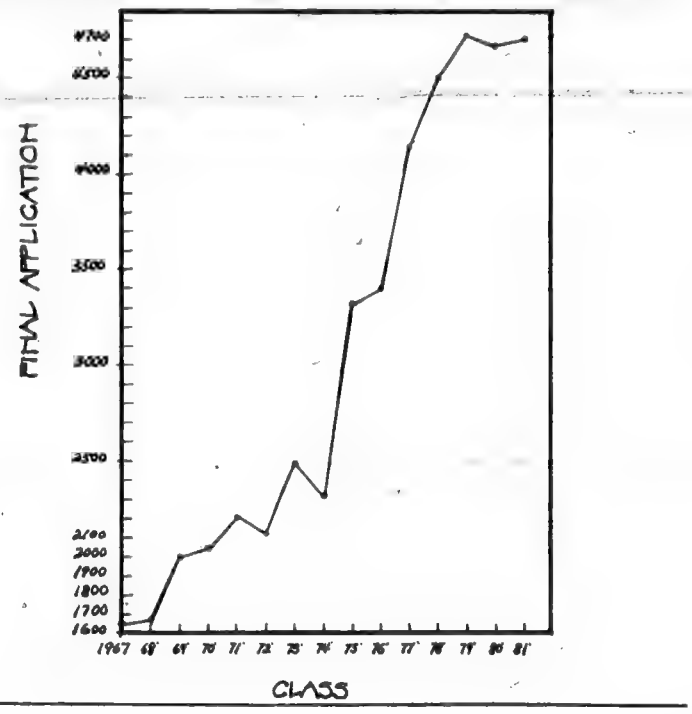
4700 prospective freshmen apply



The Admissions Office received approximately 4700 applications for the Class of 1981, less than one per cent shy of the 4735 from last year. Philip Smith, Director of Admissions, said that he had expected an even greater drop from last year's total because the Class of 1980 applicant pool was the largest ever.

From this sampling of high school seniors, which Smith describes as a "very strong group," the Admissions Office has set the number 475 as the target for the Class of '81. Last year, the office found that 483 students decided to matriculate, which led to housing difficulties. The percentage of men was 57 per cent, while women composed 43 per cent of the class of '80. Smith said he expects from 55-60 per cent of the class of 1981 to be men.

Fortunately, there will be more flexibility next year with the housing. Renovations in Lehman and Fayerweather added several rooms last summer. These can be changed from male to female as deemed necessary to fit the class.

The number of black applicants fell ten per cent from the 183 received last year. This percentage, Smith warned, is suspect statistically because very small numbers are involved. He stated that this not unexpected fall reflects a three-year-old national trend.

Williams admitted 161 early decision students in December. The number of early decision acceptances represents a larger percentage of the entire projected class than last year.

Council seeks nominations

The Elections Committee is accepting self-nominations for the positions of College Council president, vice-president, at-large representative, and for four positions on the Committee on Educational Policy, four on the Committee on Undergraduate Life, and probably four positions on the Honor and Discipline Committee, said Vice-president Randy Sturges.

Self-nominations should be submitted to the Deans' Office by noon on Tuesday March 1, added Sturges. The Record will print the names of all announced candidates for any of the above offices.

According to Sturges, the election will be conducted in residential houses by house College Council representatives and among Freshmen by freshman CC representatives in Baxter.

The president and vice-president, who Sturges described as "a link between the student body and the College," must be either sophomores or juniors when elected. The president presides at College Council meetings, but does not vote except in the case of a tie. The vice-president replaces the president when the latter is unable to carry out his duties, and is chairman of the Elections Committee. Students will also select six at-large representatives.

Students will elect one representative to the CEP from each academic division and one at-large representative. Upperclass students will vote for one from the division in which they are a major or intend to major, and for one at-large. Freshmen may vote for and run for only the at-large position. The CEP is charged with recommending educational policy such as degree and major requirements, and oversees the College curriculum.

Students will also select one at-large representative to the CUL. In addition, members of the freshman, sophomore, and junior classes will also elect one representative from their respective classes. The CUL is responsible for all non-academic aspects of student life, such as parietal regulations and advising services.

Monetary incentives?

Conservation program considered

The Committee on the Campus Environment, an ad hoc group of students and faculty, is considering the practicality of developing a campus-wide energy conservation incentive program.

Proposals for incentives applicable to the entire campus were discussed at an open meeting last Monday, Feb. 14. The suggestion for a campus-wide program followed the College's acceptance of the concept of linking summer research grants to energy use reductions in Division III classrooms and laboratories, participants in the meeting indicated.

Assistant Professor of Geology John C. Dohrenwend noted that the College could reduce costs substantially by closing classroom buildings earlier in the day, reducing thermostats to 55 degrees at night, pulling down shades over windows in rooms not in use and reducing the amount of lighting in classrooms. He added that measurements in Clark Hall revealed that light intensities there were "several times the minimum state standards."

William T. Fox, Edward Brust Professor of Geology and Mineralogy, who informally chaired the meeting, stated that the purpose of last Monday's meeting was to discuss the development of incentives such as the research grants for Division III which would lead to similar savings outside the science quad. According to Fox, he and several participants at the meeting will discuss the concept of a campus-wide program with Provost Neil R. Grabois late this week.

Assistant Professor of Physics John W. Shelton noted that the College may find it difficult to find a set of incentives that will have wide appeal on campus. Most speakers in the ensuing debate agreed that only monetary incentives would be universally effective with students.

Ergathon

The Williams College Boat Club will begin its second annual 24-hour Ergathon on Friday. When the clock strikes 12:00 noon, Baxter Hall will begin humming to the tune of the crew's ergometer, that infamous rowing machine. All of the more than fifty oarsmen and oarswomen will have their chances to run up some big scores during their two fifteen minute pieces. These individual scores are important, as the contributions that the participants are now soliciting are based on the number of revolutions that each person can generate during his or her pieces. The proceeds from this ergathon will be used to defray the costs of the spring trip to Washington, D.C.

Freshman Inclusion

Dodd-Tyler: this year's new model

Dodd

by Dominic DiBiccaro

For the first time in its three year existence, Dodd House has appropriately been removed from its old freshman inclusion category with the Berkshire Quad and has finally been given full status as a row house. Now, it has been grouped with Tyler House in one of the most attractive housing categories ever offered a freshman class since the end of fraternities.

Until 1974, Dodd House was the old Williams Inn, and the smaller satellite buildings were overflow housing for other row houses. Then as the College expanded enrollment, new housing was needed.

Virtually all the members of the house live in Dodd or in one of the surrounding "outhouses": the Annex, Goodrich, Sewall, Hubbell, and Parsons Houses. In all, Dodd House contains 127 members (and with JA's, off-campus affiliates, and some members who temporarily live in Seely House, the total is 147) making Dodd the largest and most diverse House on the College campus.

Dodd can therefore, offer a unique living style for those who seek more privacy than the Greylock Quad offers, and those for whom the row houses still tingle with the fraternal atmosphere. The rooms at Dodd are not arranged on the suite or entry principle as those in Mission or the Berkshire Quad. Eighty-per cent of the rooms are singles with just a handful of doubles scattered among the six buildings. Consequently, most of the rooms, including the doubles, have private baths. The rest have connecting baths that are shared by two or three people.

The latter situation sometimes puts demands upon a residential house for the option of single sex living. The main building is a co-ed house while the outhouses (except Hubbel and the Annex) offer the alternative of single sex living for both males and females. And to make this package more attractive, Goodrich house has its own completely furnished kitchen, Goodrich has alternated between male and female single sex housing over the past three years.

While it is true that in general row house dining is excellent, the food at Dodd is often superior.

In a campus survey conducted last spring by the CUL, the food at Dodd rated a 4.2 on a scale of 5—second best of the eleven dining hall units at Williams. (In case you're wondering which house got the best 4.3 rating and why, try to get yourself invited to Wood House sometime).

The source of this epicurean phenomenon rests with Dodd's chef, Peter Brazeau, a giant of a man who is not only cook but big brother, handyman, bookie, and sometimes poker player. Largely through his efforts, the dining hall, located in the main building has been the focus of a true social experience for the house members. It is here that the house comes together twice a day to gossip, discuss classes and homework, pour over the world's problems, or just meet other people.

On any given day Dodd attracts students and faculty from other parts of campus who wish to take advantage of the dining hall and its atmosphere.

Dodd House also offers a huge lobby containing a bar room with a billiards table, a living room, a TV room, and the highly successful Student Art Gallery where each week wine and cheese herald a new opening for the talents of the students. Dodd House can offer a variety of social experiences to the freshpersons looking for diversity, or those looking for a particular life style.

Tyler

by Tom Gardner

A quick glance at any Williams College map will reveal the major complaint about Tyler House—distance. Any house member will take great pains, however, to dispel the notion that the residents of Tyler are cut off from the campus. Located in the northwest corner of the campus across from the Infirmary, Tyler is a brisk five minute walk from Baxter and Sawyer, and is next-door neighbors with Mission Park. The location, situated next to Poker Flats and Cole Field, is ideal for cross-country skiers and intramural sports freaks.

Tyler House includes both the main house and its adjacent affiliate, Tyler Annex. Members of both the house and Annex eat in the House dining room, a cozy eating area that features high quality lunches and dinners daily excepting Sunday dinner. On Sunday morning the much-admired Tyler brunch is featured, where Chef John Raby prepares personal orders while you wait from a wide variety of breakfast offerings from 10:30 AM until noon.

The dining room is located on the first floor of the house, as are the spacious living room, the T.V. room and a library where house members often take refuge for late-night booking. The recently refurbished basement can be used for private or house parties or for ping pong and air hockey.

The rooms in the house range from the Presidential suite (with a bay window and private bath) to a converted janitor's closet that is reserved for the low person in room draw. In between these extremes is a fine selection of layouts and views, with ample floor space. Twenty-five of the twenty-eight rooms in the house are singles, and some have fireplaces of their own.

Both buildings of Tyler are co-ed, with approximately a 5:3 male to female ratio. There has been some tension in the past centering around the co-ed bathrooms on the 2nd and 3rd floors of the house, but generally the misunderstandings are quickly resolved. Noise is a problem, on party night, when an early sleep is next to impossible.

Noise is not a problem in the Annex, although it is right next door. The Annex has very definite plusses and minuses, but most occupants are more than satisfied with their living arrangements. Although the 42 singles are uniform in layout, there are other distinguishing features, the most important being whether your room is on the "mountain" or "driveway" side. You either get a glorious view of Pine Cobble or watch the cars go by. You can find numerous ways to cover up the white cinder block walls, but finding ways to cut the inter-room noise may be tougher.

The biggest asset of the Annex is that for every two rooms there is one connecting bathroom, with its own shower. Incoming sophs are perhaps impressed with this privacy than any other factor of Annex life. The Annex

Editorial

Reform under status quo

While the rejection of the proposed new College Council constitution by a 23 per cent turnout of the student body represents a psychological defeat for the council, its practical effects can be minimal. Several of the most important reforms which the new constitution would have implemented can be, and should be, instituted under the current structure.

According to CC vice-president Randy Sturges, the portion of the new constitution which was potentially the most important was Article VII, section 7. This section called for CC committees which would parallel the student-faculty committees and present them with information regarding student opinion. The council has the authority to establish such committees now, without writing them into its constitution, and should do so.

A second reform which the council can enact immediately is the recording and codification of its by-laws and procedural precedents. The council need not wait for a constitutional amendment to keep track of what it says and does.

Another reform, that dealing with expulsion procedures for non-attendance, is actually present in the existing constitution and need only be enforced to be effective.

The College Council should view its constitution as a flexible guideline, not an all-inclusive document. Various reforms which the council feels are important need not wait until a new constitution is drafted which the student body will ratify.

also has two well-equipped kitchens with an oven, stove and refrigerator, used mostly for Sunday night dinners and to make entries in hotly contested Tyler House baking contests.

The advantages of row house living are numerous, the most important being a greater sense of house unity without compromising the diverse personalities that make up the house. This is a function of both the "homey" atmosphere of the living quarters and the private dining area. At Tyler, these factors are especially important, as most house members get to know each other quickly. Traditionally there has been no overflow to other parts of the campus, keeping all 75 house members under two adjacent roofs.

For those who argue that Tylerites tend to be isolated, one only has to point to the House's highly successful history of attracting people from all over the campus to its top quality parties. House members tend to think of its location as an asset, not only for its beautiful setting and exquisite view of Pine Cobble, but also for its escape value from the high-speed movement of center-of-campus life. One can and does visit Mission, Sawyer, Greylock, or Spring Street, but can always retreat to Tyler if the pace gets too hectic.

Ultimate frisbee club forming for competitive sport

An Ultimate Frisbee club is now being organized as a Williams club sport, and matches have been scheduled for the spring.

U.F. is a field game played with the Wham-O Master frisbee. The field is sixty yards by forty yards of playing zone with two thirty-yard endzones. The object is for one person of a seven person team to land a frisbee into a teammate's hand(s) over their defense's end-line.

So far Club founder Byrne Kelly and U.F. advisor Coach Curt Tong have appropriated a field by Cole Field House pending realization of the U.F. Club. One quarter's physical education credit has been approved, with credit being awarded retroactive with participation, as in rugby. A schedule is being compiled and arranged with matches both indoors and outside from April 4 until May 20.

The club needs at least 21 people to form a team. For more information contact Byrne Kelly at 6654 or through the campus mail system.

Letter of thanks

Editor,

The 1977 Winter Carnival is now past. Skiers have returned home, slopes have been cleared and most hangovers from Saturday night have given way to a better state of health!

I would like to thank students, faculty, and college departments that made the Carnival successful. This year over 300 students helped in the preparation and administration of Carnival. Everyone did a truly exceptional job and deserves to be congratulated. Hopefully, long after the snow melts and we have forgotten Carnival, we will all remember some of the lessons we have learned and friends that we made while pooling our mutual efforts to get the thing off the ground and flying. If we do, then the hours and hours spent were well worth while.

A special thanks goes to Coach Ralph Townsend who, after having put on over a score of Williams Carnivals could administrate a perfect event every time, allowed all of us to make our own plans and our own mistakes as we planned for Carnival.

Everyone who had a part in the administration or preparation of Carnival is invited to a party in Garfield House on Friday night from 9:00 to whenever. Once again, thank you very much!

Sincerely;
Buzz Inboden and the Winter Carnival Committee

Recycling needs boost

Seniors Byrne Kelly and Reed Zars cited a study they had made of energy conservation possiblities in a typical Greylock house in suggesting that the potential cost reductions available would make a rebate of $50-$70 per student possible.

Several participants noted that ideally much of this money should go into further energy conservation steps such as storm window insulation. Dohrenwend proposed that some percentage of the final rebate be given to the residential house and part to individual students to offer incentives for savings in rooms and common areas.

Monitoring conservation of heat by residential houses is presently impossible because the College does not measure steam flows to individual buildings. According to Zars, several inexpensive monitoring techniques could be used. Shelton noted that there are no unsolvable technical problems in monitoring a campus-wide incentive program.

Interview with a Williams sexist

Another journalistic coup for THEY WRITE BY NIGHT! Our investigative associate Bess Whitten attended last Thursday's "Pandemonious Affair" in an attempt to procure an interview with one of the controversial Williams sexists. To disguise her association with these pages as well as her status as a Williams Women Terrorist, she attended the affair in a damp t-shirt. The interview took place afterwards in Hopkins 10, where the chauvinist pig lives.

SEXIST: Uh, is this being taped? I didn't think . . . I'd hate to be recognized . . .

BESS WHITTEN: Don't worry Phil, complete anonymity is assured.

SEXIST (PHIL): It's just that I'm not very popular to begin with, you know?

BESS: Yeah, I know. Now Phil, are you a "closet sexist"?

PHIL: Well, around girls, yeah. Around guys I sort of talk tough and sexist-like. In public I try to seem more liberal. I've stopped holding doors for homely girls, and I read Ms. in the snack bar sometimes.

BESS: You read Ms.?

PHIL R: Yes. I steal it from the Newsroom. Thank God for down jackets. I'd be too embarassed to buy it.

BESS: But what do you think of it?

PHIL RA: Actually, I don't read it; I just sit flipping through the pages. I don't know, it sort of bores me. Oh—maybe you shouldn't print that . . .

BESS: What sexist literature do you read?

PHIL RAN: Well, Field and Stream can be pretty exclusive. Oh—I read Playboy sometimes.

BESS: Don't you think that the women in Playboy are being presented as sex objects?

PHIL RANS: Uh . . . yeah.

BESS: Tell us, do you ask girls on dates with the intention of "scoring off them?" In other words, to gain sexual favors?

PHIL RANST: Well, not here at Williams. But I have done that in my home town, and once when I was in California.

BESS: Road-tripping?

PHIL RANSTO: To California? No, I was visiting my sister.

BESS: Do you road-trip?

PHIL RANSTON: I don't have a car.

BESS: Do you mean to tell us that you've never road-tripped?

PHIL RANSTON '78: Well, I tried to hitch to Holyoke for a mixer once but got stuck in Pittsfield.

BESS: Did you "score"?

PHIL RANSTON '78: In Pittsfield?!

BESS: Never mind; let's get to the heart of the matter. What about this "Pandemonious Affair," or the "Sexist Convention of the Year." Why did you go to that?

PHIL: Well, I make it a policy here at Williams to attend any event which from the start looks like it might be fun. I've attended two such things in three years. What were they now? Damn it. I should know them by heart. Oh—"The Anal Gland in The Woodchuck" and the first WGSO meeting. I thought I'd meet some nice girls at the WGSO but they were very cold.

BESS: You thought the "Pandemonious" thing was going to be fun?

PHIL: Well, I don't mean fun. I mean the Williams kind of fun.

BESS: And what is that?

PHIL: "Put on a load and hit the road."

BESS: Excuse me?

PHIL: Oh come on; you know, "stand in a queue to dance with a 'moo'."

BESS: What are you talking a . . .

PHIL: Oh, give me a break! Everyone knows what a fun night at Williams includes: "Cheap talk, expensive beer; go home at night and shed a tear."

BESS: . . . oh . . . I . . .

PHIL: Don't you understand? Don't you women have similar thoughts on the Williams scene?

BESS: Well, actually, yes.

PHIL: C'mon. 'fess up.

BESS: Well . . . "Popcorn at night, kill the light."

PHIL: See? See what I mean? Everybody agrees, it's just . . . Oh, I don't know. Hey, why don't you come and sit over here by me?

BESS: . . . well, I am on assignment . . .

PHIL: That's better. That's a nice t-shirt you have on.

PHIL & BESS: . . . . . .

BESS: . . . I . . . got it . . . a . . . little . . . damp .

PHIL: yeah

BESS: . . . oh, I meet the greatest guys through The Record! . . .

Lehman paintings arrive

by Mimi David

As the Metropolitan Museum of Art welcomed the collection from Robert and Philip Lehman with the opening of the Lehman Pavilion, the Williams College museum of Art celebrates the collection of Governor (class of 1899) and Mrs. Herbert H. Lehman this week until February 28 upstairs at Lawrence. Governor and Mrs. Lehman have generously divided their collection of paintings between the college museum and the Clark Art Institute. A small group of mostly French and some Dutch paintings, two Chinese paintings and a few prints and drawings will be on exhibit. It sounds eclectic but there is a definite unity and purpose to the show—more than just a melange of nice pictures.

Franklin W. Robinson, new director of the Williams College Museum of Art, describes the exhibition as a short "history of French painting in the nineteenth century." One begins with two works from the Barbizon school of the 1850's by Jules Dupre and Narcisse Virgile Diaz. The later proto- or pre-impressionist period is represented by the work of Charles-Francois Daubigny and Henri Harpignies. Continuing the time sequence with probably the most outstanding painting in the exhibit, is the impressionist work by Camille Pissaro entitled, "On the Banks of the Oise," dated 1877. It is an interesting Pissaro in that one senses his transition from "large brushstrokes and palette knife technique to small dots and hatchings." It is simply a beautiful Impressionist painting with all the romantic appeal of the French countryside. Completing the French history is a painting by Maximilien Luce, a British post-Impressionist painter and a friend of Pissaro's.

Robinson commented that to remind us of "what's going on outside France" there are two Dutch works. One is by Anton Mauve, a teacher of Van Gogh, and the other by Bernardus Johannes Blommers. Two interesting Chinese works of the late 18th-early 19th century are also on exhibit. One is on silk, entitled "Two Ducks," and the other on paper, entitled "Four Birds."

In general, there are relatively few works on exhibit yet much to see and much to learn.

Performance Thursday

Marlboro music returns to Clark

The celebrated Music from Marlboro musicians will return to the northern Berkshires this Thursday at 8:30. Eight artists will comprise the chamber music ensemble which will perform works by Mozart, Schubert and Hummel at the Clark Art Institute. Students are admitted free.

The opening number, Mozart's Quartet in F major for Oboe and Strings, was written in January or February of 1781, the period of Idomeneo. Chamber music with oboe is comparatively rare in the literature and such pieces were usually written with a particular oboist in mind. In this instance he was Friedrich Ramm of Munich, of whom it was said that no one was able to approach him in beauty, roundness and softness of tone, and trumpet-like depth of his forte. This Thursday Rudolph Vrbsky will be the featured oboist.

Schubert's String Trio in B-flat is one of only two surviving string trios by this composer, both in the key of B flat: the first, in a single movement dating from 1861, and this one, written in 1817, complete in four movements. To conclude the evening, Johann Hummel's Septet in D minor will be performed. Hummel, who lived with Mozart for two years, was a brilliant pianist and composer. This piece, his best-known work, was first performed in 1818. It opens with an allegro in which the piano is given florid passage-work. The melodic line is generally carried by the flute while the horn comes to the fore in some very difficult passages. The second movement has a capricious feeling, and the third movement is a set of variations on a folk-like theme which is introduced by the piano with the other instruments gradually joining in. After this quiet movement the finale (vivace) is all the more impressive. The viola leads off with a short fugue subject, and then the various instruments spell each other in a fascinating give and take until they reach the tempestuous ending.

The musicians who will perform Thursday evening are: Beth Levin, a pianist who has studied with Rudolf Serkin and is now at the New England Conservatory; Caroline Levine, a violist who has had an active career in the New York area; Daniel Phillips, a violinist who was the recent winner of the Bronze Medal of the Leipzig International Competition and the 1976 Young Concert Artists International Auditions; Julius Levine, a double bass specialist, who has appeared as guest artist with the Budapest, Juilliard, Guarneri and Amadeus String Quartets; Rudolf Vrbsky, an oboist who has received many honors and been a participant at the Marlboro Music Festival since 1971; Lisa Lancaster, a cellist who has performed widely in chamber music concerts; Judith Mendenhall, a flutist who has been heard in solo recitals throughout the country; and Robert Routch who has already had a very distinguished career as a French horn player, having performed as a soloist and as a member of chamber groups around the country.

Lisa Lancaster, cellist, will perform works by Mozart, Schubert and Hummel with the Music from Marlboro ensemble this Thursday at 8:30 at the Clark Art Institute.

Arts Council to host fellowship conference

The Northern Berkshire Council of the Arts has announced that Susan Channing and Jennifer Dowley will be at the North Adams Sheraton Inn this Friday at 4 P.M. to discuss the Artists Fellowship Program of the Massachusetts Arts and Humanities Foundation. This is the state funded program that awards fellowships of $3,000 each to over 50 Massachusetts artists annually. The categories that the fellowships are awarded in are: painting, printmaking, sculpture, photography, poetry, fiction, playwriting, choreography, music composition, film and video.

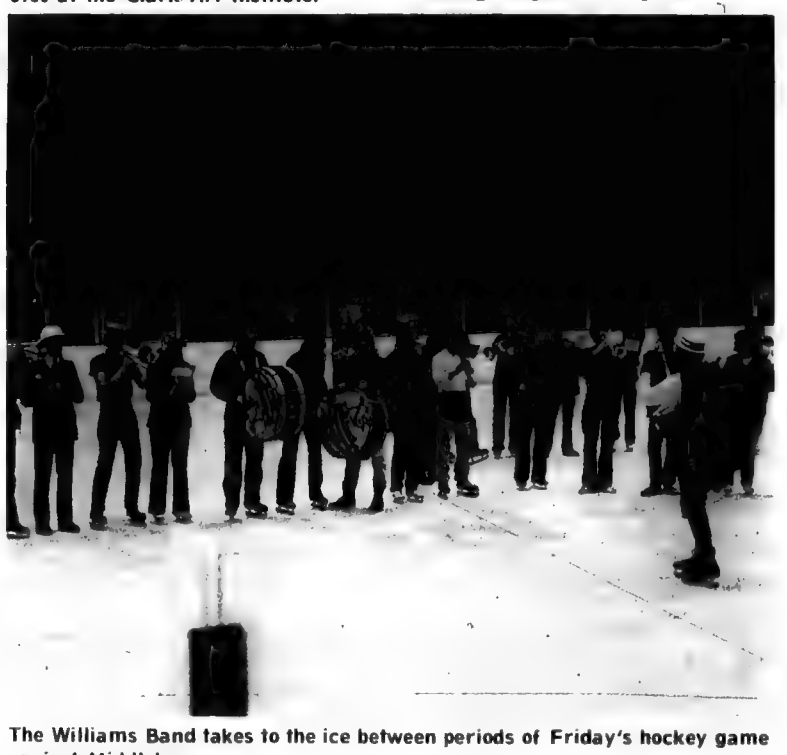
There will be a 20 minute slide presentation of some of the work done by recipients. Marilyn and Bill Giersbach of Williamstown, two Fellowship recipients this year will also be present. Application forms will be available and can also be obtained at the Council office. The meeting is open to the public.

Student Kim Verzyl to stage own art exhibit in New York

If you were in Baxter Hall last week, you may have wondered why there were posters advertising an upcoming art exhibit at a New York museum. The posters were in fact announcing an exhibit of the works of Kim Greer Verzyl, a junior here at Williams. Verzyl, a 21-year-old Art History major, will open her exhibit at the Nicholas Roerich Museum on February 27. The museum which will house her show until March 27 is located at 319 West 107 Street in New York City.

Verzyl describes her work as "essentially figurative, coloristic and expressionistic." Her 30 piece one-woman show which she has spent 18 months preparing will display a wide variety of her works. Unique among these are her portraits of other artists. Working from black and white photographs, Verzyl has painted portraits of such people as Dylan Thomas, Patti Smith and Barbra Streisand.

Although this will be Verzyl's third one-woman show, it is her first in New York City. "What I'm trying to do at this point is give myself experience and exposure," Verzyl explained. For a young artist, a New York show is a major accomplishment.



Verzyl will be present at the Roerich museum for the opening of her exhibit this Sunday afternoon from 2:00 to 5:00. She emphasized that anyone is invited to attend.

Dance Society to perform new work by Dewey

Tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the Dodd House Living Room, the Williams College Dance Society will hold a meeting open to all. Following the meeting, the premiere studio performance of Joy Anne Dewey's new work "Quartet" will be given.

Dewey choreographed "Quartet" to music composed by Stephen Dankner in 1971 called "Dans un temps sombre". The taped performance of this piece features Ronald Teco on violin, Nadine Asin on alto flute, Denis Smiley on bass clarinet, and Karen Lindquist on Harp.

The dancers performing "Quartet" are Julie B. Bermant '80, Judith A. Dayton '79, Nina L. Girvetz '77, and Margaret A. Herrman EX. Following the performance refreshments will be served.

The Williams Band takes to the ice between periods of Friday's hockey game against Middlebury.

With just eight seconds remaining in the opening period, Middlebury started a trend which was to continue throughout the game: last-second goals. Tom O'Hara scored to give the Panthers a lead which they were never to relinquish.

Mark Babcock and Buzz Woodworth scored within a minute of each other to increase the Middlebury lead to 5-2 before Bob Duffy broke the scoring drought on feeds from Barney Walsh and John Bessone.

Sophomores Chip Hagy and Harris picked up the final two Middlebury goals of the period, each beating Chuck Cremens in one-on-one situations. The Purple's senior net-minder totalled 30 saves on the night.

Zeller scored his second goal of the night fifty-five seconds into the final period on assists from Jim Rooney and Jim Hield, but the tally only held off the final Middlebury onslaught of the game. Led by Bostwick's pair, the visitors scored the game's last four goals to set the final count at 11-4.

Williams returns to action Tuesday night with a 7:30 home contest against Division II foe Hamilton. The Continentals dropped Williams 8-7 on their own home ice in early December, but have been struggling since. Williams has three games remaining, with a .500 season riding on a clean sweep.

Meanwhile, Peter Howd turned his attention from the medley to the 100 freestyle, which he split with junior sprinter R. J. Connelly. This set things up for a Dave Amlicke-Phil Wild 1-2 in the 200 backstroke that clinched the visitors' win five events before the seniors took their traditional season's end dunking.

Tom and Bill Beckett, and Paul vom Eigen and Chris Clark tallied the other Eph sweeps in the 50-free and 200 breaststroke.

The natators closed the regular season with a 5-4 mark that includes wins over every Division III opponent, and a pair of very, very close last relay losses to a Division I and a Division II team.

Maine, Southern and Springfield are the popular favorites for the New England title to be decided at the league championships next week, but the Ephs proved with last year's surprise third place finish just what a shaved down, psyched up small college can accomplish there.

way back to six, 47-41, with 9:02 left and again (63-57) with just 1:30 remaining, but some clutch free throw shooting by Kelly and Straka kept the Cardinals from coming any closer.

Williams actually won the game from the line, connecting on 15 of 22 attempts and enjoying the bonus situation for the final five minutes of the game. Wesleyan outshot the Ephs from the floor, 30-28, but only visited the line seven times in the game.

Assisting Straka in the scoring column for Williams was Spangler with 13 points and Kelly and Mike Tanner with 10 apiece. Brad Wolk and Spangler also hauled down 12 rebounds apiece.

In the preliminary game, the Williams JV's chalked up their eighth win in their last nine outings with a 61-58 triumph over their Wesleyan counterparts.

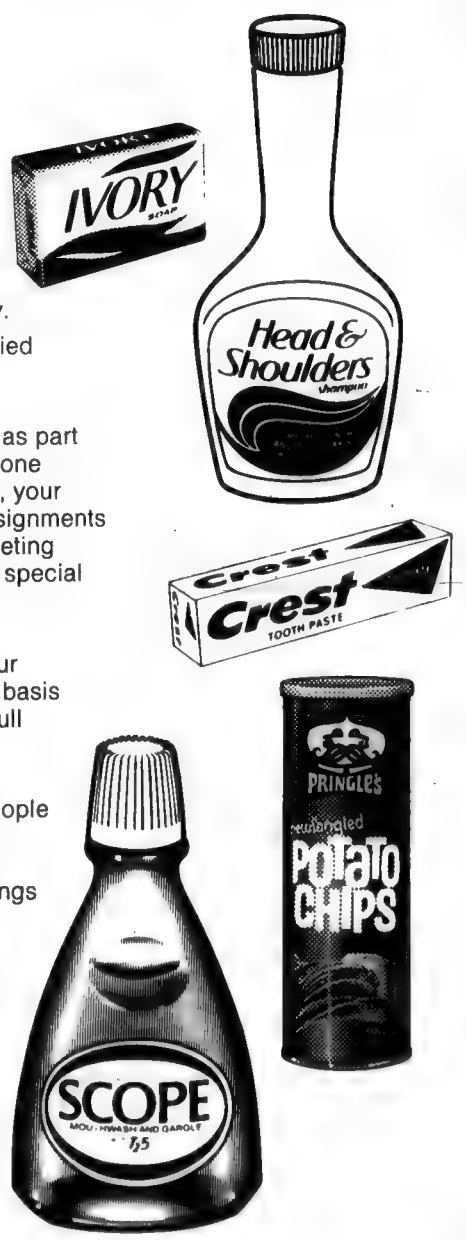
Ask Procter & Gamble what you can do with your BA degree!

You could become the advertising/marketing manager for one of these P&G products!

Although only 5 are shown here, Procter & Gamble makes more than 50 well-known, well-advertised consumer brands.

For each brand, there is a small management group, usually just 3 people, totally responsible for planning, creating and supervising everything that is done to increase consumer acceptance of their brand.

The group is headed by a Brand Manager, an important level of management in our company.



Right now, we're looking for a few highly qualified college seniors with the potential to become Brand Managers.

You would start at our Cincinnati headquarters as part of a brand group for a specific brand, perhaps one of those shown here. To help you learn quickly, your Brand Manager would give you challenging assignments of increasing responsibility in various key marketing areas such as TV advertising, package design, special promotions, budget planning and analysis, and market research.

The emphasis would be on you, your ideas, your ability to contribute. You'll be promoted on the basis of merit alone. It's not uncommon to become a full Brand Manager within 3-4 years.

Since you will begin to manage from the day you join us, we're looking for "take charge" people with outstanding records of leadership while in college. "Superior academic achievement", "innovative", "a record of being able to get things done", and "good oral and written communications skills" are some of the words we use to describe the people we want.

If this kind of work interests you and you think you qualify, please send me your resume.

Cagers roast Cardinals, 71-64 to remain alive in Little Three

by Andy O'Donnell

To paraphrase what the folks at Miller are wont to say: If you've got the record, we've got the gym. Lasell and its congregation of 900 faithful once again weaving the magic spell that has helped produce eight victories in nine home games this year, the varsity basketball team shot down the high flying Cardinals of Wesleyan University Saturday night by a 71-64 count.

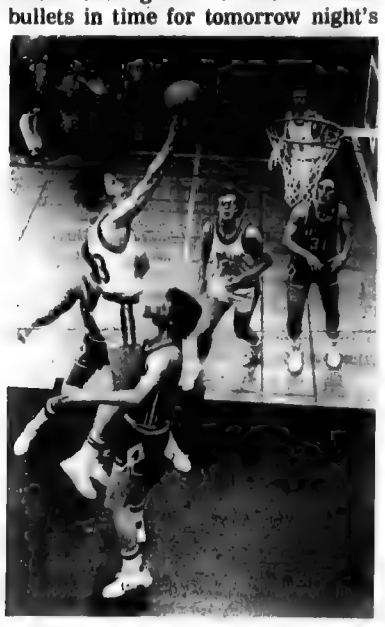
The Ephs will barely have time to reload their guns with more Straka bullets in time for tomorrow night's home encounter with Division 11 powerhouse Hartford, easily the best team to visit Lasell this season with the possible exception of Yale.

But for the moment Coach Tong's charges can savor the fact that they've already equalled last season's total number of victories (10) with three games still left to play and also the fact that they've now thrown Little Three proceedings into a tizzy and given Amherst a large say in the final outcome.

At present, both Williams and Wesleyan are 2-1 in Little Three action while Amherst is 0-2. Both Williams and Wesleyan, however, must close out Little Three affairs at Amherst, and there's no way Mr. Rehnquist and company will allow this Saturday's Williams-Amherst rematch to turn into another purple cupcake.

Amherst has yet to see a fellow named Andy Straka, and you can be sure Coach Rick Wilson will be on the phone to Wesleyan mentor Herb Kenny following Straka's devastation of Kenny's club this weekend.

Coming off of 22 and 27 point performances against Brandeis and W.P.I. last week, Straka struck for a game high 26 points this time around (17 in the second half) while shooting a solid 12 for 22 from the floor.



Straka and Gerry Kelly carried the Williams offensive load in a slow paced first half, combining for 15 points against the Wesleyan man-to-man to give Williams a precarious 25-21 lead at the half.

That was just a warm-up compared to the torrent of bombs the freshman unleashed in the second half. Firing away as if he were on commission from the Defense Department, the diminutive freshman opened the second half by tossing in three projectiles from the vicinity of Thidwig's left antler to give Williams its largest lead of the night, 31-23.

Matt Spangler also got into the act, bulling his way inside for a couple of rebound buckets to complement three more of Straka's patented stutterstep, pop, and swish efforts and up the Eph margin to 43-29 and 12:33 remaining.

Wesleyan methodically inched its

Panthers bury skaters, 11-4

by Tim Layden

Neither a Winter Carnival near-capacity crowd of 1,800 nor all the revenge motives in the world were enough to cool off the red-hot Middlebury hockey Panthers as the invaders from the northern wilds of Vermont skated to an easy 11-4 win over Coach Bill McCormick's Ephmen.

The loss dropped Williams to 8-11 on the season, including a disappointing 4-11 slate in Division II. The Panthers raised their overall mark to 12-6 with the win, including nine wins in their last ten tries.

The determined Ephs came out flying early, and Rick Zeller got the hosts on the board at 1:49 with an unassisted goal. Jeff Doyle quickly dispelled all notions that the Panthers had left their game somewhere outside of Rutland, tying the game up just five seconds later.

John Watson (son of Bowdoin mentor Sid, and apparently the one that got away) put Middlebury on top at 14:23, but Brian Norris scored from

Skier Epstein is Athlete of Week

Women's Alpine skier Marty Epstein has been named Record Athlete of the Week following her outstanding performance in the Williams' winter carnival giant slalom and slalom events last weekend. Epstein skied to a first place in the slalom with a time of 80.31. Epstein also grabbed second in the giant slalom, trailing Middlebury skier Sarah McNealus by 12-100 of a second. Edging McNealus in the alpine combined results, Epstein took first place overall with a total time of 156.0.

Honorable Mention—Hurdler Ron White has been awarded an honorable mention as a result of his second place performance at the Eastern Championships on Saturday. The fleet-footed junior, who has been a consistent winner all season, had to adjust his stride to the relatively short stretch of track (45 yards) but recorded a swift 5.9 for the runner-up spot.

Women dunk North Adams

When you go up against a team with a guard who averages 30 points a game, and you are coming off a poorly played loss to a lifeless Holyoke squad, and three of your starters have three fouls as North Adams starts mounting a serious second half offense, it can make for a grim evening. Grim, unless you can keep your poise and pull off a cool comeback, as did the Williams' women's basketball team Thursday, defeating North Adams 69-58.

Leslie Milne displayed a game winning effort late in the second half along with Lisa Capaldini, just as the North Adams squad had succeeded in cutting the Ephs substantial game lead to one point.

Going into the game with a watchful eye on 30 pointer Mary Ellen Murphy, the hosts went ahead early as North Adams just did not have the Eph's offensive touch. Freshman Monica Grady was especially accurate for the team, hitting three-fourths of her shots early in the game. Grady and junior Leigh Wilson used their fast-break ability to its fullest, driving past the slower NA squad.

At the other end of the court, luck was robbing Murphy of points as her shots circled the rim, falling down into the lane. With Murphy missing, North Adams rebounded and turned to forward Annie Cramer to put them through. Cramer combined with Carolyn Sanford in an awesome duo which began to eat up the Ephs lead in the first half.

Attempting to stop the pair, the Ephs called a full man to man press and switched to one defense at half court. Wilson and Grady, playing tough ball for the team, soon found themselves with three fouls apiece late in the half.

Forward Capaldini then picked up the pace for the Ephs, leading a drive which sent the Ephs from 20-17 to 34-24 in four minutes.

Starting the second half with a comfortable nine point lead, the Ephs slacked off, failing to get the needed rebounds which Sanford was so ably sinking. Playing determined defense, Wilson was soon tagged with her fourth foul and the team was now faced with a 48-47 lead, midway through the period.

Despite her foul tally, Wilson stayed in the game, as Grady, Capaldini, and Maggie O'Brien took over, presenting a triple threat to the visitors. Capaldini, hitting from outside, Grady grabbing the fast breaks, and O'Brien, from all around, really turned it on, securing a 58-52 lead. Then it was Leslie Milne, grabbing two, assisting Grady for two, and then Capaldini for two. With the momentum going and two minutes left, Capaldini hit a foul shot and the team put in the rebound for three points, leaving O'Brien to finish it off, and leaving North Adams and their 30 points out in the cold.

Leading the scoring was Capaldini with 15 while Grady and O'Brien added 14 each. The defense-oriented Milne had an unusually high 11 points and Wilson had 12. Capaldini, showing real improvement this season, also led in rebounds, grabbing 12.

Earlier last week, the Ephs precision play disappeared, as they dropped a close one to Mt. Holyoke 59-56. The Ephs, plagued by turnovers kept throwing the ball away as their host pressed on the tiny court. Unlike the NA game, the squad could not recover, setting their record at 7-4.

Swimmers swamp Wesleyan, 79-34

by Dennis O'Shea

This year's men's varsity swimming schedule has looked just a little bit like an itinerary for a Dufour Brothers bus tour of Connecticut. Previous stops at Storrs and New Haven, coupled with a final relay loss to U.Conn. and an all out stomping by Southern Connecticut left the Eph natators with nothing more than an extreme allergic reaction for anything even remotely related to nutmeg, jai-alai and life insurance.

Things turned around this weekend, though, as a Winter Carnival jaunt to the Constitution State produced a lopsided win and wrapped up a winning season and a fifth consecutive Little Three title.

Putting into practice the timeless lesson, "Do unto others as got done to you last week," the Ephs journeyed to the southernmost tip of the Tiny Triangle and made up for last Saturday's 107-26 battering by Colgate with a 79-34 taming of the Wesleyan Cardinals.

With coach Carl Samuelson in Rhode Island for the women's New Englands, the Purple effort was directed by coach emeritus Bob Muir, who led the splashers to his thirty-first consecutive win over the Redbirds. The first thirty came in a distinguished 36 year Williams coaching career that ended with his retirement in 1966.

With another Little Three crown on the line and everything to gain in terms of good seed times for the New Englands, the Muirmen let loose with 10 wins on a 13 event program and put together six one-two sweeps. The Cardinals' swimming hole is just about as placid as Cape Horn in hurricane season, but most Williams performances were at least fair time-wise and some were downright impressive.

Junior Stuart Deans swam 20 seconds ahead of the field and second place finisher Duff Anderson to take the 1000 yard freestyle, then shook off Wes ace distanceman Ed Denton with a 58.8 final 100 to nab the 500 free as well. Wesleyan coach Pat Callahan had held Denton out of the brutally tiring 1000 to try and knock Deans off in the later event, and entered him in the 200 free instead. It was a good idea, but Deans and 200 winner Phil Wild weren't buying any.

Todd Piper led another 200 individual medley sweep, his fifth of the year, but this time Bryan Volpp filled the second place slot with a 2:11.3 clocking three seconds faster than his last varsity outing.

Chandler announces division of Roper duties

Williams, Yale and the University of Connecticut will jointly operate the Roper Public Opinion Research Center, Inc., starting in July, President John W. Chandler announced at Wednesday's faculty meeting. The center located in Stetson Hall will retain a complete set of data and will have access to future acquisitions, he said.

The faculty approved the CEP's curriculum revisions for next year. Committee chairman George Goethals remarked that the curriculum was stable, featuring few innovations. Dean of the College Peter Berek informed the faculty of the formation of a committee to study Black students here.

Williams supported the Roper Center from its founding in 1946 until two and a half years ago, when the College began reducing funding. Last year the center contacted several educational institutions about the possibility of relocation; Yale and UConn responded with a joint offer.

Williams will contribute $5000 a year to the independent corporation, the other schools will each supply $15,000 and $15,000 worth of computer time a year.

The functions of the Roper Center will be split among the schools. Williams will handle data suppliers, summer programs, publications, indexing and cataloguing; UConn will be the data processing center while Yale will oversee the use of services.

Philip K. Hastings, currently the President and Director of the center, will direct activities here, Chandler said. A new executive director will locate at one of the other institutions.

The CEP curriculum proposals included changes in major and Honors programs, new courses and revised courses. The faculty passed motions for each academic division.

Speaking on Division I revisions, Professor Edson Chick remarked that there will be more 100 and 200-level courses available. The German department will offer an alternate route to a major titled German Studies, incorporating German history, music, religion and philosophy courses.

The Division II motion included bracketing all History of Science courses during Associate Professor Donald deBeaver's leave of absence and requiring an empirical methods course for economics majors.

The ad hoc committee to study Black students "has a potential for improving the functioning of the College," Berek said after the meeting. The committee includes Berek, seven faculty members and eight students.

Black review begins

Dean of the College Peter Berek presented the following statement to the faculty Wednesday.

Beginning in the late 1960's Williams College undertook a commitment to educating significant numbers of Black undergraduates and to giving the history, culture and experience of Black people their deserved place in the curricular and extra-curricular life of the College. The College's record in fulfilling its commitments includes both successes and failures. In 1968 eleven Black men entered Williams; in recent years entering classes have included about forty Black men and women. While the College has not made as much progress as it desired in attracting Black faculty and staff, we have nine Black faculty and staff members instead of one, as we had a decade ago. We have a richer variety of course offerings relevant to the Black experience in America and the world than in the past, but at the same time perhaps pay less attention to Black culture in certain introductory-level courses than we did six or seven years ago. While the College has made systematic efforts to do an effective job of orientation and academic advising for Black students, as for all students, it may well be that we may have inadvertently let a situation develop on-campus that many Black students feel has hampered them in their efforts to fulfill their potential for achievement, both in the classroom and outside.

Both Williams and the nation have changed since the late sixties, and insensitivities towards one another's needs have developed on the part of whites and blacks, students and faculty alike. The reaccreditation review the College is now undergoing offers a useful opportunity for us to assess an academic environment affected by these insensitivities and to explore the means by which we are attempting to fulfill our commitment to educating Black students, to making all students appropriately aware of the history and culture of Black people, and to developing patterns of extracurricular life reflecting the pluralism of our student body. With this goal in mind, I have asked the President to appoint an ad hoc committee to study the situation, both academic and social, of Black students at Williams. This committee's goal will be to suggest to relevant student-faculty committees and administrative officers improvements in the College's counseling and advising procedures and in its curricular and extracurricular programs.

Piltch calls for CC goals

"The greatest obstacle to student power at Williams is a lack of well-defined goals," said College Council President Steve Piltch in a Record interview Tuesday.

"The council must define where it is heading and what it wants to do," he added, and should more actively seek student input into that process. "Students have the power to influence events," claimed Piltch. "The problem is to define goals" for that power.

" council indulges in too much nit picking "

Vice-president Randy Sturges claimed that "students don't take the council seriously, although it does important things." Piltch suggested that this was caused by the council perceiving itself "as too important a body." Struges said he felt that the council was not taken seriously because it indulged in too much "nit-picking," and that concentration on more important matters would result in a more effective council.

Piltch described student input as vital to a successful council, adding that "council members have to realize that before students will look at them as a viable organization, they have to be willing to solicit information."

According to Piltch, "the only time many students care about the council is when it deals with something that directly affects them, such as funding organizations." Many important issues with which the council deals affect students only indirectly at first, he added, causing them to be less interested than they should be.

Piltch suggested that the new College Council institute parallel committees to channel student input into faculty committees, as specified in the defeated constitution. He also advised his successors to actively seek opinion from students, faculty, and administrators. Sturges recommended that important council and committee positions such as treasurer and secretary be nominated not only by written application but by personal interview with the Elections Committee.

Piltch did not see the council's power as being interfered with by other power centers such as residential houses. "We need a good deal of decentralization," said Sturges, adding that such decentralization facilitated the flow of student opinion to the council.

Piltch said that while a president "could get by" merely by presiding at meetings, one of his major duties was to act as a source of student opinion for the administration. Sturges said that he met with administrators two or three times every two weeks, and Piltch met with them "significantly more often."

The greatest success of the council this year was the improvement of communication between it and the students, and the streamlining of the budgeting process, said Piltch, though there is need for further improvement.

Applications

Applications for off-campus housing are now available in the Buildings and Grounds Service Building opposite Weston Field. The deadline for filing is 4:00 p.m. Friday, March 4, 1977.

Forms will be accepted from all upperclass students but the Housing Committee will consider applications by class, beginning with those who entered with the Class of 1978. Within each class, permission will be granted on a random basis.

Students presently living off-campus must reapply. They are not guaranteed an affirmative decision.

For further information students may contact Jamie Barickman (6794) or Sally Coney (2921), co-chairmen of the Housing Committee.

Keller cogitates insufficient increase, problems in production control, costs

This is the first in a series of articles on Food Services. Future articles will focus on food quality and menu variation, student complaints, communication between students and food service, rebate policy and specific mishaps this year.

by George Schutzer

Finances are tight in the Department of Food Services, director Ross Keller, admitted Wednesday. Keller said the board rate increased only 2.7 per cent from 1975-76 to 1976-77, "a percentage not sufficient to even meet inflationary pressures." The situation is especially serious because of larger selection and the addition of salad bars, two major changes in dining room policy, Keller said.

Keller made his comments during a 90 minute interview with the Record, covering such areas as food quality, communications, rebate policy and specific problems students have perceived with Food Services.

The Food Service director said efforts to control costs may explain why some of the dining halls run out of certain foods toward the end of meal time. "We are getting into production controls," Keller said, explaining that Food Services must estimate needs and produce for these approximations. If a dining hall is consistently over producing, Keller said, there will be leftovers and there are costs involved in preparing and serving leftovers.

Keller noted that problems naturally arise as cooks begin to work in the direction of achieving production controls. Part of the problem involves difficulties in estimating how many students will eat in a particular dining hall at each meal, Keller said.

Budget pressures are no greater at the row house dining halls than at the four major dining halls (Driscoll, Baxter, Greylock and Mission Park), the food service director said. A couple of row houses are well over budget as indicated by students from Dodd House who report that their cook, Peter Brazeau, has been under pressure from Food Services to trim expenditures. They also report that row house unit manager Roy Clark has been closely overseeing Dodd, checking counts and watching Brazeau.

Keller confirmed that some pressure has been applied on Dodd's cook to control costs. He said the costs per student eating at Dodd House are completely out of line, and that Dodd's expenditures are well above the budgeted amount.

Keller explained that budgets are evaluated by comparing row houses with row houses, expenditures this year with expenditures last year and expenditures this month with expenditures last month.

The food service director declined to suggest how costs could be cut at Dodd House but announced that he would not allow the menu to be altered. Dodd House residents claim that Keller has vetoed some of their cook's efforts to control costs by moves such as menu alterations.

One Dodd House resident compared Clark's visits to those of a "gestapo agent". The resident said that Clark suggested portion limitations as a means of cost control, but added that

Gladden secedes

Gladden House voted last night to withdraw from the College Council. House president MaryEllen Shea stated that the move was "to let people know that we think the College Council has no power on campus." She said the house would submit a letter to the Record and to CC President Steve Piltch explaining the decision.

"We're calling for an open forum of students to discuss other alternatives." Shea predicted that this forum would be conducted within the next two weeks. "It won't do any good to withdraw from the CC without any other alternative," she asserted.

The decision last night was unanimous, with an estimated 55 house members voting. Both Shea and Gladden House Vice-President and CC Representative Marty Taft suggested withdrawing.

Outgoing CC President Steve Piltch was "not worried" with the decision. "It's consistent with their vote in the referendum that the CC is not a viable organization," he said. Piltch wondered if the house meant to say that they were not interested in the funds that the council allocated.

Piltch suggested that the next administration should worry about it.

Getting Off

Once again it appears that there will be a substantial increase in the number of students applying to live off-campus. Two years ago 75 upperclass students applied to live off-campus. Last March the figure rose sharply to 125. This year, a Housing Committee estimate based on inquiries made by house presidents shows that among the Class of 1978 alone at least 110 students will attempt to get out or stay out of campus housing. Unless the College is again substantially over-enrolled next year, anywhere from 10 to 35 of those applications will probably be rejected along with all junior and sophomore applications.

If the trend toward off-campus living does indeed continue, the College should take a serious look at its housing and board policies. While it is difficult to pinpoint the exact reasons for the increasing number of off-campus applications, the conclusion that a significant minority of Williams students are dissatisfied with the College's housing and-or food seems inevitable.

The Committee on Undergraduate Life recently released a 23 page report which concluded that, "the Residential House system at Williams College is, in general, working very well." Perhaps that is so. Nevertheless, with room and board costs that will average $56 per week next year, it is clear that for a growing number of students, particularly those with financial worries, off-campus living is becoming increasingly attractive.

The College must do everything in its power to hold room and board costs to a minimum. The off-campus housing in Williamstown is surprisingly cheap, testimony to the fact that Williams is a wealthy institution surrounded by genuine poverty. The savings incurred by going off board and preparing one's own food are also quite substantial, according to a number of off-campus students.

The College should begin to seriously explore alternative board plans and options. Students will be paying approximately $30 per week next year for food. Food Services has a tendency to blame high food costs on the large number of free riders and chislers who don't pay board fees but eat at college facilities anyway.

Dean of the College Peter Berek stated that one estimate of the annual loss due to board cheaters was $20,000. While that is certainly an annoying sum and should be the target for a crackdown, it is effectively equal to only 21 students eating all year for free. Looked at from another perspective, the elimination of board cheating would save each student about $11 per year. Even if that estimate is low, as it probably is, it seems unlikely that board cheating is a major cause for an annual board cost of $975.

A rising number of off-campus applications should not be dismissed as a quirk, but rather viewed as the symptom of a problem.

A Captain's Captain

Basketball captains at Williams have always seemed a special breed to me. From Bob Patterson to Harry Sheehy to Mark Carter and Alex Rosten, there has existed a tradition of classy individuals and hard-working athletes that goes a long way towards explaining what is right about athletics at Williams.

For the past five months, though, I've watched a guy that epitomizes what is good and what is special about basketball at Williams bust his butt two hours a day, seven days a week, with little or no recognition save from fellow teammates and those close to the team. And I think it's high time he received some attention.

To many of the 900 faithful that pack Lasell each week, Tim Hester is simply the "other" captain of the varsity basketball team. Everyone knows about Mike Tanner, and with ample reason, for he's been the glue that's held the young Eph starting five together this year, playing consistently outstanding ball and providing on the court leadership and heroics.

Hester, on the other hand, has played in just nine games for a total of 29 minutes and 10 seconds. On the year he's scored 8 points and pulled down 7 rebounds. Match his figures up against Tanner's and you'll find that his season totals equal Tanner's average output per half.

But if the adage about a person's worth not being measured in terms of statistics ever applied to a case, that is it. For if Tanner has been the key to the team on the court, then Hester has been the key off the court and on the bench, providing constant encouragement and advice to the younger players and blending his role with Tanner's to create a unique and very healthy team unity.

"Timothy's a captain's captain, and by that I mean he's a captain in every sense of the word," Coach Tong said. "He really practices it. He keeps a close pulse of everyone's thoughts, feelings, and troubles and takes a concerned interest in every member of the team. There's a real openness that eminates from him and that encourages kids to feel free to go to him and talk about anything concerning basketball and the team. And it's a unique quality for a student to be able to establish that kind of rapport with all of his teammates."

"As far as not playing goes, well, he takes that in typical Hester fashion, and that's characterized by a complete unselfishness. His total concern is with the program as a whole and his own priorities and interests are well down the ladder. It's never easy for a senior to sit on the bench, but Tim's never complained or appeared bothered by it. He's been devoted to the team as a whole and to its success all season long."

That devotion has been most manifest in the events of the past two weeks, events which have brought an abrupt and unfortunate end to Hester's playing days at Williams.

Two days before the Brandeis game Hester noticed pains in his right (shooting) shoulder. The next day Tong noticed Hester experiencing difficulty shooting and the following night Hester informed Tong that he could only play that evening against Brandeis if absolutely needed. A trip to the infirmary on Sunday resulted in a neck brace; a trip to Mass. General Tuesday revealed that he had viral neuritis in his right shoulder and that it would take six months of rest to restore full use of the shoulder. In other words, no more basketball.

Wednesday night of that week Williams played W.P.I. and for the first time this season Hester was not with the team. After the game Tong reflected the sentiments of the entire team.

"We really missed him tonight. There's no two ways about it. You really feel it when he's not around because he's always involved in the game, whether it be giving encouragement and advice to the players or simply giving the team a lift by being present. He's like having a third coach. It'll help the team a lot if he can make it back for the Wesleyan game."

He did make it back and he was in uniform too, just as he will be tomorrow night at Amherst and Tuesday night at Lasell in the final game of his career. And while you won't hear his name announced in the starting line-up or see him trot out to the foul line during player introductions with Mike Tanner, you will see the familiar Tanner and Hester posters that in and of themselves say a lot about these two captains and you can bet your bottom dollar that Timothy will be as much a part of the game as any player on the court.

Letters: Course Guide, Critics, ODA

Course guide

To the editor:

In choosing our courses we ought to be able to utilize a systematic representation of students' responses to their professors and course materials. All too often we end up relying on the nebulous judgments of the grapevine—or the opinion of someone's second cousin who took the course sometime or other and who thinks that such and such a professor (what was his name again?) is probably, possibly, hopefully a reasonably competent instructor . . .

Last spring there was an uproar on campus about the shredding of the '75-'76 Student Course Guide. Many individuals were incensed at this failure of the Course Guide Committee to communicate the results of their questionnaires to the student body. It's astounding how righteous indignation rapidly melts into the woodwork in the comfortable environment of Williamstown.

There is a committee on campus which has been trying to collect course guide forms since final exam week of first semester. Due partly to inadequate publicity, the lackadaisical attitude of students in general and particularly the reluctance of house representatives appointed by our committee to browbeat friends into completion of their forms, we have had less than 40 per cent of the questionnaires returned to us.

Did you think it was too late to pass yours in to us? Even though it is Feb. 23 we need more responses as soon as possible (before March 5) if this year's course guide is to be a success. Have you lost your forms? There will be more questionnaires provided in a manila envelope in Baxter.

Please, please help us. If you have any questions or suggestions, call me or any of the members of our committee listed on the form.

If you think that you would be benefited by the course guide in choosing your courses, then you have a responsibility to make the extra time to finish those four pages.

Thanks!

ODA

To the editors,

Although we were totally against returning to Williams College, O.D.A. in absentia, the prospect of the perennial Winter Carnival and its overabundance of parties and roadtripping girls lured us back. And to our surprise, the situation here has changed drastically. Apparently, O.D.A.'s have become acceptable.

That problem alleviated, we now question Williams College students' overall ability to dance. It is all too obvious that the partygoers like to dance; however, where is the imagination, the originality, the flair of creativity that we now know these devoted students to possess? Dancing should be an artistic expression of self relating to self, but all we could detect, at the so-called Pandemonious Affair, even at Disco '77, was that horrid, decapitating disease called the Jitterbug. Face it—the Jitterbug has been a cliche since the early 50's! Any school that can learn to O.D.A. in three weeks can easily learn to dance in a matter of days!

Sincerely,
Jim Rhodes, '78

Sex survey

To the editor,

So 32 per cent of Williams men (40 per cent of women) are Virgins, while only 19 per cent of all Williams students have never had intercourse. Is this the New Math or the New English?

Irreverently

To the Williams College Community:

In reference to the Feb. 4 article entitled "College escapes National Fuel Crisis," the title should obviously read "College contributes to national fuel crisis." Or, "anti-intellectualism at Williams supports materialism and material idealism everywhere."

A lot of students are starting to value learning more highly than money, prestige and graduate school. But too many students argue for the sake of class participation points and egotistic competition with teachers. Many teachers argue from the degrees that hang on their office walls. That fact that a person is paid money to teach does not mean that he is more intelligent than any student. Ideas are independent of presitge, position, time, place. It is obvious that many members of the community know this and many do not.

But old stereotypes die hard. A typical student of Williams a few years back was Jeb Magruder of Watergate fame. When questioned as to the immoral nature of his acts, he cited the poor teaching of his ethics professor. That's easy to understand. He was immoral because he didn't know any better.

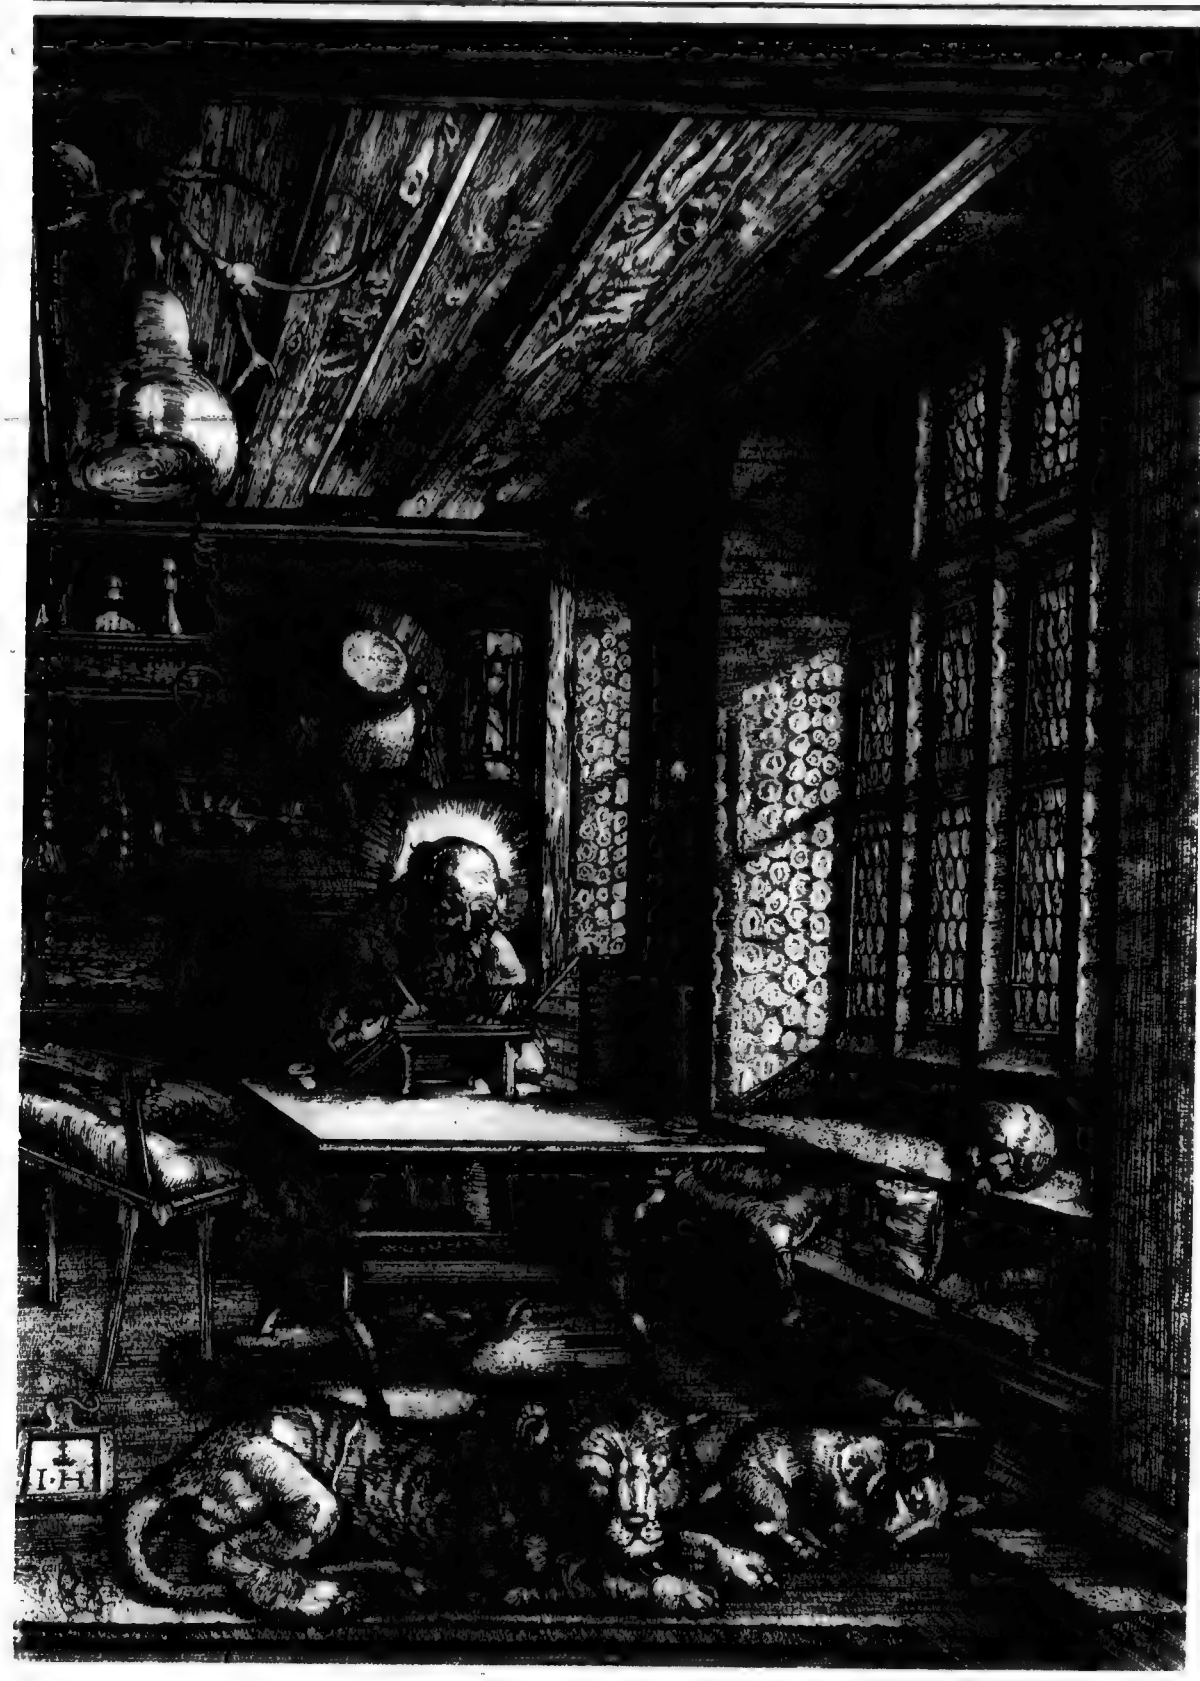
The intense racial tension at Williams is a problem that must be dealt with by communication rather than separatism and silence. There are many black and white racists at Williams, but what the hell, it's never too late to change.

But there are so many good folks at Williams. Every one would be cool if people would just be honest. By the way, Dean Roosenraad is one of the most remarkable people I met at Williams.

Irreverently and with Love to all,
Jared Wells '79

P.S. Sexism is strong at Williams (as evidenced by the fact that I've forgotten to mention it until the P.S.) but it's fading fast. Honesty is the only answer for this problem.

Snow-blind



To the editor:

As the third-place finishers in the recent Winter Carnival Snow Sculpture Contest, we have been designated the recipients of a ten dollar prize.

We have decided to apply these funds to the defrayment of the inevitable and astronomical optometrist's fees our four judges must soon incur. Alternatives considered included tin cups, smoked glasses, and German Shepherds.

Yours very truly,
Lehman Hall

P.S. Copies of this letter have been sent to all four judges in Braille.

St. Jerome in his Study, an etched copy by Hieronymous Hopfer (German, act. c 1520-c. 1550) after the famous print by Albrecht Durer (German, 1471-1528), is on view with the Durer original in the current exhibition "Durer Through Other Eyes" at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown.

"Durer through other eyes" opens at Clark Art Institute

"Durer Through Other Eyes: His Graphic Work Mirrored in Copies and Forgeries of Three Centuries" is the title of an exhibit which has just opened at the Clark Art Institute and will be on view until March 27. Almost fifty copies of Durer's prints are exhibited side by side with the original Durer engravings, etchings and woodcuts. Some of the copies are exceptionally skillful, requiring an experienced eye to detect the few minute variations. For example, astonishingly deceptive copies were produced by the Flemish engraver Jan Wierix (1549-1615), seven of whose prints after Durer are included in the exhibit. Other artists, such as the German Jerome Hopfer (fl. 1520), copied Durer's prints intending to reproduce their basic compositions rather than to duplicate line for line the appearance of the originals. Hopfer's etched copies in particular show an utter lack of regard for Durer's masterful technique; his lines look crude, thick and clumsy in comparison to Durer's. About half of the copies are by anonymous masters and vary considerably in quality. Some of Durer's most famous prints are seen together with a number of copies, for example, St. Jerome in His Study, Adam and Eve, and Melancolia.

"Durer Through Other Eyes" was prepared by students in the Williams College-Clark Art Institute Graduate Program in the History of Art under the direction of Professor Julius S. Held two years ago and has been seen at a number of educational institutions in this country.

Parks plays Bach

Anne Parks will play the complete Clavierubung, Part III, popularly known as the "German Organ Mass," by J. S. Bach, in a free public recital this Sunday, at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The concert is being sponsored by the department of music.

Parks has given organ recitals in ten different states from Maine to Texas. A native of Washington, D.C., she began studying piano at the age of four and first performed in a recital at the age of five. She began studying organ and serving as a church organist when she was only fourteen. She has since studied with Heinz Arnold at Stephens College, with Wayne Dirksen at the National Cathedral, David Boe at Oberlin College, and Grigg Fountain at Northwestern University.

Now an Assistant Professor of Music at the University of Michigan—Dearborn, she had been College Organist and Instructor in Music at Tuskeege Institute and at Texas Lutheran College.

Slides, poems, drama, dance

Black Movements

For several years, Black Movements has been an annual bright spot on the AMT stage—an entertaining and professional production of the highest caliber.

This year the theme of the show is "Through Perilous Times We Have Survived," with slides, original poetry, dramatic scenes by William Spriggs, and dance pieces choreographed by Ralph Breedlove and Jackie Wilson. The 12 member cast will present a multi-media pictorial view of five periods of black American history.

Produced by the Williams Black Student Union and directed by Ralph Breedlove, with lighting by New York designer John Brown, Black Movements will be performed tomorrow night at 8 p.m. at the Adams Memorial Theater. Tickets are $1.00 and proceeds will be donated to the ABC house in Williamstown.

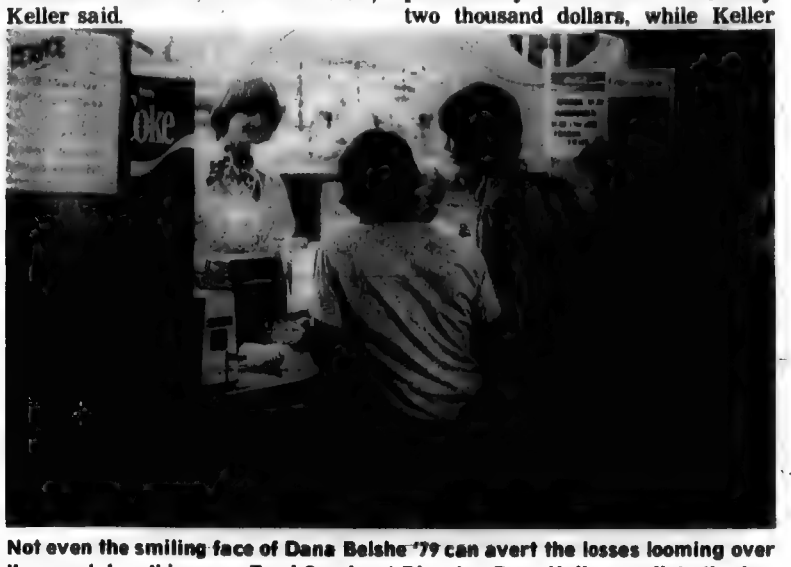
Slow sales stymie snack bar

The snack bar will probably lose ten thousand dollars this year, although actual figures are not yet available, according to Ross Keller, Director of Food Services. The snack bar lost about twenty thousand dollars last year, he added.

Keller attributed the loss to the long hours which the snack bar must maintain, including times such as the dinner hour when demand is low. It was also staffed for ten days in December when business was slow, Keller said.

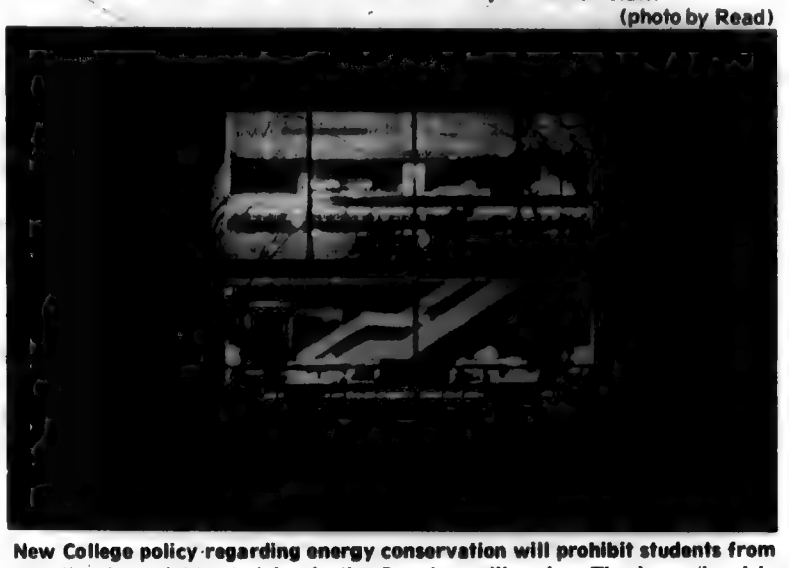


Keller announced that he would not consider an increase in board fees to offset this year's losses. Nor will prices be raised specifically to cover the deficit. Keller noted, however, that prices will continue to rise in response as expenses do.

Keller projected revenues for this year at about ninety five thousand dollars, down from last year's gross of slightly over one hundred thousand. Expenses last year totaled approximately one hundred and twenty two thousand dollars, while Keller estimated this year's costs at a total of one hundred and five thousand dollars.

"Sales are off," Keller admitted, and steps are being taken to boost them. Food Services will rely more on "student input" to determine what items are offered. A Food Services committee of students meets regularly to discuss recommendations for improvements and additions to the menu. Keller revealed that the snack bar may soon offer Mexican food, and said the menu would continue to be expanded. As part of a "merchandising" campaign, specials featuring combinations of items sold together at a discount have been introduced.

Costs will be cut whenever possible, mainly through the use of student employees, more efficient work schedules and general efforts to "avoid waste." Keller added that reducing expenses was a difficult task.



An employee at the bar said that all workers had been instructed to keep portions uniform and "rigidly controlled." Prices on two items, yogurt and bagels, went up recently, she added.

Not even the smiling face of Dana Belshe '79 can avert the losses looming over the snack bar this year. Food Services' Director Ross Keller predicts the bar will lose up to $10,000. (photo by Pawlick) portion control would be difficult to implement in a row house eating environment where students place food on their own plates.

Keller defines portion limits

Keller told the Record that portion control includes how thick or thin meats and cheeses are sliced as well as the quantity of food on plates. He said he has sent out a comprehensive memorandum on portion control to food service employees in an effort to standardize portion size.

By giving students an "adequate" portion first time through a line and requiring them to come back for seconds if they want more, waste and costs can be minimized, Keller said.

Budget pressures have not prevented Food Services from making necessary capital expenditures, Keller said, citing special reserves which have been used for the salad bar tables and a new cooking unit at Fort Hoosac House.

In other cost related moves, Keller admitted that cheddar cheese and tomatoes are available less often at salad bars. The cost of tomatoes has tripled, he said, noting that they would continue to be served with submarine sandwiches and bacon, lettuce and tomato sandwiches. Cheddar cheese is more expensive per pound than meat.

NEWS BRIEFS

Low income housing projected

Through the efforts of the Williamstown Housing Authority, its citizens advisory committee, and the Berkshire Housing Development Corporation, an apartment complex for the low income elderly will be built at the foot of Southworth and Church Streets. According to George Harper, state appointee for the housing committee and retired Williams classics professor, the project will be completed one year following the ground-breaking in June.

Course guide plans finalized

Within a week or two, the Course Guide Committee will make final plans for their Student Evaluation report. The committee, according to chairman Sarah Baldwin '78, will then go before the Finance Committee of the College Council and attempt to get these plans accepted and corresponding funds approved.

The exact nature of the publication will depend on the quality of student response. The decision to include numerical data, such as the percentage of students who rated a course good, bad, or indifferent, in addition to summaries of student comments will rest on the number of completed individual questionnaires, which are still being collected. It may be that some courses will have such data, while others with less response will include only paraphrased comments.

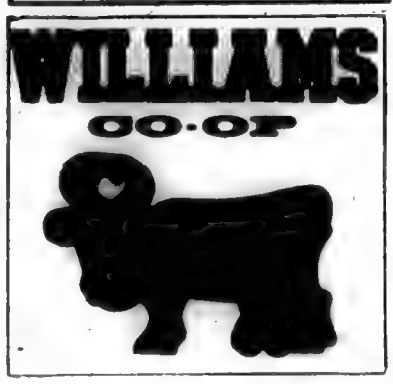
SPEED READING COURSE TO BE TAUGHT IN NORTH ADAMS

The New England Reading Lab is offering their famous speed reading course to a limited number of qualified people here in the North Adams area. The average person who completes this course can read 10 times faster, and with substantially improved comprehension and better concentration.

This famous course has taught many thousands of people to read over 1000 words per minute with the ability to understand and retain what they have read much more effectively. Average graduates can read most novels in less than one hour.

For complete details about this famous speed reading course, be sure to attend one of the free one hour orientation lectures that have been scheduled. These lectures are open to the public, above age 13 (persons under 18 should be accompanied by a parent, if possible) and the course will be explained in complete detail, including class schedules, instruction procedures and a tuition that is much less than similar courses.

These meetings will be held in the Fort Massachusetts Hall, Price Chopper, State Road on Tuesday, March 1 at 6:30 p.m. and again at 8:30 p.m., Thursday, March 3 at 6:30 p.m. and again at 8:30 p.m., Friday, March 4 at 6:30 p.m. and again at 8:30 p.m., Saturday, March 5 at 2:30 p.m. Additional meetings will be held at the Sheraton North Adams Inn, 40 Main Street on Wednesday, March 2 at 6:30 p.m. and again at 8:30 p.m., and TWO FINAL MEETINGS on Monday, March 7 at 6:30 p.m. and again at 8:30 p.m.



Classes are limited and class places will be filled on first come-first serve basis only. Be sure to attend the earliest meeting possible to insure a class place. Group rates are available upon request.

ALL NEW STUFF IS COMING

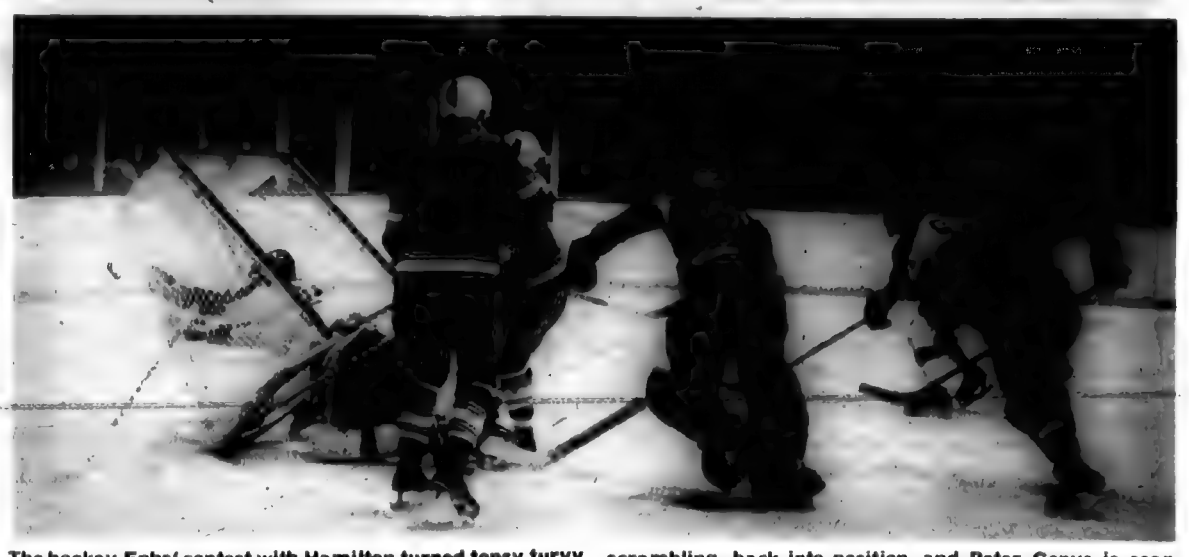
Women swimmers take sixth in New Englands

by Dennis O'Shea

Nine College records tumbled as the women's varsity swimmers nabbed sixth place at the New England Women's Swimming and Diving Championships in Kingston, Rhode Island last weekend. The Ephwomen trailed fifth place New Hampshire by only a point after the first session of the two day meet, but with a 220 point total still dropped 24 behind the Wildcats during the second day's action. Springfield, U.Conn., Southern Conn., and Maine also topped the Ephs.

Sophomore Nina Murphy toppled College standards in each of her six events, finishing seventh, eighth and ninth in the 50, 100 and 200 backstrokes, and swimming on two seventh place relays, the 200 and 400 freestyle quartets. The 200 medley took fifth.

Murphy now totals 24 College record performances during her two year career, including ten in individual events.



Joining her in all three relay swims and netting a pair of individual event records herself was freshman Keron Walker, high point scorer for coach Carl Samuelson's squad with 63. Team high fourth place finishes dropped her own 100 individual medley time by half a second and Leslie Teel's three year old 50 butterfly mark by nearly three-tenths.

Walker blew her turn in the 50 freestyle, but still finished fifth, only two-tenths above another Teel record.

Joanna Monroe and Sue Tuttle rounded out a medley relay that lopped 2.1 seconds off the existing record, set by the same foursome last November at the Wellesley Relays. Tuttle clobbered Sue Buck's 35.356 record with her fifth place 34.37 clocking, in the 50 breaststroke, and went even faster in the relay. Monroe placed ninth in both the 50 and 100 butterfly.

The freestyle relays included Marilla Pearsall and senior captain Randall Morrow—the four knocked over 1.5 seconds off the standing marks. Pearsall finished tenth to Carol-Ann Smalley's ninth in the 50 freestyle and 15th in the 100 free.

Morrow, Monroe, Tuttle and Smalley also put together a ninth place 400 medley relay.

Amherst next
Hamilton overpowers icemen

Coach Bill McCormick's varsity hockey squad saw its current losing streak stretched to six games Tuesday night in 10-4 loss to Division II foe Hamilton. It was Hamilton's second win over the Ephs this year.

The Continentals, in dropping Williams' over-all record to 8-12, tallied four goals in the first period and four more in the third. Williams holds a 4-12 mark within the division.

The first Williams goal in the game was scored by junior Barney Walsh, assisted by fellow junior John Bessone. Geoff Daley and Peter Gonye and freshman Jim Rooney each also tallied one goal.

Hamilton took only 35 shots on Williams goalies Ed Weiss and Brooks Fisher, yet ten of them found the mark. Hamilton's defense allowed Williams only 26 shots on the night.

The Ephs take to the road tonight to attempt to snap the losing skein in a Little Three contest with Amherst. The Ephs have copped 22 straight games in the Little Three, including 11 in a row over the Jeffs. Game 7:30.

Ergathon

The Williams College Boat Club kicked off their second annual 24-hour Ergathon today at noon. The crew's infamous rowing machine, the ergometer, will buzz through the night as more than fifty oarsmen and oarswomen compete to generate record-breaking numbers of revolutions.

Individual scores will determine the size of contributions which will be used to defray the costs of the spring trip to Washington, D.C.

Spectators are encouraged to come cheer on the rowers in the Baxter Lounge.

Members of the team will be there to accept last minute contributions.

Take Little Three
Racketmen smother Jeffs, 9-0

It's kind of like a kid beating up his brother to take a toy and then never giving it back. Amherst and Wesleyan's varsity squash teams must feel exactly that way as Williams freely handed out the blows to each in continuing what now seems to be a perennial domination of the Little Three squash scene, bullying Amherst 9-0 on Tuesday after having done the same to Wesleyan a month ago.

The Little Three title caps what has been a fine 10-4 season for Coach Dave Johnson's hard working squad. It was a campaign that saw the Ephs record some outstanding wins while suffering no really bad matches.

Amherst came out hungry, anxious to prove that last year's shutout at the hands of Williams was a fluke. But the Ephs knew better and put together some good play.

Captain Marc Reinhardt, playing in his last dual match, left no doubt with a well played 3-0 win. Arnie Cogswell and Chip Lindquist met more resistance, but triumphed 3-2 and 3-1 respectively. Playing yet another strong match was Martin Goldberg as he swept 3-0, while no. 5 Tim Belk surrendered only one game in his last match as an Eph.

Williams strength all year has been a ladder seemingly as deep as the Marianas Trench. Tuesday was no different as the bottom four all cruised to easy wins. Senior Charlie Haines showed his experience with a 3-1 victory and no. 7 Jim Little followed suit, winning by an identical margin. Also putting on a strong exhibition was Jon Saunders as he rolled 3-0, leaving no. 9 Jim Parsons to bring up the rear with a 3-1 win.

The top six Ephmen must now continue to keep their bodies in shape and their minds on squash in preparation for the National Collegiate Championships to be held March 2-4 at Navy.

Trinity hoopsters outshoot Ephwomen, 50-44

Those recently discussed road trip blues struck again Wednesday, but this time it was the Williams' women who came up short on the road, losing 49-44 at Trinity.

The squad kept in the contest throughout the first half, although it was clear that the team game was off. Two minutes into the half key player Leigh Wilson left the game with an injured knee, which may well keep her out of tonight's contest with MIT.

Up by five at the half, the Ephs fell apart in the following minutes, although Robin Ellett played good ball for the team. Ellett hit a season high 12 points, but returned to the bench late in the half with her fifth foul. As a result of somewhat questionable officiating, Leslie Milne and Maggie O'Brien joined Ellett with five fouls.

Playing man to man press to contain the Trinity offense, the Ephs were forced to switch to zone defense due to the foul situation allowing Trinity to take the game.

Although Eph coach Sue Hudson recognized the poor play of the squad as a key to the loss, the officiating caused concern for the coach who feared further team injuries.

Hoping to end their season on a better note, the Ephs will meet MIT tonight at 7:30.

Cagers edge Hartford, 93-89

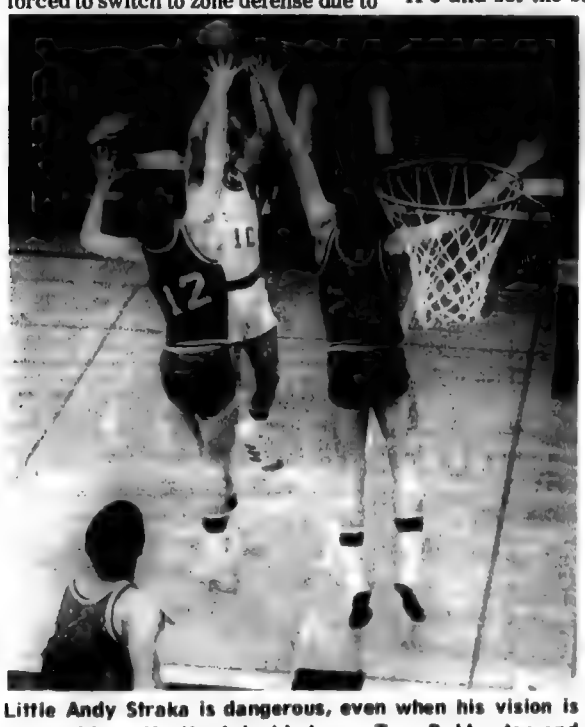
by Andy O'Donnell

You can give the two guys in striped shirts a couple of assists for this one.

Benefiting greatly from a tightly officiated game that put it in the bonus situation with a full 12:18 left in the second half, the varsity basketball team rode the foul line to its third win in a row and tenth in eleven Lasell outings with a choice 93-89 upset of the Hartford Hawks Wednesday night.

The win upped Williams' record to 11-8 and set the stage for Saturday's Little Three showdown with Amherst. Hartford fell to a solid 18-8, but with Assumption and Bridgeport now breathing down its neck the loss may spell the end of coach Gary Palladino's plans for a bid to the post-season Division II tournament.

Before we get to details of the game, a brief commercial for the Amherst battle. At present, this is how things stand in the Little Three: Williams and Wesleyan are 2-1 and Amherst is 0-2. A win by Williams Saturday night guarantees the Ephs at least a piece of the title and knocks Amherst out of the picture. A loss leaves all three teams still in the running, with the final outcome to be determined by the Amherst-Wesleyan game, also at Amherst.



Williams has already beaten Amherst by a 55-41 count earlier in the year at Lasell, but that game should in no way be construed as a realistic portrayal of this year's Amherst club. Quite simply, Amherst played its worst game of the year the last time around and chances of a similar performance are about as likely as Jim Rehnquist being held under 20 points.

In short, then, Williams will be walking into a lion's den Saturday night, except this time the den won't have the Lasell name on the outside. If you're heading down to the game, get there VERY, VERY early—i.e., before 7:00 at the latest. The game's a sure sellout and the place should be packed before the Northampton Boys' Club sits down for its training meal.

To get back to the Hartford triumph. Gerry Kelly was the first half story for the Ephs, connecting for 17 points as Williams built up a 37-24 lead only to see it evaporate into a dangerous 46-44 margin at the half.

Things went back and forth in the second half, with the lead being tied five times and changing hands on another sixteen occasions before Matt Spangler put the Ephs ahead for good, 90-89, with 0:58 left.

Kelly paced Williams with 26 points, including a crucial 14 for 15 from the line. Williams actually won the game on the line, hitting 25 of 32 attempts compared to the Hartford's 11 of 15.

Little Andy Straka is dangerous, even when his vision is dwarfed by a Hartford double-team. Tom Balderston and Brad Wolk find plenty of room to operate under the boards. (photo by C. Read)

Purple trackmen sixth in Eastern Championships

by Frank Carr

Coach Dick Farley took an eight-man Eph contingent to Tufts last Saturday and recorded a very respectable tie for sixth place at the Eastern Championships. The purple trackmen combined for a ten point total in the large scale meet and shared the number six position with Worcester State and Springfield who defeated the Ephs 65-31 earlier in the season. Farley was extremely pleased with all of the individual performances which moved the squad up from a 13th place finish a year ago.

Junior Ron White netted the highest Williams finish in the meet with his second place performance in the 45 yard high hurdles at a clocking of 5.9. The relatively short Tufts straight-away is a drop of 15 yards off the standard distance and according to Farley, "White probably would have won the race if it had gone 60 yards." Freshman Vernon Davis earned his way through the trials and finished third behind White in the hurdle final to give Williams a 7 point team total for the event.

In the 35 lb. weight throw, Larry Tanner rebuilt his own school record for the third time this season. His record distance of 54' 6" was only good enough for a non-scoring 6th and put him just short of the New England qualifying standard. The other half of the weight crew, Rich Remmer, donated 2 points to the team total with a 4th place heave in the shot put. The senior was well under his season best of 53 feet, but managed to spin the sphere on a 49' 6" excursion.

Distance ace Joe Kolb added the final purple point of the afternoon with an incredible 9:10.0 clocking for 5th place in the two mile run. Kolb was running in the unseeded heat but neatly proceeded to blow the Nikes, Adidas, Tigers, etc. off his competitors and won the heat in his best time ever. His swift clocking earned him 5th place overall as he beat out seeded heat fifth-placer Paul Oparowski, the Bates distance star who won the NESCAC Cross Country Championships this past fall. Captain Ken Leinbach also ran to a lifetime best but could only manage a 6th place finish among the mile competitors. Leinbach's 4:15.9 trailed a Brandeis runner as well as Providence's version of the Irish national team who jigged its way to 4 of the top 5 places.

The meet closed with the 2 mile relay, where the Williams quartet of White, Dave Seeger, Terry O'Reilly, and Leinbach were hopelessly outclassed in the top seeded heat and faded far to the rear with an 8:11 clocking. Tomorrow the season winds up with the New Englands as the trio of White, Remmer and Kolb will represent Williams in their respective events.

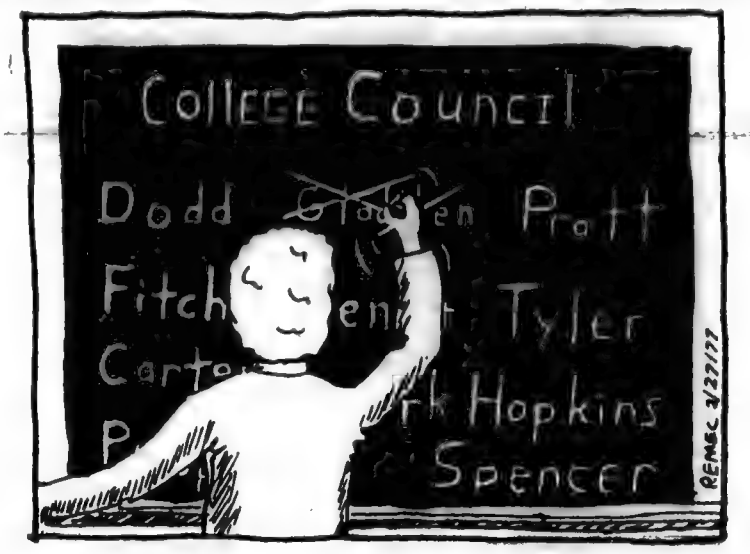
Gladden to lose CC funding; Housing Committtee status stays

The secession of Gladden House from the College Council will not affect its standing in the Housing Committee, but will apparently result in a waiver of CC appropriated funds from the Student Activities Tax, according to Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad.



"I don't see how Gladden's secession can in any way affect its role in the Housing Committee," Roosenraad remarked. "That committee is not a political body." He said that he saw the secession as primarily a political move and that Gladden was still obligated to take part in the inclusion process and other functions associated with the Housing Committee. "Gladden may choose not to participate in discussion, but the house continues to be a part of the residential system," he said.

Secession from the council will involve waiving Gladden's share of the Student Activities Tax. The House Maintenance Tax appropriated to Gladden which is not distributed by the CC, will not be affected by the action.

"The College Council is the fundamental political element of the student body," Roosenraad continued, "and Gladden is obviously dissatisfied with it." Gladden will propose a new organization, somewhat along the lines of a town-meeting as a future college governing body. "I would ask those at Gladden to explore the same type of body which has been instituted at Kirkland college. It hasn't worked," he said.

Several other residential units have reportedly considered Gladden's action and will discuss it at future house meetings. Peter Currie, president of Ft. Hoosac, said, "Unless Gladden can come up with a more viable alternative, I cannot see other houses following suit. The council has received little student support this year, and it cannot effect any changes without it."

Gladden House President MaryEllen Shea was not available for comment.

CEP in review: Part I

by Chip Buckner

This is the first in a six article series concerning the history of the Committee on Educational Policy over the past five years.

The CEP is the faculty subcommittee responsible for monitoring the quality of education at Williams. Although its proposals must be reviewed by the faculty, the committee is the major innovator in the college curriculum.

The thirteen member committee consists of a chairman; one tenured professor one non-tenured professor and one student from each division; one student elected at-large from the student body, one freshman, and a College Council representative.

Almost every activity at Williams affects education in some way, and thus falls under the jurisdiction of the CEP. In any given meeting the committee will evaluate new course proposals (Chinese language and Avian Biology), the calendar and workload (5-5 or 4-W-4), the effect of grades on learning, "educational paternalisms"—the rules that protect the student from learning through error (the E-deficiency rule), and the value of a liberal arts vs. a specialized education.

At the heart of education at Williams are the courses themselves. Early each spring the CEP reviews each course taught here, screening for changes and duplication between departments. From this the chairman produces a "course package" of all the curricular changes taking place at Williams for the next year. The package includes a list of courses, with a summary of the changes and rationale for differences, and details proposed changes in the major or honors requirements (covered in parts II and III respectively). If the CEP approves of the new course package, it presents the package in three separate motions (one for each division) for the approval of the faculty.

The CEP prepared summaries of some of the major changes in a memo to faculty members on February 14.

Division I

Any discernable trend is "in the direction of an emphasis on more basic skills. Music, Classics, and—in some respects—German, are devoting more attention to sophomore level, or intermediate work." The English department has added, revised, renumbered, and dropped a significant number of courses; German has added an alternate "German Studies" route to the major, but for the most part the curriculum remains unchanged.

Division II

This division has very few changes for 1977. "Only Economics is changing requirements for the major, the addition of an Empirical methods course in place of one upper level elective . . . Course changes that reflect personnel changes are anticipated in Anthropology, Economics, History, Psychology and Religion."

Division III

The departments requested almost no alterations, adding only two courses, revising two more and dropping one.

Off-campus housing options vary

by Jane Adams

If you're lucky enough to be chosen for off-campus housing, the question remains, where? The Williamstown housing market is limited but there are enough options available to suit almost any need.

Four forms of housing are available: faculty homes, privately rented homes, apartments, and college-owned married-student housing. Rent is competitive with the college room rate of about one hundred dollars per month. One real estate agent commented, "We know when the College has raised its prices." Most housing offers only the standard facilities: a stove and refrigerator for cooking and essential furniture throughout the house.

Finding out what's available can be a student's greatest obstacle. Houses seem to be passed on from one tenant to the next through friends and word of mouth so that landlords find advertising unnecessary. Buildings and Grounds has a list of students presently off campus to consult. In the case of faculty homes, many house sitters were sought out by the professor. The Dean's Office does have a list of professors on leave for the upcoming year. The important thing is to start looking early.

The homes of faculty members on sabbatical or leave of absence often offer the most deluxe accommodations but conveniences and fringe benefits vary. The initial rent is low, averaging about seventy-five to eighty-five dollars per month per person for a group of 3 or 4 people. Utilities however, especially this winter, can add an additional $100 to each person's tab, though the cost will drop significantly with the warmer weather. Many households attempt to offset high heating bills by substituting wood for oil.

As with all off-campus housing the greatest savings comes in food. One student described it: "If costs are shared, it is possible for each person to eat outrageously well for about sixty to sixty-five per cent of what you'd pay at the College ($1000 per year)."

The advantages of living in a professor's home often include washers and dryers and coordinated furniture. The responsibility of avoiding any damage above normal wear and tear may be seen as a disadvantage. "You have to be more mellow," one student commented.

Outside of professor's homes, the quality of housing generally drops sharply to less well furnished and less expensive houses. These houses are usually rented by their owners for about $110 per month per person including all utilities. The rooms are smaller than most professor's homes and are often without the accompanying acreage. Location, as in all off-campus housing, varies from the isolation of Hopkins Forest which makes a car a necessity, to the proximity of the largely student populated Water St. neighborhood.

Survey indicates drop in quality

Keller reacts to complaints about Food Services

This is the second in a series of articles on food services.

by George Schutzer

Ross Keller listed improvements in food variety and selection, a broadened salad bar, elimination of menu predictability and improvement in the internal management of Food Services as his four major achievements since becoming Director of Food Services in July.

In spite of the changes the director maintained he has made, Keller remains a target of student criticism.

In an extensive interview last Wednesday with the Record, Keller responded to some of the commonly aired criticisms of Food Services.

In response to complaints that there is inadequate communication between his office and students, Keller said that he meets with a food service committee representing the large dining halls every other week. "About one-half dozen students per day drop in" to see him with comments and criticisms, Keller said.

In addition, he claimed he has a constant flow of information to him through student employees and regular food service staff.

The food chief admitted that he has met with a committee of row house stewards only three or four times since September. Keller said that although the meetings were well-attended the stewards seemed less interested than their large dining hall counterparts.

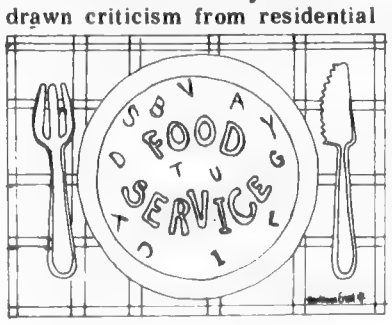
As a result of a suggestion from the large dining hall food service committee, Keller stated, lunch-type food had been added to the Sunday morning brunch menu.

Also as a result of student suggestion, the number of dessert offerings at each meal has been reduced to three, the food chief indicated. Students have also questioned the need for and the expense of offering ice cream at every meal, Keller said.

Beginning in September dining halls served four desserts including ice cream at every meal. At that time, Keller promised at least two main entrees at each meal, one of which would be vegetarian, and a larger variety of food offerings.

At the urging of row house cooks and officers, Keller reduced the number of entrees served at row house dinners to one.

Students who eat in row houses claim that they often see only one entree at lunch. Keller noted that cooks are supposed to be offering two entrees.



Food Quality

An informal Record survey of students who eat in row houses and in major dining halls indicated an almost unanimous feeling that the quality of food served had dropped during January. Keller said there was "nothing peculiar about January."

Students had suggested that the removal of ham from the cold cut platters for submarine sandwiches was one indicator of a drop in food quality. But Keller claimed that ham had not been removed. The instructions given to cooks for preparing the platters for submarines for lunch the day of the interview did not list ham as an item to be served. Nor were cooks supplied with ham.

When Keller checked menus, he found that roast beef was offered only once during January and the first half of February. Before Keller joined Food Services, roast beef was a Thursday night staple. He said that one of his mandates was to decrease menu predictability. Therefore, the Thursday menu has been varied.

The variable Thursday menu has drawn criticism from residential house officers who find it difficult to schedule guest meals, which are formal sitdown meals with waiter service. Keller announced he would produce a list of suggested guest meal dates covering the rest of the semesters in order to reduce confusion.

Row house students have claimed that when two entrees were on the dinner menu during January and early February row houses were serving the "cheaper" of the two. Pointing to budget pressures, Keller indicated that this was quite possible.

Keller admitted that there had been one "horrendous" weekend in early February. The food offerings for any one of those days could have stood alone, Keller said, but there were three bad days in a row. Keller attributed the error to chance.

Keller denied a suggestion that his staff does not examine the weekly menu as a whole and examine what foods are served on consecutive days.

Yet, during the week of the interview, students from row houses reported that fish was the only entree available at Wednesday night dinner and at Friday night dinner. Chicken was Monday night's only entree and a turkey dish was Saturday night's only entree. For some students Monday night was the third consecutive night of chicken, as chicken left over from

Viewpoint

Decision-making at Williams

The following Viewpoint was submitted by: Dave Hansen, Throop Wilder, Joe Avellar, David Randolph, Blake Noyes, Dave Breuer.

We, the students of Williams College, demand more student input into the decisions made on this campus. For too long, the vital decisions affecting student life on this campus have been made solely by the administration and the faculty with little or no student input. To rectify this situation, we demand the following:

—Equal student representation on all committees at Williams College. These representatives are to be elected by the student body.

—All committee meetings must be opened to the student body and their occurrence must be announced in all publicity mediums (Record, Register, WCFM). (We realize that meetings dealing with personalities (Honor and Discipline Committee, CAP) do not fall under this requirement. However, in the case of faculty or administration members who are coming under contract review student opinion must be solicited. This can be done either through questionnaires or open student meetings, both of which are to be announced and highly publicized well beforehand.)

—One student representative, to be elected by the student body, must be a voting member of the Board of Trustees and each of its major committees.

It is not the purpose of this document to inflame or destroy student-administration relations at Williams College. It is our hope that the vital link between the students and administration will be made stronger. Unfortunately, this link has broken. The decision-making process has become very one-sided. The enactment of these demands would improve the quality of education and student life at Williams.

The most essential element of Williams College, the students, have at hand an opportunity to gain their proper status. The question was asked by Ross Cheit: "Are we merely consumers of a product (education) that is created and evaluated behind closed doors? Or are we involved in a dynamic system of education where students play an integral role in the focus and definition of their institution?" Clearly, the answer to the latter question is no. At present the immediate governing of the education process at Williams College does not allow for the "integral role" of the student in the defining and managing of our own affairs. We are even forced to stand back and watch excellent teachers (e.g., Tietenberg) refused tenure without even knowing why, let alone being involved in the direct decision. The college handbook states this succintly, "The immediate government of Williams College is vested in the Faculty and is conducted in meetings of the full Faculty and by its Committees . . ."

We suggest that the secession of Gladden House from the College Council affords us the opportunity to confront two serious issues. The first concerns the CC's questioning of its role in the College Community. The second concerns apathy. CC representatives are only too aware that, in the words of Steve Piltch, "the only time many students care about the council is when it deals with something that directly affects them . . .". Perhaps this gives us an explanation of student apathy. As the CC now stands, can it possibly motivate all students over the thing which directly affects us most, the defining and managing of the education process? We believe we are apathetic for good reasons. We are impotent as concerns our primary interest. We want it to be clear that we are not criticizing or intending to denigrate the important functions the CC already performs. But we are saying that the CC must do more than provide limited input to the most powerful Committees on campus, the Faculty Steering Committee, the Committee on Educational policy, the Committee on Appointments and Promotions, and the Committee on Undergraduate Life. As students, we are the reason for this College and have the right to play a central and influential role in its functioning.

We propose we answer this question right now. All that is required is beginning to talk, leading to a vote on the part of each College House to recognize the preceding principles. The reason for this is to demonstrate to the Administration that we are responsible community members and insist on our right to this status. We are not a Community yet, we are a family. The faculty members are our parents, and we are their children. In our opinion this is a backward conception of higher education which does not recognize our primary and reciprocal value (with the faculty) in the education process, nor our capabilities for self-growth.

The specific governing body and constitution to be created is left to later debate in house meetings and an upcoming forum. In principle it must recognize our central role in the College and the right to an equal determining of this role.

Greater student power could provide a forum for all concerned students to help call attention to and bring pressure on inconsistent policies in the running of our institution. How many students know that last year the College owned 15,000 shares of stock in the proven discriminatory and criminal corporation of J. P. Stevens and Co.? Student power must not be seen as an end in itself, but rather as a door to a dynamic and creative educational institution that recognizes its responsibilities to society because we are the beneficiaries of society's advanced knowledge. And we hope the faculty has the wisdom to realize that our interests are not at odds. In this family, we students may just be growing up.

The choice is ours. Only be seizing this opportunity now through direct and campus-wide action can we demonstrate our genuine concern for our lives at Williams—do we care?

Letters: Gladden explains vote

Secession

To the editor:
An Open Letter:

Last Thursday night, a two-thirds majority of Gladden House voted unanimously to withdraw their representation from the College Council and to call for a campus-wide open forum to explore possible alternatives to the present organization. This was not a sudden decision, but had been discussed among the officers and various members of the house for over a month. Nor did we feel that we were alone in our discontent, given the recent rejection of the revised CC Constitution.

A deliberate effort was made to have as many house members at this meeting as was possible. Because some students had other obligations 100 per cent attendance was not possible, so it was agreed that with two-thirds of the house membership represented, a quorum had been reached. It was also decided that the vote had to be unanimous as it would be unfair to any who wanted representation on the College Council to have that representation withdrawn without their approval. While discussion centered around the gesture of withdrawal as a symbolic action, all agreed that such a move would not be effective without an effort to produce positive options to the present form of government.

We simply can no longer believe that the College Council is capable of representing us adequately or of effecting any significant change in college "policy"; those who still look to the council for administration and communication have met with frustration at its seemingly near-static pace, justified or not. Yet those who have tried their best to make the organization work surely cannot be blamed as much as we ourselves. Lack of participation in student government has been largely responsible for the mess we're now in.

It would seem, then, that the College Council as it stands does not work. Can we now come up with something that does?

Gladden House is calling for a forum to discuss alternatives to the present organization. This forum has been scheduled for 8:00 p.m. Wednesday, March 9, in Room A Currier Hall. Everybody is needed: students, faculty, administration, anyone with a constructive suggestion or a willingness to listen and react. The need for campus-wide participation in this cannot be overemphasized.

Contrary to some opinion, we do not feel that our withdrawal was a negative action. We believe that it demands on our part a commitment to explore and work for other methods of student involvement in the administration of Williams College. We at Gladden cannot do it alone; the cooperation of all members of the college community is, we believe, absolutely necessary to the success of this project. Together, we can do it.

CC

To the editor:

If we feel that the College Council does nothing, then let us have no council. I suggest direct elections for finance committee and student representatives of student-faculty committees. The finance committee would prepare a budget for Student Activities Tax funds, just as the council's finance committee does now. Their recommendations would then be subject to approval by the entire student body. The only loss is that no one would be able to put "elected to College Council" on their job applications and resumes.

Sincerely,
JD Childs '77

Perry boycotts

To the editor:

Two-thirds of the Perry-Bascom-Lambert House members attending last Sunday night's meeting have decided that they will not vote in the upcoming College Council election.

Rather than seceding and forfeiting our representation, as Gladden House has done, we are boycotting the election in hopes that Council members will restructure Council so that it performs its functions efficiently.

We understand the College Council to have three functions: to allocate funds to student organizations, to represent student opinion to the faculty, and to keep the student body informed of pertinent issues. Presently, it is not performing its functions well: students are totally unaware of the critical issues that come up and the decisions that are made, many of which concern them.

We will not vote, and we ask every house on campus to join with us in boycotting this election.

Brenda M. Flock
Perry CC Rep.

Council Candidates

"The spirit of change exists among Williams students;" Tom Herwitz '78 observed, "Now is the time for action. That's why I'm running for College Council President—to offer an alternative to Williams students; to give people a real reason to vote next week."

Herwitz explained that he is running in spite of the Gladden House action of last week. "My own position is in sympathy with the Gladden idealism. But I think it is wrong to secede without a workable alternative. The College Council is not totally obsolete and I reject the implications of its dissolution without another arena for student voice." Herwitz added that he feels the real problem of the CC is that it has no real clout with the administration.

"I support whole heartedly the Gladden House call for a school wide forum to discuss the problem of student government here," he added. "But I am not so sure that the CC should be completely abandoned in the meantime."

As an outsider not bogged down by previous allegences but with a good deal of budgetary and organizational experience as an editor of the Record and President of WCFM Herwitz feels he has the objectivity to effectively change the situation for the better.

Herwitz added that besides the general CC reforms he also has a number of specific ideas to solve major campus problems. For example, he feels it is necessary that student viewpoints are represented on the CAP, and a number of the crucial Trustee committees. "I see sore spots in the areas of housing transfers, the ACEC and other organizational funding, and potential in the concept of parallel commiftees."

Let's face it: our CC is a farce and Gladden deserves a medal for having the guts to say so. All it does is divide up the student activities tax. Most of its meetings are devoted to a round robbing of irrelevant, long-winded harangues inflicted upon us by future politicians whose voices are liked more by themselves than by the rest of us.

One semi-serious approach suggested is putting the council out of its misery. Actually, it's not an unreasonable idea. But we are stuck now with voting for a new group of officers. Once elected, it will be the duty of these people to discuss and hopefully institute alternatives to the present (non)systems of (not) running the student (non)government.

I run for this position because I wish to offer an alternative to the normal candidate, Mr. Kelly says, "The greatest task facing the next president will be the job of raising students' consciousness of the council as central to their lives here." The College Council central to our lives!?!? I am sure that Harry means well, but who is he kidding? This is the same tired approach taken by every bright-eyed poli-sci major who ever ran for the CC presidency. And, as always, that statement will probably be relegated to the back-burner once its author is elected.

We cannot afford another president who thinks he can reorganize this school. We must be realistic. Students just don't need a person who spends every waking hour setting up parallel committees to accomplish the Lord knows what. What we need is a candidate who recognizes the council for the joke that it is, and supplies a much-needed punch line.

Experimental Education

On Wed. March 2, an informational meeting will be held in Bronfman 106 at 7:30 P.M. on experiential education. Students contemplating a year off, uncertain of their plans at Williams, or seeking an alternative form of education are invited to attend.

In 1973 and 1974, an experimental program of experiential education called Williams-at-home was instituted under the direction of Professor Bob Gaudino. The basic premise of the proposal was that the confines of Williamstown prohibit the students here from making any realistic sort of contact with America as it truly exists. Student participants travelled across America, living and working with families in Appalachia, the Deep South, Harlem, Iowa, and Detroit. The highly controversial program, which ended with the death of Prof. Gaudino in 1974, is striving for a come-back.

the previous Saturday's banquet was served Sunday night.

His decision to remove coffee from the lunch menu was an economic and educational one, Keller stated. "When the price of coffee went up, attention was focused on it." Keller said he felt, "We as a school could join in a protest by elimination of coffee at lunch."

According to Keller, the partial boycott "demonstrates that we are part of the real world." Keller denied the action was political.

The food chief described the shift in breakfast hours one Saturday morning at Greylock as an accidental "screw up."

Keller stated that he will attempt to communicate with members of the student body through future issues of a newsletter. The newsletters will describe the "functioning of the food service committees" and provide "explanations on decisions or considerations involved in making decisions," Keller claimed.

He seemed surprised to learn that a number of students had indicated to the Record that they thought his first newsletter was offensive.

Students with suggestions or complaints can make an appointment to see him or work through food services committees, Keller stated.

Bell's poetry suggests strategy for finding self

Stars Which See, Stars Which Do Not See poems by Marvin Bell.

[M. Bell will give a reading at Williams on Thursday, March 3, at 8:00 p.m. in Driscoll Lounge.]

reviewed by Kate McCune

About nine years ago, I started to read poetry and found an anthology with some poems by Marvin Bell in it, along with his statement on poetry. Bell said he writes "because it feels good . . . to change my life." That made a lot of sense to me then (and it still does), so I read the poems. I hated them—but I was twelve. While I was busy turning twenty, Marvin Bell was busy writing and teaching. Last week, Atheneum released his fourth book of poems, Stars Which See, Stars Which Do Not See. We've both changed in nine years.

This is a wonderful book. By that I mean it inspires wonder; it makes you listen to yourself. The style has a simplicity and grace that I rarely find in contemporary poetry. Bell is much concerned with language—its possibilities and its failures. In "To No One in Particular," he discusses a language more primal than the one we speak. He asks, "Who will write down this language? . . . Whose slow murder will disprove for all time an alphabet meant to make sense?" That is what Bell tries to do with poetry, because poetry is neither language nor thought but the space between, where we can understand what we can't elucidate.

To me, this is a distinctly mid-western book. Plainspeaking is the style, and an acceptance of the land and of one's self is a major theme. More and more, Bell finds a way to define himself in terms of his wife, his children, and the land. "Bits and Pieces of Our Land" is a quiet, wise poem that speaks of man's relationship to the earth: "it will become what you want it to be, and then become all that it wanted you to." He comes to define himself by his family as well as the land, not out of need, but out of the strength between them all. "To Dorothy" is a beautiful poem to his wife that integrates nature and their love.

When Bell tries to locate himself, the process is internal, not physical or temporal. Several poems seem to describe old photos. The writer looks hard into the past to see if he is there. The most notable of these poems are "Fresh News From the Past," which captures the innocence of America at the turn of the century.

If the poems in this book are a strategy for locating one's self, Bell succeeds; he finds himself in joy. It is a joy that springs from grief, but he doesn't stay with the sadness; he believes "there will always come another moment to be appreciated because fading or crumbling." Transience teaches joy.

It's always hard to say what poetry is, let alone if it's good or bad. Marvin Bell once said that, for him, a good test of a poem is "inexhaustibility"—how many times you can come back to it meaningfully. In Stars, Bell cuts through sentiment (more trick than craft) with a clean, spare diction that finds its way through to emotion. What he touches is the thing between thought and language; it's poetry.

Ensemble starts shakily, ends well

by Valerie A. Sarantos

In the cultural setting of the Clark Art Institute, eight of the highly acclaimed Music From Marlboro musicians returned to Williamstown last Thursday evening to perform chamber music works of the Classical and Early Romantic periods. The program consisted of Mozart's Quartet in F Major for Oboe and Strings (1781); a String Trio No. 2 in B Flat Major (1817) by Schubert; and the indisputable highlight of the evening, Hummel's Septet in D Minor, Op. 74.

The ensemble got off to an extremely shaky start with Mozart's Quartet. Oboe, violin, viola, and cello were unfortunately not a truly cohesive group, largely owing to the occasional choppiness and unclear runs of Rudolph Vrbsky's oboe part. Daniel Phillips, violin; Caroline Levine, viola; and Lisa Lancaster, cello, displayed their individual talents however, during the course of the piece. Lancaster was particularly outstanding on cello.

Schubert's String Trio followed with violin, viola, and cello; the performers this time exhibiting more cooperation among themselves. The piece was impressively rendered despite the distracting vehement nasal gesticulations of the violinist on every rest.

Pianist Beth Levin stole the show with her marvelous keyboard virtuosity in Johann Nepomuk Hummel's four-movement Septet. The quick-paced composition was thoroughly exciting, with all participants apparently enjoying themselves. Joining the previous musicians for this piece were Judith Mendenhall, flute, and Robert Routch, French horn.

Pianist Joseph makes debut in fifth "Music in the Round"

Music in the Round, the chamber music series sponsored by the Williams College Department of Music and directed by Julius Hegyi, will give its fifth concert of the year this Friday at 8:30 p.m., in Thompson Memorial Chapel.

Two English composers and two German composers are represented on the program, which consists of Benjamin Britten's Sonata in C for cello and piano, Frank Bridge's Rhapsody for two violins and viola, Ferruccio Busoni's Sonata No. 2 for violin and piano, and Brahms' Trio, Opus 8, in B Major, for violin, cello, and piano.

For many people, the Brahms trio is the most nearly perfect chamber music work ever written; certainly, it is immensely popular throughout the music world. For this performance, Charles Joseph, newest member of the Williams College Department of Music faculty, will make his public debut as pianist in Williamstown, replacing Stephen Dankner, who is on leave this semester to concentrate on his composing. Julius Hegyi, violinist, and Douglas Moore, cellist, are the others in the trio.

In Busoni's Sonata, Hegyi will be joined by pianist Kenneth Roberts, also of the Williams music faculty. Although Busoni lived well into the twentieth century, much of his music shows a definite combination of the Classic influence with late Romantic style.

British composer Frank Bridge, who died in 1941, was a viola-player and, for many years, a member of the English String Quartet. He wrote a great deal of chamber music for strings, but this one-movement Rhapsody is written for a rather unusual combination of stringed instruments. Hegyi and Janet Rowe will play violins, while Susan St. Amour will be violist.

Benjamin Britten, who had been a student of Bridge, wrote his Sonata in C in 1961 for his good friend and cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

"Stasis in Darkness"

"Stasis in Darkness," an improvisational theater piece based on the works of Sylvia Plath, will be presented March 3, 4 and 5 at 8:30 p.m. in the AMT. The play is directed by Dianne Thompson '77.

Seating is limited. Tickets will be available at the Greylock entrance of the theater.

Despite loss to Jeffs

Ephs prepare for post season play

by Andy O'Donnell

Bulletin: All of a sudden tonight's Lasell encounter with a strong Merchant Marine club has been transformed from season finale to tournament warm-up. And the folks down in Amherst are going to be livid.

Late yesterday afternoon the varsity basketball team received a bid to compete in the post-season ECAC Division II-III tournament to be held this weekend at a site which, as of 9:00 this morning, had not been determined.

Traditionally, the top seeded team hosts the affair, but Hartford declined both a bid and the top seeding yesterday, apparently still chagrined at failing to receive a spot in the more prestigious NCAA Division II tournament.

Other teams accepting bids include second seeded Quinnipiac and third seeded Wesleyan.

Before Hartford pulled out, Williams was scheduled to play Quinnipiac, a very strong (16-10) Division II team, while Wesleyan had drawn Hartford. The tournament committee will probably replace Hartford by simply moving each entry up one seed and adding a fourth team, possibly Central Connecticut or Amherst.

In any case, Williams will more than likely square off against Quinnipiac this Friday evening. Since there is no consolation round, the Ephs must win Friday in order to play again Saturday.

The bid marks the second time Coach Curt Tong has guided his charges into the ECAC tournament in four years at the Williams helm. Three winters ago the Ephs fell to Brandeis in the first round of the tournament in one of the more classic "homer" games in recent memory.

The bid should go a long ways towards removing some of the sting of Saturday night's heartbreaking 61-54 loss to Amherst before a sellout crowd at the new Amherst gym.

Putting together its best effort of the season, the Jeffs disappointed an extremely large and endearingly pusy contingent of Williams fans with a solid team performance that boasted a bevy of heroes other than Jim Rehnquist.

The loss dropped Williams Little Three record to 2-2 and kept alive Amherst's hopes for a piece of the crown. If the Jeffs beat Wesleyan tonight, the Little Three ends up in a three way tie. If Wesleyan wins, the Cardinals cop the title outright. Presently, Wesleyan is 2-1 in league play and Amherst 1-2.

For the second meeting in a row, Rehnquist was not the controlling factor in the game despite leading all scorers with 14 points. Instead, coach Rick Wilson turned to three unlikely heroes who responded with a trio of clutch performances.

Neither Matt Martland or Dave Protiva scored in the Ephs' 55-41 romp over Amherst back in January, for instance, yet this time around they combined for 25 points. And Bill Swiacki, who hadn't even started in the first contest, this time dominated the offensive boards and chipped in with 10 points as well.

Williams trailed at the half, 32-26, despite some strong play by Gerry Kelly, but rallied behind three Andy Straka bombs to surge into the lead, 35-34, as the second half opened. Four hopes by Protiva put Amherst ahead 56-46, with just 2:22 remaining, but some last minute heroics by Mike Tanner closed the gap to 56-52 with 0:44 left. Williams then forced a Martland turnover but missed two opportunities to narrow the margin to two. A Rehnquist dunk wrapped things up for Amherst. Tanner led Williams with 13 points, followed by Kelly and Straka with 12 apiece.

Women cagers pound MIT, 67-26

by Nancy Rhein

Finally putting it all together, the offensive hustle and tight defense, the Ephwomen finished it off big, blowing MIT right off the court in a 67-26 rout Friday night.

The Ephs went into the MIT contest with determination, hoping to improve on their poor play of late. That drive combined with the squad's high spirit, as a result of this week's naming of Williams as second seed in the upcoming invitational tournament, to spark the Ephs to an easy win.

Having lost their offensive punch on the road, the Ephs quickly found it on their lucky court, knocking MIT off its feet in the early going. A 4-4 tie at 18:53 was the last glimmer of hope for the visitors as the Ephs proceeded to move from 10-8 to 20-8 in the span of four minutes.

Senior Robin Ellett in her last regular season game for Williams, led the drive, grabbing rebounds to assist Lisa Capaldini and Monica Grady. Leslie Milne playing her usual tough defense enabled the squad to hold MIT at 8 points, while they added another 10 to their lead in the next few minutes.

The skills of Lucy Bledsoe and Jeannie Weeks later in the half moved the team to a comfortable 39-16 lead going into the lockeroom.

After that it was no contest as Capaldini and Maggie O'Brien fired away for the Ephs, taking the team to a 61-22 lead early in the second half. O'Brien, playing foul free, precision ball was hitting well for the team, while Capaldini managed the outside shots to keep the squad well ahead.

The Ephs' bench, recovering from a variety of leg injuries looked stronger as they came in for the starting five late in the half. In her first substantial playing time of the season, Bledsoe took control of the game, going for 6 points. She and Weeks combined with Michele Johnson, Louise Van Dyck, and Karyn Allison to hold the visitors to 26 points.

Commenting on the game, Ephs' coach Sue Hudson had nothing but praise for the squad.

This weekend's tournament will provide more of a challenge for the spirited Ephs, as they meet seventh ranked Emanuel, in first round play Thursday night. Playing at Brandeis, the Ephs will have tougher competition in the single elimination play as they must deal with their opponent's man to man defense and full court press—two strategies which have cost the team several games in this season's 8-5 record.

Six skiers qualify for Div. I NCAA's

Six Williams skiers qualified for the Division I NCAA's at the Middlebury Carnival as the team placed a disappointing 5th in the Eastern Championships. Alpine skiers Chris Welch, Andy Mikell, Donald Tarinelli, and Josh Dembinski as well as cross country skier Gary James and jumper Scott Berry qualified for slots in the national championships which will be held at Winter Park, Colorado.

In the team totals at the Middlebury Carnival - Eastern Championships, Williams moved into a tight battle with the University of New Hampshire on the first day of competition. The Ephs skied to fourth in the Giant Slalom and held a slim five point lead over UNH. The G.S. squad was led by Andy Mikell in 12th and Chris Welch in 22nd. The next event, the cross country, was run in tricky wax conditions with some skiers running on no-wax skis and some going with wax. Gary James led the Ephs in this event with a 12th place finish, followed by Jeff Magoon in 19th and Will Schmidt in 23rd. Schmidt and Magoon, both seeking NCAA berths, did not make it although both had outstanding season records. In the team scoring, Williams only managed to pick up one more point on UNH to end the first day with a six point lead over its opponent.

The second day opened with the slalom, an event where do or die seems to be the rule. The Ephmen, led by Mikell, Tarinelli and Dembinski, flashed through the first run to grab 3rd, 4th and 16th place. But Slalom is a two-run-race and a bolt of lightning struck on that all important second run as Andy Mikell hooked a tip five gates from the finish and flew off the course. With the pressure now mounting, Tarinelli had his finest day of the year as he ignored the pressure and skied to 6th place, the highest individual Williams placing of the weekend. Dembinski, also in a pressure situation, both for the team score and NCAA qualification, cruised to 14th for another good finish. When the team scores were calculated, however, Williams had dropped 10 points to UNH with the jumping event next on the schedule.

The Williams flyers had never beaten UNH in the event but responded to the challenge as they had their best day ever as individuals and as a team. Unfortunately the Ephs could not overtake UNH and settled into fifth place in the overall standings. The jumping squad was led by senior Scott Berry who met the NCAA qualifying standard in ninth position. Berry recorded his finest performance as a ski jumper as he was the fourth American in a field dominated by Norwegian athletes. Berry was followed by Tom Dodds in 18th and senior Will Schmidt who capped off the weekend with an excellent 22nd place performance, after missing the NCAA qualifying standard in the cross country competition.

The Ephmen now move to Colorado with high hopes of placing in the top ten at the nationals.

JV squash ends season 2-2

We all know who they are. In basketball they're called the sixth man, in baseball the pinch-hitter. This rare breed is ready to help the starters out at any time in any situation.

Now add the JV squash team to the list. Like the sixth man and pinch-hitter who have recently been getting notice, it's time to recognize the hard working JV. Laboring in obscurity throughout the winter, this group, led by coach Dave Johnson, was always ready to help the varsity out in their daily practices.

Compiling a record of 2-2, the jayvees recorded wins over Harvard and Middlebury while suffering losses by one match to both Yale and Trinity. Senior Mark Urken was the elder statesman of the group, followed by juniors Eric Pyenson and Evan Bash, both of whom had respectable 2-2 personal records. Outdoing everyone, however, was Peter Thomson with a perfect 4-0 mark, while fellow soph Doug Gernert had a fine 2-2 year.

Also working hard all winter to improve their games, the freshman squad compiled a 5-5 season record. Wally Miller and Mike Battey, the only players to have held a squash racquet before December, were one-two on the ladder and had 6-4 and 5-5 match marks respectively. Vastly improved John McGovern (6-4) shows good potential for the future along with Miller and Battey. Rounding out the top four was John McDowell (5-5).

Other members of the team who also demonstrated considerable improvement were: John Hammond, Will Ballew, Wayne Eckerson and Greg Witcher.

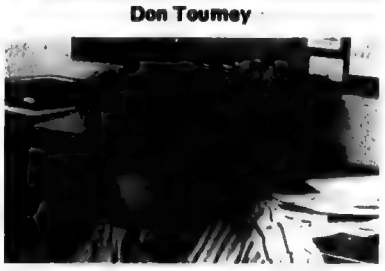
Roper Center pools with Yale, UConn to improve access

The expansion of the Roper Public Opinion Research Center into a joint system of operations involving Williams, Yale, and the University of Connecticut will "greatly improve" access to Roper data by Williams faculty and students, according to President John W. Chandler.

Under the new plan, the Roper Center will transfer its data processing operations to the University of Connecticut, while Yale will assume control of user's services. Williams will maintain a complete set of archives, and will have immediate access to future data through a computer terminal or taping system. Williams will also tentatively oversee Roper publicity operations, and control the cataloging and indexing of data.

Chandler cited inadequate computer facilities as one reason for the change in operations. "The Center's potential wasn't being fully realized here," he said. "With access to the computer facilities of two major research universities, resources will be much more widely used, and data distribution will be improved."

Chandler also observed that the new system will help to "relieve some of the financial burdens" imposed on Williams to maintain the Roper Center. Under the arrangement, Williams will contribute $5,000 annually to the Center, while Yale and the University of Connecticut will each provide a $15,000 grant and $15,000 worth of computer time.



The new arrangement, effective as of July 1, will convert the Roper Center into a non-profit corporation governed by a board of trustees composed of members of the present Roper Center board and an equal number of representatives from each of the three participating schools. Chandler said he anticipates that the transition process will take "at least a year," during which time the Center will continue to operate at Williams as it has in the past.

Presidential candidates favor various changes

All eight candidates for College Council president interviewed by the Record Tuesday and Wednesday agreed that a serious change in student government at Williams was needed. Proposals ranged from a concerted effort to reinvigorate the existing council to a call for abolition of the CC altogether.

The candidates interviewed included Jamie Barickman, Tom Herwitz, Harry Kelly, Larry Mitchell, Dan O'Connell, Tom Stone, Don Toumey, and Michael Wolfson.

The candidates all said that the present unrest among students as indicated by the withdrawal of Gladden House from the CC was significant and agreed that the increased student interest was good. Only one candidate interpreted these developments as an indication that the council should be abolished. Others recommended change short of abolition, differing in the severity of the change they advocated.

Most candidates saw the College Council as a valuable means of soliciting and transmitting student opinion, a function which they felt the council could perform much more effectively if reformed. These reforms included open forums to gather student opinion, an effort to deal with more important issues in the council, improved communication with students through representatives, and restructuring of the council itself.

Many candidates favored reform of the budgeting process, such as completing more of the process in the spring and conducting a more thorough continuous examination of organization spending. Others advocated a directly elected finance committee, bypassing the council entirely. Some recommended a careful review of the ACEC, indicating that severe cuts and efficiencies could be imposed.

Food quality has definitely declined, according to some candidates. Others felt that the situation has improved significantly under Food Services Director Ross Keller. Many said that more information should be released to students, and student opinion solicited, though differing on how student opinion should be transmitted. Some advocated open forums to gather student opinion which would then be passed on to the administration either directly or through the council. Others suggested the establishment of a student-faculty committee to replace Keller.

Sunday night at 10:30 PM, WCFM will air a question and answer interview with the candidates for College Council President. Questioners will be Chip Buckner, Joe Cerbone, Jim Cohen, Dave Forrester.

Council specifies valid election, endorses forum

The College Council voted to require ballots from two-thirds of the student body before validating the coming election and to endorse the open forum, sponsored next week by protesting Gladden House, at a special Wednesday night meeting.

According to Council President Steve Piltch, the two-thirds requirement had been only a tradition. A motion from Bill Dahling, passed 11 to 7, made the tradition a by-law of the council, though council members voiced concern over present chances for a successful election.

Dahling cited the need, in light of recent student concern, for an official standard in evaluating the legitimacy of elections. Elections Committee Chairman Randy Sturges noted that in previous elections the two-thirds mark has been reached only with effort. Ballots marked "abstention" or voting for non-council offices will count.

Council members also resolved to supply ballots to members of houses boycotting the election Monday and Tuesday. Representatives from Gladden and Perry houses declared they would provide ballots to all house members desiring to vote.

Freshman representative Cabby Tennis proposed that the council endorse the open forum planned by Gladden House members for Wednesday night. The forum is designed to explore alternatives to the College Council and to increase student participation in government and decision-making.

Corrections

The page one story on Gladden House erroneously reported that the house's "withdrawal of its representative" from the College Council "will apparently result in a waiver of CC appropriated funds from the Student Activities Tax." The council does not appropriate funds to the houses from the SAT. The College returns $10 per student at the outset of each term and an additional $5 at the close from the totally separate House Maintenance Tax. Gladden House will not lose any of these funds.

Statements grouped under the headline "Council Candidates" on page two should have been attributed to Tom Herwitz and Don Toumey. The left column was Herwitz's announcement; the right column was Toumey's. Both statements have been reprinted in this issue.

Robert creates row

'The Way it Was . . . with Redford'

by John Rindlaub

The announcement has been made and you've heard it repeated at least a dozen times: Robert Redford, film star and environmentalist, has been asked to come to Williams in June to receive an honorary degree at commencement. But will he be here? A woman in the President's office said, "I can tell you that we have not received word whether he is coming." And if Redford breaks an engagement with the College community it will not be the first time.

In early June, 1972, film makers began negotiating with the College, resulting in a mutual agreement that shooting for the film, The Way We Were, would begin at Williams on August 17 and would be completed by September 31.

Bob Wiley, then coach of the Williams crew selected 8 members to appear with Redford in a racing scene. The filming was delayed until September 3. Realizing that only one-third of the script was complete, the College negated the contract; film officials were unable to meet the date of completion.

The campus scenes were transferred to Union College in Schenectady, New York and filming did not begin until September 15. Wiley was hired to teach Redford the fundamentals of rowing since the crew scene was still an integral part of the movie.

Wiley became rather exhausted of the procedure in that he would rise each day, appear punctually at the 7 a.m. set call and find that Redford would arrive at-best two and a half hours later at best. "I would show up at seven, and Redford usually rolled up on his motorcycle at about nine-thirty, apparently not ready to do anything until about ten," Wiley told The Record (October 3, 1972).

As a novice, the star found the basics of oarsmanship difficult to master. Because of Redford's sporadic appearances on the set, Wiley did not endow him with sufficient knowledge of rowing. His own experience, he said, "was reduced to an all-expenses paid vacation to Schenectady."

Everyone it seemed, was at the anticlimactic filming of the race on Lake Onota in Pittsfield, including the recently shorn crew team members portraying the 30's small college jock image. Yet there was a certain air of uneasiness—something was lacking. After a short time, it was realized that the beloved hero of The Way We Were, RR himself, was absent. He allegedly was unable to make reservations to fly from Albany to Pittsfield.

Given the ease with which Redford mastered the physical art of rowing, the veracity of this statement is hardly dubious. Wiley believed that it was not that Redford lacked enthusiasm for the film, but instead that he had "too many things to do, and not enough time to learn to row."

The filming went on anyway, with Wiley acting as a stand in. On September 25, the long-awaited shooting—constituting 3 minutes of film and 9 hours and 15 miles of rowing—took place. The alumni rowers are probably still doubting whether it was worth the sacrifice of long locks and facial growths. Wiley evaluated his experience: "I had never thought of a movie as a facade before . . . the experience really was a fraud. But it was educational because I developed appreciation for the delicacy of the illusion."

Is Redford's coming to receive a degree at Williams just another illusion, not worth the 40 inches of Record space already sacrificed in his vain? Will his PR people brief him thoroughly in the arts of hand-shaking and sheepskin-reception and has he now learned how to book a plane? Can he find his way to the lawn north of Williams Hall, or will he once again miss the boat? Given this uncertainty, President Chandler's statement is well-advised: "It is the practice of the College not to discuss honorary degrees before the official announcement is made."

Council Unrest

The current student unrest concerning the College Council is both useful and potentially harmful to student interests. The activities of Gladden House, Perry House and various other social units and groups have certainly been instrumental in getting the message across that students are not satisfied with the role of their student government. On the other hand, it seems unlikely that such actions as secession from the council or boycotting the upcoming election will work to replace the current structure with anything more viable.

Take Gladden House, for instance. Gladden recently decided to withdraw its representation from the College Council and hold a campus-wide forum to discuss alternatives to the Council. One might indeed admire Gladden's boldness if the house had been active in trying to make the present council work. Unfortunately, the Gladden House council representative never spoke at council meetings and never told the council how the members of Gladden felt during the entire period when the council was evaluating its constitution and its role in campus affairs.

In a letter to the editor (Record 3-1-77) the members of Gladden state, "Lack of participation in student government has been largely responsible for the mess we're now in." We wonder why Gladden has turned in only a miserable 35 per cent of its student course evaluation questionnaires.

The activities of Gladden House and other groups and houses like them seem aimed at proving that the present College Council is a joke. They may well succeed. Students who believe that they can make a joke out of an institution one day and use it, or a similar institution, to effect change the next day are however sadly misled.

The candidates for College Council president seem to agree on only one point—that students want more input into the decision-making process at Williams. We believe that their perceptions are accurate. Why, however, should the administration take seriously student demands for more input into decision-making if those channels which do exist are neglected? We urge students to channel their frustrations into constructive and realistic proposals for improving student government.

Council Candidates

Herwitz

"The spirit of change exists among students;" Tom Herwitz '78 observed, "Now is the time for action. That's why I'm running for College Council President—to offer an alternative to Williams students; to give people a real reason to vote next week."

Herwitz explained that he is running in spite of the Gladden House action of last week. "My own position is in sympathy with the Gladden idealism. But I think it is wrong to secede without a workable alternative. The College Council is not totally obsolete and I reject the implications of its dissolution without another arena for student voice." Herwitz added that he feels the real problem of the CC is that it has no real clout with the administration.

"I support whole heartedly the Gladden House call for a school wide forum to discuss the problem of student government here," he added. "But I am not so sure that the CC should be completely abandoned."

As an outsider not bogged down by previous allegences but with a good deal of budgetary and organizational experience as an editor of the Record and President of WCFM Herwitz feels he has the objectivity to effectively change the situation for the better.

Herwitz added that besides the general CC reforms he also has a number of specific ideas to solve major campus problems. For example, he feels it is necessary that student viewpoints are represented on the CAP, and a number of the crucial Trustee committees. "I see sore spots in the areas of housing transfers, the ACEC and other organizational funding, and potential in the concept of parallel committees."

"Students must have more say in the matters that effect them most," he continued. Only if we can help create our own environment can a healthy situation exist.

Toumey

Let's face it: our CC is a farce and Gladden deserves a medal for having the guts to say so. All it does is divide up the student activities tax. Most of its meetings are devoted to a round robbing of irrelevant, long-winded harangues inflicted upon us by future politicians whose voices are liked more by themselves than by the rest of us. I should know. (I am one of them).

One semi-serious approach suggested is putting the council out of its misery. Actually, it's not an unreasonable idea. But we are stuck now with voting for a new group of officers. Once elected, it will be the duty of these people to discuss and hopefully institute alternatives to the present (non)systems of (not) running the student (non)government.

I run for this position because I wish to offer an alternative to the normal candidate. Mr. Kelly says, "The greatest task facing the next president will be the job of raising students' consciousness of the council as central to their lives here." The College Council central to our lives!?!? I am sure that Harry means well, but who is he kidding? This is the same tired approach taken by every bright-eyed poli-sci major who ever ran for the CC presidency. And, as always, that statement will probably be relegated to the back-burner once its author is elected.

We cannot afford another president who thinks he can reorganize this school. We must be realistic. Students just don't need a person who spends every waking hour setting up parallel committees to accomplish the Lord knows what. What we need is a candidate who recognizes the council for the joke that it is, and supplies a much-needed punch line.

Wolfson

Michael Wolfson '78 announced his candidacy for president of the College Council. His running mate is Dave Carroll '78.

"The College Council cannot become a meaningful forum for student opinion in its present incarnation. 'Open' meetings, more committees, and 'consciousness raising' are all doomed to failure. The CC is an obstacle to the student body's effective exercise of its legitimate power to influence administrative decisions. The CC officially expresses student views—does it really? How hard does it try? How many people know what, if anything, the CC does? And how many times have we heard the CC candidates promise to make the CC a responsive, effecient, and powerful body, only to have it bog down in a morass of petty politics?

"The CC has had its chance and failed. Now it is time to eliminate the middleman, to give interested students the power and the opportunity to work directly for their own interests. Abolish the CC! The president has the power effectively to do that. He must now exercise that power.

"We are not calling for any particular plan. We are calling for a united vote against the CC. Once the CC is abolished, realistic discussion of alternatives can begin. It can begin at an open assembly March 9 at 8 p.m. in Room A of Currier Hall.

"We propose: Open monthly "Town Meetings," Advance agenda. Chairperson elected at prior meeting. Finance Committee elected by direct vote. Those seriously interested will form small groups to work directly on problems."

Wolfson and Carroll are both taking next year off. To ensure a totally open and free forum, they feel that after the first "Town Meeting" there will be no need for them to remain as officers.

O'Connell

The next president of the College Council should: tell the student body regularly what the College Council is doing, insist that the council hold its meetings at major dining halls at convenient hours, attend house meetings on campus to explain and to be told what to do, appear over WCFM regularly to announce council plans and ideas, tell students beforehand what will be discussed, demand that student-faculty committee members report publicly to the school, review fall funding and introduce a revolving door funding system, open communications with other colleges and change the college council so that every student can understand it and participate with it.

Long before these recent hassles, I told the council to stop debating ridiculous points, stop forming subcommittees, stop delegating its work to others, and to hold a forum-like meeting in a major dining hall.

Vote for a candidate who will change the college council to the way you want it—not the way he wants it. Call me up. Give me a buzz. The number is in the book. Vote student.

Stone

Only 23 per cent of the eligible student body voted in the recent referendum on the proposed College Council Constitution. The council has been almost invisible to the student body, rarely announcing agenda, meeting in an obscure part of the campus, and generally has been more interested in its own gyrations than student opinion and concern. For these reasons, the basic structure of the CC must be examined.

In the College Council's present state, it has shown itself barely able to do the first of these functions and unable to do the rest. The Alternative? Change. Tom Stone is running for CC President. His Plan? He will be at the forum held by Gladden House next Wednesday, March 9, in Currier Hall. He is seizing upon this opportunity to find out what kind of government the students want. He will introduce, through the council, the form of Student government that is agreed upon by the forum. This will be a form of government that is responsible to the students, for it will be created by them. Only a forum can decide what kind of government, we, the students of Williams College, want. Not a revised constitution, not a small change in procedure here, a small change there, but an entirely reworked council that is a council of the students, by the students, and for the students.

Barickman

I feel the current disapproval of the college council by the student body is entirely deserved. However, the cries to scrap the council and, following several open forums, devise an alternate structure is terribly foolish. If the student body truly wants a greater role in the immediate government of the college, that is to say, parity on student-faculty committees, or, at the extreme, veto power on faculty resolutions, then our problem is an external one—wrestling more power from the faculty—not an internal one. The student body will only delay and inhibit any significant dealings with the faculty by restructuring the council. The structure isn't at fault, what is at fault, in my opinion, is two things: 1) the current representatives, who are not doing anything—they are not consulting their constituencies, and 2) the college community's attitude toward the council. Realize what the council is—not much. It has two or three important functions (notably funding) and is a structure ready (if needed) to lobby for student rights with the faculty and administration. Don't inflate the council's role, realize it for what it is. I feel that I have this necessary attitude, one of realizing what the council is (not much) and realizing its potential (only if students really want it to do more).

Letters: Boycott, candidates, meals

Perry-no majority

To the editor:

I wish to clarify a point made by Brenda Flock '79, in her letter to the Record dated March 1, 1977. As you recall, Ms. Flock stated that the members of Perry-Bascom House present at the meeting held last Sunday, February 27 voted by a two-thirds majority to boycott the coming College Council elections. I wish to inform the readers that this two-thirds majority consisted of twenty-one of the thirty people present at that meeting. Since there are approximately eighty-two people affiliated with Perry-Bascom, the outcome of this vote in no way reflects the opinion of the majority of the students associated with these houses.

Sincerely,
Patricia A. McElrath, '79

Paternalism

To the editor:

Your reporter's extrapolation of what I said could have been ignored but for her intolerable lack of manners in telephoning me at midnight on Sunday in order to misquote me. I did say that Gladden's secession from the College Council would be silly without a specific alternative proposal, and I asserted that the CC certainly doesn't appear to have been a very effective body this year. I did not preach student support for the council: how other students react towards college politics is none of my business.

Now that the Gladden House position has been publicized (Viewpoint 3-1), it seems that the problems of Williams paternalism go deeper than just College Council. My interest, especially as president of Fort Hoosac House, is in seeing more autonomy for the houses, e.g. in governance of house staff and physical plant. Wouldn't this extend the educational value of the residential aspect stressed by Williams far beyond the present simple social responsibilities of houses?

Peter Currie '78

Withdrawal

To the editor:

I wish to formally withdraw my name from the list of candidates for College Council President.

The recent onslaught of student criticism of the Council in the March 1 RECORD has given me cause to consider, and reconsider, the impact of student opinion on the policy-making process at Williams. As the Perry-Bascom-Lambert decision to boycott the coming election indicates, a change in CC Presidents in no way guarantees greater communication between the Council and the student body nor a more efficient means of representing students' ideas. It only assures a new face in campus politics, and judging from the sentiments expressed in the Letters to the Editor, campus politics in their present form mean damn little to many of us.

We are clamoring for a voice in the everyday matters of student life—housing, food quality, faculty appointments, and similar areas of concern. And it is nice to hear students are finally upset enough to vocalize their objections. The present controversy over the CC proves that we are not apathetic, as is often charged, only frustrated in the face of our "political" impotence.

Change is definitely needed, but it must come from below—from the voting representatives of the various houses and classes and from opinions aired at student forums—not from the figurehead of a faltering institution of "student" government.

Therefore, I have decided that my sympathy for the positions voiced by Gladden House, Perry, and Dave Hansen et al, could be better put into action if elected as a voting representative of my House. The CC as it now exists may not be an effective form of government, but at least in a representative capacity, I would have a say in the choice of whatever viable alternatives are proposed. I urge others who share my viewpoints to consider giving up the glamour which "CC President" will lend to their transcripts in return for a vote on the changes which are surely pending.

And to those members of Gladden House who are organizing the forum for Wed., March 2, I applaud you and offer you my whole-hearted support.

Toumey endorsed

To the editor:

In the present contest for College Council President, Don Toumey provides a true alternative to the run-of-the-mill candidate. While others offer stock promises and carry on in a pompous manner, Don offers new approaches and refuses to take himself seriously. But don't get us wrong. Don doesn't believe that the concept of student government is a joke. Instead he understands both the inherent limitations to student power and the many untapped potentials for that power.

Don has been a strong spokesman of student interests: he has been an active member of the Food Service Committee and he fought the mandatory I.D. check. His experience has led him to propose a Food Service Committee with real authority, and in which students would have an equal say with the administration and the faculty.

Candidates discuss CC budget, legitimacy, reform

The following interview of all announced candidates for president of the College Council was conducted by the RECORD on Tuesday and Wednesday.

Candidates were interviewed in three groups, with each group asked five standard questions the responses to which are reported below. Each interview panel asked additional independent questions the responses to which are, in part, included in an article on page one.

QUESTION 1

1. How do you feel about the present unrest concerning the College Council? How should the CC respond?

JAMIE BARICKMAN: It is good that so much emotion and interest was generated, but open forums are a move in the wrong direction. The College Council is an important means of channeling student opinion, and its elimination would be counterproductive.

HARRY KELLY: The present dissatisfaction is a real problem. The answer is not restructuring the council, though. Most decisions are not made in the council, but in committees. We should concentrate on penetration of student-faculty committees and achieving parity. A permanent structure to keep pressure on the adminstration is needed.

TOM HERWITZ: I reject the idea of disbanding the CC. It is an unrealistic action which will probably lead to a loss of student voice in College affairs. The next administration, however, should use the present unrest as a force behind its dealings with the College administration.

MICHAEL WOLFSON: The present situation is an indication of rising awareness that the College Council is not responsive to student needs. I propose a series of open student forums to be run as town meetings in place of the College Council, in which all interested students could participate.

LARRY MITCHELL: Gladden is only hurting itself by seceding. If the council is ineffective, we should take steps to change it, not eliminate it. If elected, I will try to reinvigorate the council so that things get accomplished.

DON TOUMEY: I'm sorry Gladden and Perry are acting in this manner, since it will probably result in another president being elected who is only interested in making a name for himself instead of doing something constructive. Michael's plan is unrealistic. I hope to retain the CC, but shake it up and force it to deal with the issues.

DAN O'CONNELL: The feeling which inspired the secession has been building up all year, but needed the election to bring it to the surface. The council has been handling trivial and mundane matters; it should be made more visible and deal with more important questions.

TOM STONE: The unrest is justified, since the council has been ineffective. Radical changes are needed in its structure, and a student forum would be a good way to gather student ideas for revamping the CC.

2. Should the council pursue further attempts at constitutional reform? If so, in what direction?

BARICKMAN: I think it's ridiculous to go through the whole process again when it isn't necessary. Parallel committees and tighter language can be instituted through the present constitution.

HERWITZ: The referendum failure was a rejection by students of minor changes. Parallel committees and other reforms are possible within the old constitution. We should wait to see what reforms students want at the forum on Wednesday and then make changes.

KELLY: Constitution reform is not an immediate need. Our priority is rather to use the enthusiasm generated by the present unrest to get important things done and especially to improve representation.

TOUMEY: Part of the problem is the people on the CC, which might be improved if houses recalled unsatisfactory representatives. My answer is the election of a president who will get the council moving and who will deal with student problems.

WOLFSON: The problem is not reforming the council, but the council itself. If it does not fulfill its function, it should be abolished and replaced with a government of town meetings in which students participate directly.

MITCHELL: The primary fault is with the council members. The present constitution leaves much room for the council to act, but it can do nothing unless members are interested and seek out student opinion.

O'CONNELL: Students don't give a damn about the constitution. The major problem is the members themselves. Parallel committees are a joke; they are intended to do things that the council itself should be doing.

STONE: Parallel committees cannot be effective. The constitution should be reformed radically according to the wishes of the students expressed in open forums.

QUESTION 3

3. What changes, if any, would you make in the Student Activities Tax allocation process?

HERWITZ: There should be a serious effort at preliminary budgeting in the spring. Final allocations, however, should not be made until the following fall, with the process streamlined so that it could proceed at a faster rate. The ACEC should be carefully examined and should in the future be run on a more businesslike basis.

KELLY: The funding process should be started early enough in the spring to allow the Finance Committee to look over requests and begin to establish priorities. The first place to make cuts should be the ACEC.

BARICKMAN: We should have a spring budget for the ACEC only; other organizations don't really need one. Serious cuts need to be made in ACEC spending, but otherwise I am fairly pleased with the way funds are presently allocated. A serious effort should be made to solicit more student opinion of the process.

WOLFSON: Funding is the only thing the College Council does that is meaningful. Again, however, the council is unnecessary and should be eliminated. Its budgeting duties should be taken over by a finance committee directly elected by the students.

TOUMEY: The present budgeting process is all right, though more money should be spent on concerts. I would propose raising the Student Activities Tax and then giving a rebate to students.

MITCHELL: Funding should take place in the spring. I favor reform of the ACEC, in particular an examination of their procedures. I'm not sure more money for concerts is the answer, and I oppose any increase in the SAT.

O'CONNELL: I'd like to see the funding process changed. It should be staggered so that all funding isn't done in the fall. There should be a continuous evaluation of all funding.

STONE: The budgeting process should be reformed, incorporating the ideas which come out of the open forums.

QUESTION 4

4. What do you think about Food Services and what role should the council play in maintaining food quality?

HERWITZ: There are a lot of things I like and a lot of things I don't. Food Services has overspent in the past and we're suffering for it now. Food Services is a business and has to be run like one. I think Keller is very open and does accept student viewpoints, for example, student initiated changes at Mission Park. Information is sometimes a problem, but I don't think Keller is completely dictatorial.

BARICKMAN: We must first understand the effective input students have already. Food Services is under the direct control of Dean Roosenraad and the College administration. It's a business the College has to run. I'm not sure how concerned students really are about setting Food Service policy.

KELLY: One of the biggest inhibitors to student input is the fact that Keller is so tight with information. He keeps very tight nickel and dime figures but we cannot get hold of them. The important thing is to get budget information to students and to explain the budget constraints to us. Knowledge is power. Overall, there have been no substantial improvements. We have gained some things but have lost others.

MITCHELL: Food quality has definitely gone down-hill, and many students are dissatisfied. Improving this is a necessary and proper role for the College Council.

WOLFSON: It's great that other candidates are advocating open forums to gather student opinion, but why should we go through the College Council? Instead, students should act in small groups after consulting with all interested students in a town meeting format as I have suggested.

TOUMEY: As a member of the Food Services committee, I have complained about this before. A student-faculty committee should be set up to manage Food Services. We don't need a food czar. I also propose that vegetarian meals no longer be served in all dining halls and houses, and only be served in certain ones. Serving vegetarian meals everywhere is unnecessary and costly.

O'CONNELL: I think there has been some improvement in Food Services. The problem is that the issues are not out in front.

STONE: The issue of Food Services, like any other issue concerning the community, should be aired in a reformed College Council.

QUESTION 5

5. What role should the president and College Council play in governing the College, and how much power can they have?

KELLY: The College Council is a central body for the exchange of ideas. It is the duty of the president to bring together people who have something to say about the issues and to transmit this opinion.

HERWITZ: The most important function of the CC president and the council is to deal with the administration, as they are accepted by the administration as a representative voice of the student body. There is still a lot of potential for the use of student opinion, including that gathered by means such as referenda.

BARICKMAN: The College Council is a clearinghouse for student opinion. The president must play an important role, but he cannot and should not do everything. Individual representatives should be required to do more. Right now, by and large, they aren't really doing anything.

TOUMEY: The College Council will not run the College; anyone who thinks it will is crazy. It can be successful where the faculty do not have a strong contrary interest, and can increase student input into the governing of the College.

MITCHELL: The council can have power insofar as the faculty sees it as having power and respects it. The president and CC should pursue issues that will gain respect, such as energy conservation.

WOLFSON: If the College Council has any power, it is rarely exercised. I question whether the CC at all represents students. I suggest that it be abolished, and that students go to the faculty with student opinion expressed directly at open forums.

O'CONNELL: Right now the CC is a bunch of politicians, so the administration doesn't take it seriously. Once in touch with students, however, the council can have much more influence.

STONE: The council this year has been ineffective. Radical changes are needed in its structure. Although I am not a Gladden House candidate, I recommend an open forum in which students can give ideas for this change.

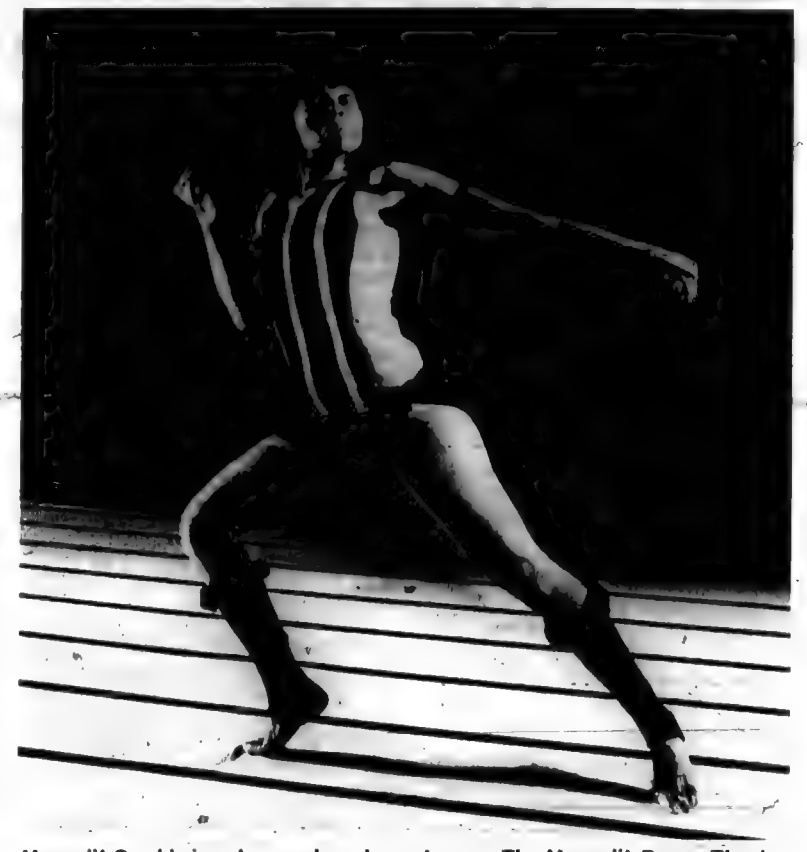
Dance company to perform, teach

The Margalit Dance Theatre Company will be in residency at Williams Thursday through Saturday, March 10-12. During its stay at the College, the company will present master classes, a lecture-demonstration, open rehearsals, and performances on Friday and Saturday nights. The Williamstown stop is the first on an Eastern tour of the Los Angeles based modern dance company.

The Aden-born Margalit, the founder of the company, is a combination of composer-choreographer, singer-virtuoso drummer, and dancer-actress. This former member of the Inbal Dance Company of Israel uses all of these elements in the creation of her company's works, integrating drama, mime, rhythm and music with emotions and dance.



Martha Graham said of Margalit, "She never comes on the stage for me to see her that tears do not come to my eyes. She has a quality which is very, very, very special. It is special wherever a great being dominated by a passion comes to the stage."

The Margalit Dance Theatre Company will begin its residency at Williams Thursday, March 10, with master classes at 3:30 p.m. in Lasell Gymnasium, and a lecture-demonstration at 8:30 p.m. in the Adams Memorial Theatre (AMT).

Open rehearsals of the Company, from noon to 3 p.m. Thursday; 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. Friday, and 1-4 p.m. Saturday, will be held at the AMT.

The program for the two performances 8:30 p.m. Friday and Saturday nights at the AMT will be the same. Opening the program is "Through the Gate of Aden," a solo by Margalit depicting her experiences of family life and growing up in this country on the Red Sea. "Landscape" follows, a company piece in which the dancers metamorphasize into animal-like forms to reveal the basic emotions of a primitive world. "Bessamin—The Beauty Without Shoes" is an eastern version of the Cinderella tale, and is again performed by the whole company. Margalit dances the solo "Birth of a Drum." The program concludes with "In the Beginning," a duet about Adam and Eve.

Tickets may be obtained from the AMT box office. There will be a reception for the company immediately following Saturday's performance at the Faculty Club.

Margalit Oved brings her modern dance troupe, The Margalit Dance Theater Company, to Williams next week for a three day residency. The company will give a master class, open rehearsals, a lecture-demonstration, and two full performances. Tickets and information are available at the AMT box office.

Keller given sample sandwich

Fifteen protest Dodd's new portion controls

by George Schutzer

Fifteen students marched into the office of the Director of Food Services, Monday, to protest the appearance of portion-controlled ham and cheese sandwiches at Dodd House. The students presented the director, Ross Keller, with a sample sandwich from Monday's lunch.

After examining the sandwich and talking with the group of students, Keller apologized for the sandwich, Dan Fox, a spokesman for the group, said.

The Dodd House cook has been under pressure recently to get his budget in line because, according to Keller, the Dodd House kitchen is over budget. Keller had suggested one way Dodd might be able to cut back on expenditures was to instutute portion control. Portion control involves limiting the size of portions put on plates as well as the size of slices of meat and cheese, Keller had said.

Food Services had issued all cooks a list of suggested portion sizes for various foods. According to Dave Levy, the leader of the group which visited Keller, Monday was the first time the Dodd cook had attempted to follow the guidelines.

The guidelines called for ¾ oz. of ham, ¾ oz. of cheese, ½ oz. lettuce and two three-sixteenths inch slices of tomatoes for a ham and cheese sandwich.

When the group brought the sample sandwich to Keller, the director volunteered to weigh the ingredients. According to Levy and Fox, Keller found the ham weighed between .5 and .6 ounces, about one-third less than it should have. Keller initially claimed that was why the sandwich was substandard, Fox said.

But Levy told Keller it is not a question of being 50 per cent over or under, "There should be five times as much ham in there."

Row House unit manager, Roy Clark, claimed there was a misprint in the guidelines. A ham sandwich should include 1¾ oz. of ham, he said.

According to Fox, Keller told the group that he would like to allow them to put more meat in their sandwiches, but there are budget constraints.

According to Fox, Keller had earlier offered to go to Dodd House to discuss the budget problem. But the house president, Al Gentry, declined the offer because, according to Fox, Gentry was not sure if Keller would be well-received.

Reflections: Table Talk

by Rajendra Singh Khadka

Dinner time. Couple of us seated around a table. Strangers. Seen each other wandering about the campus accidently. Bad food today. Conversation? Hesitant smiles, averted faces and surreptious glances. Silence very uncomfortable. We must talk, intelligent discourses, of course.

Name, how do you call yourself, or rather how do others call you? No nick name, huh? But all American kids, good ones though, have cute nick names. You come from Ohio? California, myself. Nebraska. Far out. Never been there myself. Oh, I have. Cool.

Why Williams? I mean, you are from Nebraska. Good school. Small, rural, excellent academic standing, safe (ha, ha), and coed too! (more ha, ha, ha). We are on that getting-to-know-you trip.

So what are your courses? Haven't decided. I am only a freshman. Embarrassed laughter. Not to worry. It is not a sin to be a frosh. We all were once. I'm a Senior. Momentary silence, looking grave and responsible. Munching contemplatively. No, I'm only a sophomore. No, haven't decided my major yet. No, man, can't tell you where to stay next year. Depends what kind of a dude you are.

Well, being a Senior, I have tried different housing situations. Personally, I would recommend row houses. Private, quiet, an atmosphere of homeliness, solidarity and belonging. And atmosphere of quiet intensity and dedication. Must be marvelous to be a Senior and speak like an oracle. Flawless description.

I am actually deciding upon Mission Park. I really don't like to be part of something specific. Limits me and gives me a label, you know. It stems from my philosophy of not being dedicated. I am not even a socialist. I haven't read Marx. I don't believe in the Bible either. So Mission Park. Concrete, bland, impersonal, impervious and anonymous. Hope I get in.

Goddamn cheeky frosh! Dared to refute a Senior. No respect. Dignified silence from the Senior.

Silence. It prolongs and mingles with the deliberate slurps of soups and clanks of cutlery. Becomes an atmosphere in itself. Nothing more to say? Not possible. People sit with each other every day every meal. Surely, if they have relevant things to say to each other every day, we must too. We don't even know each other.

Would anybody like anything? Milk, whole please. Coffee, black, one sugar. Tea, cream and four singers. Ice cream? Cold water, with ice, thanks. Can you manage all that? Take my tray.

Are you going to a grad school after this? Travel? Work? What you doing? Irritated frown.

No, tired of school. No money to travel, no work either. Bad jam. Live with parents, I guess ... Do me a favour. Don't ask me what the hell I am gonna do after school cause I don't know. Drives me nuts. Silence, of sympathy.

Times have changed. Times were when a Williams liberal education meant a good life. Well ...

I will work for a while, work on my Senior thesis. Shadowy smile. Then, go down to the Apple and see my girl. Goes to NYU. Pre-med. I just love pre-meds. I think they have to sacrifice so much, like sunshine in Spring ... Shut up.

Summer? Jesus! You don't wanna talk about summer. Hell, the snow refuses to melt. Windy, cold, angry. Trees are black, naked and obscene. Gray, opaque, slush days. Turns you off, man. How in the hell is one supposed to study?

But I saw a woman in shorts yesterday. Means nothing, or else a hallucination. You must smoke a lot of dope. Bad for the brains.

So how do you like Williams? I thought you already asked that. See? Effects of narcotics. Can't even remember. Glad you came? Yeah, good.

Gotta get going, guys. One o'clock class. Physics lab.

Tell me, how many brothers and sisters do you have?

Must move, gentlemen. Pleasure meeting you all.

You bet. Forget it. All brothers. Any sisters yourself? All married. Oh! Don't you think the English prof., the new one, is excellent?

He is lousy, and what is more, he is not new either.

So long people. See you around. Yeah, bye. Don't work too hard. Would anyone like anything? Tea, please. Bad for health. Too much caffeine. You'll end up dead of caffeine. What do you think of death? Are you trying to be heavy again? I don't think of it. I gave up thinking a long time ago.

Take it slow, but take it!

Will you please dump my cup? Thank you. Bye. Empty table.

Fund waiver

To the editor:

It was interesting to note in your last issue, Dean Roosenraad's response to Gladden House's secession from the College Council and the absence of any substantive response from an elected council spokesperson. According to your article, Dean Roosenraad stated that Gladden House will apparently suffer a waiver of CC funds because of its secession. We are amazed that this statement comes from the Dean's Office and not the "student-run" College Council itself. It was our understanding that the major function of the council is the "student-run" allocation of funds.

Since Dean Roosenraad rather than the student representatives has spoken out on this matter, we urge that he be appointed the next College Council President and that we thereby dispense with the elections. It's too bad that it's too late for him to use it on his grad school application.

Vote No for CC President

by David Forrester

Somehow this semester has brought a change to Williams College. What had been for two years at best a dying spark has had some fresh air blown into it, rekindling a flame of sorts. Let's not let this flame die again.

The rebirth I speak of is one of consciousness. We are, unhappily so, the post-awareness generation. The involvement and activity that highlighted the college years of our older brothers and sisters retreated into grade awareness, job hunting and general apathy.

Who am I to condemn? Where was my involvement? It probably was the same place as many other students': lost in a sense of hopelessness.

Then all of a sudden something happened, nothing earthshaking: but a tremor, foretelling more to come; almost half the people who voted on a proposed College Council Constitution voted NO!. People by and large may not have known what the proposed constitution said, but they realized that there was a chance to say, "No, we are not happy with the present situation!" to the powers that are (or, in the case of the College Council, the powers that are not but should be).

Some people might say it was an unimportant event because less than 25 per cent of the students voted. However, the larger part of the student body expressed its opinion by not voting. Most importantly, a new opinion was finally expressed, an opinion against the status quo. This event was soon followed by a house secession from the College Council in protest over the council's impotence. These two events taken together signaled a growing awareness on this campus of the powerlessness of the students.

A third major development occurred earlier this week when a group of students originated a petition drive aimed at creating real student input on this campus. This drive, enunciated in the Record on Tuesday, seeks to prove that students do care and through caring can accomplish something.

The timing of this movement is in some ways good, and in some ways bad. It could be bad if we let it become just another College Council campaign issue and fail to address the real issues involved. If the administration and faculty see 70-80 per cent of the campus voting for any of the candidates for College Council President, they will accept this as a statement of support for the level of power (?) the students now have. However, if a sizeable number of students make the effort to vote and write No! on the ballot, then we will have a further statement of the dissatisfaction of students with the child-like role now given the council by the administration.

It is obvious that there is concern on this campus about student input, but at the moment there is a great deal of confusion about what constitutes a solution to the problem. Each of the eight candidates for CC President has ideas on how to solve the problem ranging from "strong leadership" to "revolutionize" to abolition of the College Council. Some of these ideas are steps in the right direction but they represent a misconception of the problem. Williams College has a set power structure—Trustees, Administration, Faculty, and Committees—the problem is that students are not a part of this power structure. By trying to create or rebuild an organization that is merely an indirect contributor to this structure we lose the fight before we begin. We must, as the petition mentioned earlier asserts, demand representation in the actual power structure that exists.

The question is not which candidate's ideas are best, but really if any of their ideas are sufficient. We must use the efforts of a vocal and caring student body population to levy pressure against the power structure and, if we get that vocal participation we can count on the media to make it known outside of this campus.

A No! vote for College Council President represents a claim to and a desire for more student power on this campus. A vote for any candidate will merely perpetuate the "out in the cold" kind of student representation we now have.

B-ballers torpedo Merchant Marines, 90-72

by Andy O'Donnell

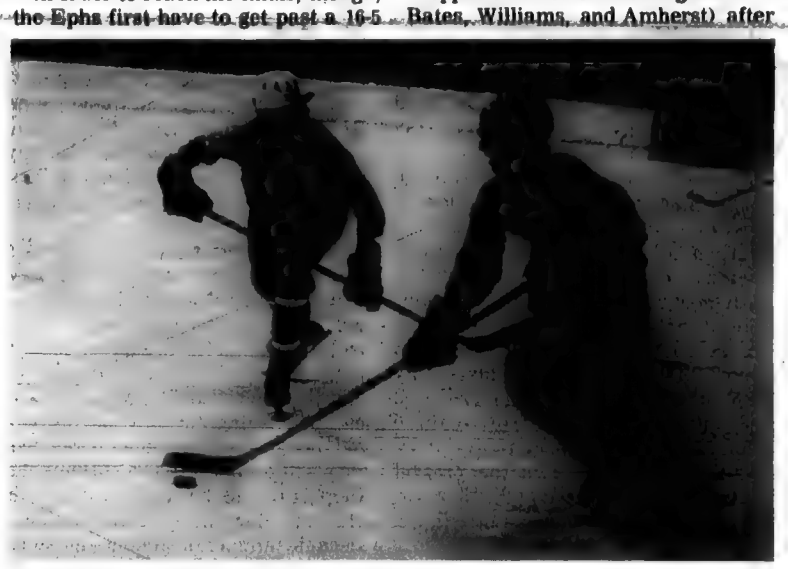
Now that the cozy confines of Lasell have issued a parting farewell to seniors Hester, Tanner, and Lockhart with a 90-72 cakewalk over the Merchant Marine Academy Tuesday night, it's time to get down to business. Tournament business, that is.

Tonight at 9:00 the varsity basketball team squares off against Little Three rival Wesleyan at Middletown in the opening round of the ECAC Division II-III tournament. Quinnipiac battles Stonehill in the first game.

Wesleyan won the right to host the tournament following Hartford's abdication from the affair Monday afternoon. Stonehill was then added to the field and the seeding reshuffled, with Wesleyan and Quinnipiac moving up a notch and Stonehill slipping into the third slot. Williams remained in the fourth position throughout.

Stonehill and Quinnipiac are both Division II schools while Williams and Wesleyan belong to Division III. Stonehill brings a deceiving 11-10 record into the affair, having played seven Division I schools in addition to compiling a 9-5 record against Division II opponents. Quinnipiac is 16-11 and has a 70-68 win over Stonehill already under its belt.

If comparative records are any indication, Williams should be able to hold its own against either Division II school should it reach Saturday's 8:00 finals. Stonehill lost to Hamilton and beat Merchant Marine by almost identical scores as Williams, while Quinnipiac lost to Hartford by eight and beat Colby by thirty.



In order to reach the finals, though, the Ephs first have to get past a 16-5 Wesleyan club that is still smarting from Tuesday night's 77-59 loss to Amherst. The defeat deprived the Cardinals of sole possession of the league crown and marked the second time this school year that the Little Three has ended in a three way tie.

Despite its glossy record, Wesleyan is struggling at the moment, having dropped three of its last six games (to Bates, Williams, and Amherst) after posting a ten game win streak. Williams lost to the Cardinals 63-55 at Middletown in January but came back to post a 71-64 triumph at Lasell three weeks later.

WCFM will broadcast tonight's game starting at 8:55 and Saturday night's finals at 7:55 if Williams advances that far.

Mike Tanner was the lone bright spot for Williams against Merchant Marine, going over the 20 point mark for the eighth time this season as he connected on 11 of 21 shots for a total of 25 points.

Williams led at the half, 42-30, and coasted throughout the second half in first gear without receiving any argument from the Mariners. Andy Straka followed Tanner into the scoring column with 18 points, while Matt Spangler chipped in with 13.

The off-campus IM team holds the title after defeating Sage-Williams, 6 to 4.

Merrimack overcomes purple pucksters, 5-2

Powerful Division II rival Merrimack tallied the game's first four goals Wednesday night and coasted to a 5-2 over Coach Bill McCormick's Purple skaters in the season finale for Williams. The Ephs and senior goalie Chuch played one of their more gutty games of the year in succumbing to the playoff-bound visitors.

The invading Merrimack squad scored twice in the first period and twice more in the second on Cremens, adding the game's final tally in the third. Williams goals were scored by red-hot junior Peter Gonye and sophomore center Chick Johnson, both in the third period.

Williams closed out its 1976-77 campaign with an overall mark of 9-13, including a disappointing 4-14 in the ECAC's Division II. The youthful Ephs lost seven of their last eight games, including three one-goal decisions. Only a 4-2 win over Amherst broke the skein.

For seniors Patch Mason, Cremens, Jim Hield, Rick Zeller, and Brian Norris, the Merrimack loss closed out their Williams careers, and McCormick can smile upon the return of some 16 lettermen to his roster next year, plus center Dan Sullivan, who missed nearly his entire sophomore season with a knee injury.

As for Merrimack, the tough Division II perennial regular-season kingpin, who have twice in a row lost to Bowdoin in the tourney finals, it's on to the play-offs. They are seeded first in the 1977 tourney.

Merrimack will open the tourney against number eight seed Elmira. Other first parings include second-seeded Army against surprising AIC; third seed Bowdoin hosting Lowell; and fourth Union facing off against Salem State in the first round's toughest matchup.

On the season, Williams faced six of the tourney's eight teams, and dropped close contests to two (AIC & Lowell).

White, Kolb pace Ephmen at New Englands; Road Runners ready for Connecticut Marathon

by Frank Carr

The purple trackmen wrapped up the indoor season last Saturday with the New England Championships held at the University of Connecticut. Junior Ron White paced the four-man Eph contingent with an excellent fourth place effort in the 60 yard high hurdles.

White placed first in the three trial heats at a consistent 7.5 second clocking. White felt he had a solid chance for second place in the finals, but banged the fourth hurdle and was picked for 4th place out of a tightly bunched pack. Coach Dick Farley was pleased with White's season performance as the junior hurdler won four individual races, placed second at the Easterns and also anchored the mile relay quartet.

Joe Kolb also made the trip down to UConn and recorded another excellent time in the two mile run. Kolb's 9:11.0 brought him to fifth place in the unseeded heat, just one second off his best time and ten seconds above the college record held by Jay Haug '73. Rich Remmer (shot put) and Larry Tanner (35 lb. weight throw) rounded out the squad but did not place in their respective events.

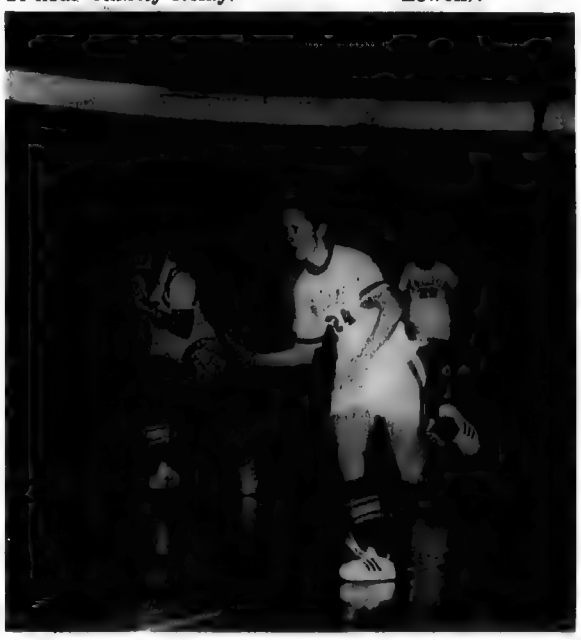
The inter-collegiate season is now over for the trackmen, but by no means have the runners stopped training. This Sunday about a half-dozen members of the Williams Road Runners Club will compete in the Connecticut A.A.U. Marathon Championships. Last year, the WRRC placed third in the team competition as Tim Pritchard led the three-man team with a ninth place finish in 2 hours 39 minutes. Kolb was the individual winner in the 1976 race at 2:28:56, but ran under the banner of the North Medford Club. By next week these marathoners will be looking for another long-distance challenge and should find a more than adequate one next Saturday in the Sixth Annual 24 hour Charity Relay.

Injury sets back ski team

Competing in its final WEISA Carnival of the season, the women's ski team finished with a disappointing seventh place. The Ephs had hoped to do better at the Middlebury carnival, but top alpine skier Martha Epstein was injured in the slalom race, causing the team to forfeit the points earned by Epstein's usual top five finish.

The cross country contingent of the team looked strong at Middlebury as Ann Waters and Rachel Potter finished 13th and 14th in their race. Ellen Toll, grabbing 18th, was followed by Gina Campoli in 24th, to lead the Ephs to a fourth place finish in the cross country event, ahead of rival UVM.

Leading Williams in the alpine races, Corrie Johnson finished 17th in the giant slalom and 19th in the slalom. Ashley Smith and Karen Ham followed Johnson, with 22nd and 24th place finishes.



Hoping to rebound for a strong finish this weekend at the EAIAW Regional and WEISA Championship meets, the Williams squad will join New England top twelve teams in Henniker, New Hampshire. A strong finish by the Ephs will qualify individual skiers for the Nationals in Stowe, Vermont March 12-13.

purple splashers

As a result of a disputed disqualification in the 800 yd. relay last night, the men's swimming team holds a dismal 7th place with 23 points after Thursday's events at the NE Championships.

The 880 yd. relay team was in 3rd place when the third man for UMaine went to the block early. Ephman Phil Wild left the block along with the favored team, two laps too soon, although Wild was not stopped by judges. Meet officials will review the disqualification today, possibly improving the team's poor standing.

In other events, Stuart Deans swam to a 4th place in the 1650 free with a time of 17.8.818. Frosh Todd Piper grabbed fifth in the 400 yd. ind. medley, while teammate Peter Howd came in 5 seconds later for an 11th place.

Organizers of the Massachusetts Basketball tourney this weekend at Brandeis seeded Williams second in Division III competition, even, though the Ephs should compete in the tougher Division II play. Tournament directors failed to see their mistake until it was too late to change the ladder. Here in a happier finish to the season is Monica Grady, pacing the Ephs to a 67-26 victory over MIT.

Critical issues surround election

by Nancy Richman

According to College Council By-Laws Committee Chairman Stu Ginsberg, there is nothing in the Constitution that prescribes a definitive course of action to be taken if the council fails to validate the election on Wednesday night.

The council decided last Wednesday not to validate the election unless at least two-thirds of the student body voted. This action was taken in response to "what the council perceived to be the furor concerning its role on campus," explained Bill Dahling, who proposed the measure. "I felt that it was important that the validation of this election not be left entirely to the opinion of the council," he said. In the past, no specific percentage has been required.

In addition, as Dean of the College Peter Berek noted, not having a validated Honor and Discipline Committee and Committee on Educational Policy for next year would create serious problems, since both are vital to the functioning of the College.

According to College Council Vice-President Randy Sturges, "We will get the amount of votes that we need." He explained that there is every indication that "Gladden House will be getting out the vote and Perry House too." Also, he noted that "the channeling of the dissent vote into a 'NO' vote expressed on the ballot," will increase the total numbers of students voting. Sturges further observed that there are many more freshmen running for positions this year and that this may translate into an increased percentage of the freshman class voting.

A validated election this year might also create other problems. The question about what would happen if one of the candidates elected was in favor of abolishing the council while the other supported its existence, is an important one. Mike Wolfson noted, for example, that if he were elected along with a council supporter, he would be able to prevent his vice-president from calling meetings. He explained that the Constitution only permits the vice-presidents to preside in the president's absence and pledged that if he were elected, he would attend meetings but would refuse to call them to order.

Roosenraad dispels frosh housing rumors

by Randy Wang

Rejecting persistent rumors, Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad maintained that the freshman inclusion process is random. Any "flukes" result from the small numbers of actual inclusion groups involved, he insisted, adding that no one has advantage.

Roosenraad explained that the only information printed on a student's computer card is his ID number, name and sex, his list of choices, the lowest ID number in his group, the size of his group, and the number of males in his group. Each house also has a card which contains its name, assigned number and housing category, the number of men and women needed, and a "fudge limit," which allows final house totals to be adjusted slightly when necessary.

Each group is assigned a random number between zero and one. The computer selects the group with the lowest random number and gives it its first choice. The computer then proceeds to the next lowest numbers, giving as many first choices as possible and setting aside any groups which cannot be placed. After completing this first cycle, another round is made and if possible, the remaining groups get placed in their second choices. Failing this, a third cycle occurs.

This method, labelled First Choice Maximization, has been successfully used for the last several years, said Roosenraad.

Last year, 82 per cent of the Class of '79 received their first choices, and 15 per cent received their second choices. Thus, statements such as, "Everyone in my dorm got their first choice" are believable, according to Roosenraad. There are only about 150 inclusion groups, and about 115 will get their first choices. Since small numbers are being considered, statistical summaries become misleading, he added.

CEP in review: Part II

by Chip Buckner

The concept of "the major:" what it constitutes, and who should define it, has been of significant interest to the Committee on Educational Policy over the past five years. The problem is essentially one of a uniform college standard versus the need for departmental autonomy.

Five years ago the CEP advised that the nine course rule be modified to allow two parallel courses to count as a departmental course. This would create a "limited major—with emphasis," six courses within a student's major and six more in related fields.

Changes and goals

The next mention of majors comes at the end of 1973, when the committee happily noted the decrease in single route sequential majors, and attributed it to changing faculty and student needs.

The CEP also viewed the rise in interdepartmental offerings as an important factor in organizing new areas of thought.

The next April, the committee offered several significant changes for the major. They expressed the goal of a senior year culminating in an understanding of departmental cohesion and methodology. To this end they proposed that each department prepare a guide of its courses, showing interrelations and offering counselling to majors and prospective majors; and that each major department require a senior seminar. This course would be more comprehensive than the then required senior exercise because "students know more and have thought more, about their field than can possibly be demonstrated in a brief major examination exercise." The CEP then recommended the exercise be discontinued as a college-wide requirement.

The Major exercise

According to the December 1973 CEP report, the senior major examination has been subject of "widespread dissatisfaction even predating the 4-W-4" calender initiated in 1967. Each department

Environmental committee discusses heat monitoring

The College is examining the possibility of monitoring heat use as part of an energy conservation program, according to Provost Neil R. Grabois.

A group of four representatives from the Committee on the Campus Environment met with Grabois February 24 to discuss a campus-wide system for monitoring steam heat distribution.

According to Assistant Professor of Physics John W. Shelton, the suggestion was a result of independent research done last year on potential campus energy conservation measures by other committee members, seniors Reed Zars and Byron Kelly, last year.

At present the lack of such a monitoring system makes it impossible for the College to determine how much heat is being used where at a given time. Such information is essential to an incentive-based heat reduction campaign such as the committee discussed at its meeting February 14, as well as necessary to any sort of heat regulatory program.

Study in mythology: The Pre-Med

by Peter Rintels

As Gregor Samsa awoke one morning from unsettling dreams, he found himself in his bed turned into a hopeless pre-med.

This line has yet to find its way into any of the world's great literature, but one suspects that if Franz Kafka were a contemporary college student at one of the more notorious pre-med universities, it might well have. Pre-med life approaches the status of a modern day myth, typified by endless study, backstabbing competition, and in general a manic pursuit of a high GPA. The myth has been tapped by Gary Trudeau to produce some of Doonesbury's finer moments.

The Pre-med Myth

Judging from interviews with several randomly chosen senior pre-medical students, it appears that at Williams the myth remains a myth and nothing more. Pre-meds acknowledge in general that there is pressure and competition at Williams, but say it is "generated from within" and never takes on the antagonistic character that often appears at other schools.

In an average freshman class, roughtly 20 per cent will indicate interest in medicine. About 12 to 13 per cent of these will actually go on to apply to medical school. The weeding out is usually a natural result of students changing their career plans, or discovering that they do not have the science aptitude to become doctors. Chairman of the Premedical Committee, William Grant, justified this weeding out process: "Sometimes people wonder why persons with strong social motives don't make as good doctors as persons with strong science backgrounds. This is because medicine is definitely a graduate science."

Moreover, for students interested in medicine, medical school is not the only route possible. A number of students indicated that if they were rejected by medical schools, they would seek para-medical training, or possibly go on to biology graduate school and explore research opportunities.

All medical schools presently require two semesters each of biology, physics and English and four semesters of chemistry. Some schools require additional courses in biology and chemistry and more recently in psychology. Choice of a major is not important, but roughly half of its Williams pre-meds major in Division III, reflecting an interest in science concomitant with an interest in medicine.

It is often claimed that students will increase their chances of acceptance in medical school by majoring outside of the sciences, as a way of showing their broader interest. Grant dismissed this notion noting that nationwide figures from 1973-4 indicate chemistry, biochemistry, and physics majors fared better or as well as humanities and social science majors. What counts for medical schools is not the choice of major, but performance in the science courses they require.

Students seek tenure input

The Student Standing Committee on Tenure will distribute a questionnaire to students this spring to provide meaningful student input into tenure decisions.

Committee chairman Hervey McIver explained that the committee "wanted to give everyone a chance to say something about all the faculty members currently being considered for tenure." He said that the problem with the current procedure for soliciting student input is that it is not a uniform one.

Student input now enters into the deliberations of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions as a part of departmental evaluations. Student opinion is usually measured numerically by the student course evaluations surveys completed by students at the end of each semester. In contrast, the committee's questionnaire is designed specifically to be used for tenure decisions and it will also provide the CAP with a more substantive analysis than the numerical evaluations.

The committee intends to ask three categories of questions. McIver said that the questionnaire will ask students primarily to evaluate the faculty member's teaching ability and style of presentation. It will also try to judge how interested the professor is in the individual student's progress. Students will also be asked to evaluate the teacher's command of his material although McIver noted that any judgement by students of faculty proficiency in scholarship is at best, inadequate.

McIver explained that the committee intends to present a summary of all their data to the CAP. He said that he hoped that the questionnaire would be repeated each year. After a couple of years, McIver speculated, the information provided by each set would become more valuable.

The committee intends to distribute this year's questionnaire to all upperclassmen. Students will receive a number of forms and will comment on any non-tenured professors they feel they can write about constructively. McIver said that he expects that the questionnaire will be ready soon after March break.

They Write by Night

A Little Chat

I am a bit tired of writing these long, laborious columns, and frankly, have had one decent idea for a column in two weeks. So here are a few indecent ideas which never really developed.

I have been totally persuaded by the campaign posters for Larry Mitchell, and indeed, I did not vote for him. Isn't advertising a wonderful thing? That poster was the cause of great embarrassment to me in the snack bar the other day. I loudly announced that I hadn't seen one of them that hadn't been defaced. On being corrected and enlightened, I could only wonder "Why?" One friend is convinced that the students weren't supposed to realize that the graffiti was intentional, and then vote for Mitchell out of sympathy for having all of his expensive posters ruined. Other people have suggested that he was covering an unfortunate blemish or a remarkably smug expression.

My other favorite political issue: Gladden House secedes from the College Council. There was great commotion in the Greylock dining hall the night The Record announced the secession. Cheers went up in the Mark Hopkins dining room. Bryant raised their glasses in celebration. Carter was out of its mind! It was all a huge misunderstanding, though. Everyone thought that Gladden was seceding from the campus altogether. The whole building, occupants and all, uprooting itself and hitchhiking up towards Bennington. Or down towards Queechy Lake. Perhaps the Center could move into Gladden's swampy old place—they've been looking for an opportunity to get on campus for years.

(You see, Gladden is the black sheep of the Greylock quad. No one likes it. This whole secession thing is an attempt to establish some sort of reputation. They achieved minor notoriety a couple of years ago when a janitor walked in on three people in the same bed, but they never followed through on that bold start. The campus grapevine informs me that Wood House—strangely enough—has taken the lead in the threesome scene. God in three persons? Any information should be referred to box 3001. That Gladden incident, by the way, was being investigated by reporters from Pique ("Peas in a Pod: the Gladden Threesome Scandal!") but the issue was squelched by pressure from the peer-counseling group.)

Let's say you are in bed with two other people. We'll make it really bad—two people of your own sex, but different races. Both of them townies. Got the scene in mind? Now answer me this: who would be the worst person to have walk in on you?

1. Mom
2. your janitor ("Got any trash? . . . oh!")
3. your matron (rmmm rmmm rmmm)
4. anyone on the Pique staff

The variations on this joke are endless. What if you were in bed with your janitor and your matron (rmm rmmmm) and two townies walked in? That one makes me shudder! Or—God forbid—you were bedded down with two members of the Pique staff . . .

I suggested a campaign idea to another of the candidates last week. I thought he could ingratiate himself with the majority of the campus by boldly announcing that he wanted no votes from the Fitch-Prospect quad. Someone I know stumbled into that quad recently, and came back with some startling reports. It seems that they have their own civilization up there. New forms of communication. They eat with their hands. No one ages if he remains within the boundaries of the quad. Supposedly inbreeding has ravaged their genes; many people have eight fingers on each hand! If you ever need a paper typed really fast, you know where to go! Further investigation is desperately needed. Will you help? Contact box 3001.

A CURIOUS SCENE: 4 March, 12:34 PM I am at lunch contemplating my Ross-Keller-Memorial-Sausage-Grinder. Three half-links of meat, two yards of bun, and a veritable blood bath of sauce. Suddenly a smiling female face is looking up at me—from within the grinder itself! Sausage with a smile? The girl across the table has flicked her ID onto my plate, and it has imbedded itself in the sauce and bun. The sauce covers everything but the face. Is this poetry? The girl claimed that it was an accident, but I am not convinced. Do things like this happen to people who don't write humor columns? Everyone wants to make the newspaper. Even The Record.

What am I doing next year? No, I am not going to Humor School. I did badly on the Humor Boards. Question 56: fill in the blank: "Take my wife. —————." Flunked the pun section. And besides, this joke called "school" has gone on for too long. So maybe I'll manage the Log. "They Serve By Night." Or perhaps coach crew. Are they still rowing down at the Cole pond? How cramped! Hey, has anyone been sending these articles to The New Yorker? Do influential and prosperous alumni read The Record? If so, resumes and references are available on request. I don't do windows, but I type real well. I should with sixteen fingers and all.

House Transfer Procedure

HOUSE TRANSFER PROCEDURE - 1977

The Application

1—Students may apply to transfer their house affiliation singly or in groups of up to four.

2—Applicants must rank all five inclusion categories, the Berkshire Quad, Dodd-Tyler, Greylock, Mission Park and Row Houses, in order of their preference. As in freshman inclusion, students may not request to be transferred to a specific house.

3—All applicants are guaranteed a house transfer although not necessarily to a house in their first choice category.

4—All transfers are final. Students may not choose to remain in their original house if dissatisfied with the outcome of the transfer re-inclusion.

5—Groups applicants will have the option of remaining in one of their original houses if they are randomly replaced in it.

The Computer Program

1—The re-inclusion process will be set into motion by pulling the applicants from their original houses to create spaces for transferring.

2—Applications will then be processed according to the program used for freshman inclusion which fills openings on the basis of the applicants' indicated category preferences.

Applications for house transfer are now available in the Buildings and Grounds building opposite Weston Field. The application deadline for transfers is March 18. For further information contact Jamie Barickman [6794] or Sally Coney [2921].

Letters: Coaches, Keller, Redford

Evaluations

To the editor:

Two years ago in the Record Josh Raymond ('75½) proposed the possibility of more student input for the evaluation of coaches at Williams. Reviving this idea might well be worth the effort. In the same way that student evaluations are completed at the end of each semester, might not evaluations also follow an athletic season?

Obviously, personal contact between students and teachers differs from that between players and coaches, but a carefully and objectively designed questionnaire might provide useful information concerning the effectiveness of a particular coach. One might, on the basis of such a poll, find that there is a consistent feeling among players about a coach and his performance.

As it stands now, there is no student input for decisions on coaches, and many people feel that the athletic department suffers as a result.

Chris Vogelsang

Bad meals

To the editor:

Re; "Keller reacts to complaints about Food Services," Record March 1, 1977.

In this article, Mr. Keller admitted that in February, there were three days of bad food in a row. He attributed this error to chance. Does this mean that Mr. Keller does in fact schedule bad meals but tries to space them out? The chance error was thus the poor scheduling of unpalatable food. If this is true, I must admit that he was correct when he said that he eliminated menu predictability. No one could have predicted that the Food Services Director would deliberately schedule bad meals!

Daniel Fox '77

Tradition

To the editor:

I had always thought that my taste and sensibilities were a bit incongorous with those which I felt were generally characteristic of Williams College but I am now hopeful and greatly encouraged by the selection of Robert Redford as a future recipient of an honorary degree. I congratulate the College on their open-mindedness and ability to break from traditional habits of preference for obscure "academic grinds."

Given this indication of an approaching favorable atmosphere for individuals having somewhat of a massive appeal, I would like to suggest the idea of bringing a topflight artist into the Artist-in-Residence program. One such possibility is a commercial pilot by the name of Maxwell Flange.

Experiential retreat

The Center for Environmental Studies, in conjunction with the college Chapel Board, will sponsor a two-day retreat in Hawley State Forest April 16 and 17. The trip will be modeled to some extent after a retreat sponsored by the same groups in 1975, which utilized the facilities of the nearby Carmelite Fathers Monastery. The previous retreat was part of a week-long series of lectures and seminars which followed the theme of "spirit and environment."

This year the week of lectures has been abandoned, but the overnight experience itself, which generated a great deal of student enthusiasm, is being retained and expanded. The theme for the weekend will again follow the general lines of spirit and environment, though the specific focus is still undecided. One possibility is the idea of food and various aspects of man's interactions with his food sources. Another possibility is the general theme of wholeness and holism, again stressing patterns and feelings of interconnection between ourselves and the environment.

Hawley State Forest is located on the Berkshire Plateau, to the east and over the Mohawk Trail from Williamstown. The facility there is a large one, with bunk space and cooking facilities for at least seventy. In addition there is a large community room which will be the main center for group activities. Individuals will have a wide choice of activities. There will be a variety of discussions, poetry readings, and "group exercises," including meditation, yoga, and perhaps even foot massage. Outdoor activities will include some simple field ecology in exploring the surrounding forest. There will also be Taoist walking and group work such as splitting wood and making bread.

The two groups sponsoring the retreat intend to conduct the whole weekend on an experiential level, with a minimum of lecturing and intellectualizing. The "community experience" of the group will be the focus of exploration, and the weekend itself should be in marked contrast with the daily Williams education.

The entire college community is welcomed and urged to participate, as a diversity of viewpoints is sure to add to the total experience. Reservations must be made with Pat Wilson at the Center for Environmental Studies by Wednesday, March 16. A one dollar donation is requested to help cover the costs of food and wine. In case the trip is over-subscribed, a random drawing will probably be conducted over spring break.

Over 100 apply for off-campus

One hundred twenty-two juniors have applied to live off-campus next year. About ninety people will be randomly selected for these positions. In addition to next year's seniors, about 30 members of the classes of '79 and '80 have applied.

Freshmen favor Dodd-Tyler, Greylock

Freshmen applied to upperclass housing groups in 170 different groups, though shortly before deadline 40 individuals had yet to register. The preliminary figures show Dodd-Tyler and Greylock to be about even among first choices, with the row house category right behind them.

Application deadline for exchanges to Howard and California Institute of Technology is April 8. Students may see Dean McIntyre for information and forms.

Exotic winter study: Zen and physical movement

by Eric Sundin

Reverend John Eusden, the College Chaplain and Prof. of Christian Theology, and I had a talk about Zen seated on tatami while drinking herbal tea.

You have all come across the word "Zen" at one time or another. Zen is, according to Webster, "a Japanese sect of Mahayana Buddhism that aims at enlightenment by direct or intuition through meditation." You then page to "intuition" to find "the power or faculty of attaining direct knowledge or cognition without evident rational thought or inference." Finally, you flip to "meditation" to discover "the act or process of focusing one's thoughts; a reflection or pondering." Zen, then, achieves enlightenment by direct non-rational cognition by focusing one's thoughts or by pondering.

You are, unfortunately, still confused. An image came to your mind of a robe-clad Buddhist monk sitting in a lotus position on a rice mat in some distant, oriental land. This man is considered a fanatic of an eccentric religion—a vestige of some past cult.

Zen, however, should not stir such unfounded ideas. As Eusden's Winter Study course in Zen has proven, Zen need not be remote from life at Williams. The Zen course, Religion 11, focused primarily on the experimental values of physical movement as applied to Zen. Within that movement one may find a rhythm, and a "goal" may be to utilize one's body to express and appreciate such a rhythm.

Obviously this simplification does not do justice to the complexities of the religion, but nevertheless, Zen's physical nature seems to provide for the metaphysical part. The Zen mind is formed by the actual performance of the "sutras," or discourses on the Buddha, rather than deliberation on a certain doctrine. And although the Buddha is the paradigm, the practices of Zen seem universally enjoyable. Mr. Eusden is the Chaplain yet still enjoys Za Zen, the practice of Zen.

The simplicity of Zen is perhaps what made Eusden's course so valuable. "Not one class was missed," Eusden insisted, "even though the schedule was vigorous and day-consuming."

What exactly are the rewards of ZaZen? Eusden explained that ZaZen makes no claims at changing one's life from good to better or providing enlightenment. Zen is not prescribed for a result, but rather its meaning is found in the experience itself. The action of Zen should be totally independent and spontaneous. Students of Zen were justifiably irritated when I inquired how Zen had affected their lives.

The physical activity associated with Zen takes many forms. During Winter Study, those were cross-country skiing and swimming, both individual and repetitive in nature. There is a desire to become one with the medium (the snow and water) and to find a comfortable pace which will promote movement without the tension of conscious effort. Mr. Eusden, for example, attributed his completion of the 50 mile cross-country ski race, held annually in Sweden, to his application of Zen.

The psychotherapeutic value of Zen is even more significant than its purpose of physical timing during physical activity. If performed correctly, ZaZen should, through purely physical activity, purify ones mental processes and make one only aware of his own being, not other's. It should create a feeling of being seen by the mind's eye from the outside, in an almost trance-like suspension or non-attachment.

Zen stresses the immediacy of the action one is performing and the immediacy of one's existence in the medium in which he performs it—the pool or the snow. There should be "one time, one meeting" and nothing else but the sloshing of the water or the schussing of the snow and the body's cooperation with them. You are what you are at that time and there are no relative comparisons of past or future; Zen is "everyday mind."

Eusden said he believes there are two levels of Zen, an individual and group level. The individual level varies infinitely—everyone is affected differently. But he said that sitting or working as a part of a group is unique. The communal physical exertion during Winter Study seemed to draw the group together through a common wholeness of purpose.

Discipline is indeed a large part of Zen. There is discipline in sitting as well as in the motion of sports activities. I was impressed with the discipline involved when I visited one of the thrice weekly ZaZen meetings at 7 am on the top floor of Hopkins. There is a discipline of one's mind and body in such "sitting," which varies from the lotus meditation position to "kinhin," or walking in single file at various paces. Kinhin appears to loosen muscles and joints for continued sitting, and focuses attention on how one has been walking for 20 odd years. All is done in complete silence.

In sitting, one's "verbally noisy head" should succumb to one's "non-verbal gut" where no thought is encountered. One concentrates on body posture, the different components of breathing and one's inner movement in relation to that breathing.

"Zen is, according to Webster, 'a Japanese sect of Mahayana Buddhism that aims at enlightenment by direct intuition through meditation.'"

Eusden explained, "One should not prevent thoughts from arising, but dispense with them as soon as they do. One should be empty-headed in order to pull the plug and reach ground zero, empty of thoughts, yet full of one's existence at that moment, which will never come again."

An experience such as ZaZen is difficult to verbalize. In sitting, walking or exercising, you are doing something but thinking and saying nothing. Yet you are not asleep. The discipline arranges the day in an easier-to-handle perspective and puts variety into one's impression of oneself.

The myth of the Williams pre-med

has recently become so lucrative, motives for entering the field are frequently called into question, by pre-meds and others. One pre-med interviewed for this article even made a point of saying that money was not a factor in his deciding to enter the field. One hears occasional mention of "job security," but humanitarian motives seem to play the greatest role. Grant said, "The greater majority (of pre-meds) are interested in the health problems of society and want to contribute. In the vast majority of cases, I wouldn't question the motives."

"The myth has been tapped by Gary Trudeau to produce some of Doonesbury's finer moments."

Many pre-meds at Williams come from families of doctors, and others developed an interest while doing summer work in hospitals and other clinical situations. Others chose medicine after coming to Williams and examining their interests and career prospects. All see it as a personally fulfilling career. Said Bob Harryman, '77, "It's a job where you can grow as you work—expand and learn new things. You're constantly seeing new people and relating to them in an interesting way."

When motives are questioned by people here, it is generally for fear of naivete about what being a doctor is really like and not avarice. Bill Feeney, '77, said, "You see a lot of kids without a realistic idea of being a doctor. You see a very romantic view of what's involved in medicine. I think a lot of people don't get enough exposure in hospitals to what's really going on. It's not glamorous, it's a lot of shit work." Moreover, Feeny pointed out, that the grind gets worse when you get to medical school. "Medical school is a very ascetic life; you have to really buckle down."

Pressure: Real of Imagined?

"There's much less pressure here," said Harryman. "I've heard stories of sabotage and backstabbing at Princeton, but it's not that way here. All pre-meds are friends. I don't know of anyone that has any enemies among pre-med students." Students reported hearing similar stories about Dartmouth and Rutgers, among others.

Grant also held this view: "The pre-med atmosphere here is very much better than at some other institutions. Interpersonal competition is low key. Students here want to do their best because it's a competitive situation." Students here see the competition as being against the "system" and not against each other.

Thus, as Grant points out, you almost never see a lack of cooperation with other students among Williams pre-meds. Pre-meds here freely loan notes and discuss homework assignments, Grant said. He suggested that this might be in part because Williams does not have a cut-off point for pre-meds as do some other schools, faced with a staggering 40 to 50 per cent of their freshmen class as declared pre-meds.

To think of getting into medical school to the exclusion of all else is a trap that pre-meds can easily fall into, a fact which is recognized by the Pre-med Advisory Committee and many pre-meds themselves. According to Joann Leone, '77, "You occasionally see people too gung-ho about being pre-med, but you shouldn't bank on it. With some freshmen, it's like putting blinders on a horse." The Pre-med Advisory Committee booklet "guidelines for pre-medical students" warns of this as well: "It is all too easy for a student to become so preoccupied with premedical courses, doing well on exams and completing applications to medical schools that he or she completely loses sight of the larger implications of what he or she is doing ... Medicine is not for everyone, and you can make yourself miserable trying to pretend you want to be a doctor."

Jeff Lockhart, '77, observed that this kind of grinding does not always make for good doctors. "When a person looks at books all the time, what happens when he has to look at a real person?"

For all the mystical aura which has given rise to the pre-med stereotype of the person who endlessly studies nothing but science, people involved with pre-meds claim that almost no one fits this role. Grant in particular criticized sharply the "college wide mystique that pre-meds are nothing but grinds and bookworms. The average pre-med has as broad a liberal arts background as any student in the College." In addition, Leone pointed out that "the pre-med stereotype holds for anyone. The pre-med stereotype is the same as the Williams stereotype."

The Pre-med Committee

Pre-meds interviewed for this article were unanimous in their praise for the pre-med faculty and Premedical Committee for their help and accessibility. Many pre-med courses, such as organic chemistry, are designed to defuse some of the competitive atmosphere by not grading on a curve. Students therefore do not compete against each other for the top grades in the class.

The Premedical Committee, now headed by Grant, Chairman of Biology, in the absence of professor James Skinner, who is on sabbatical, follows the progress of pre-med students from their freshman year on. In the spring of the junior year, the committee synthesizes recommendations provided by the applicant and sends a committee recommendation to medical schools. According to students who have been on the medical school interview circuit, Premedical Committee recommendations are valued by medical schools for their frankness.

Non-pre-meds at Williams, then, need not fear the mythical fate of Kafka's Gregor Samsa; waking up a pre-med would leave most students here little, if any the worse off than they are now. But pre-med life is not totally without elements of the Kafkaesque, since after three years of going through the pre-med labyrinth, there is the final step of applying. With medical schools often swamped with upwards of twenty qualified applicants for each position, a certain amount of caprice is inevitable. Grant said there are occasional "strange cases of students with good records not getting in." Feeny summed up the process: "It all comes down to luck."

had to give an exercise of some sort, but could determine the method "best suited to its discipline."

In April 1975 the faculty voted to incorporate the seminars into the curriculum, and to make the major exam optional.

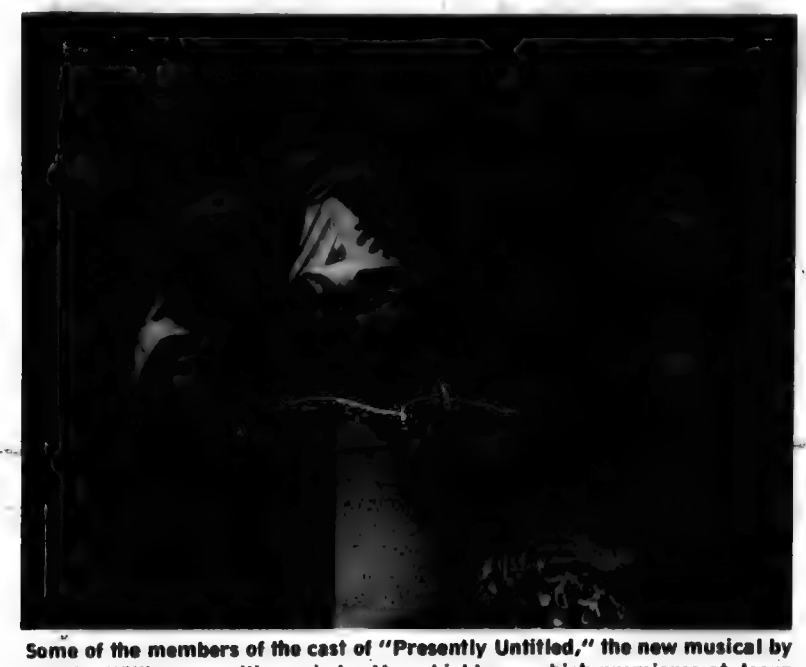
"Options beyond the major"

Some students, the CEP recognized would want to do more than the traditional major. The committee recommended that each department offer at least one of three "options beyond the major." They were: a thesis option, essentially the same as today's honors thesis; a specialization option, either special study in a particular area of the field along with a "substantial" research or creative project; or the course cluster option, designed to allow horizontal as well as vertical specialization in a field, analogous to the 1972 limited major.

The faculty did not vote to accept these proposals.

The committee recommended that a limited number of students who felt their academic goals fell outside of the College's traditional approach should be allowed to contract a major. The proposal, subsequently adopted by the faculty, required the prospective contractor to secure two faculty advisors and to detail the plans for his major.

Williams WSPers share first-hand view of USSR



Members of the Winter Study "Back in the U.S.S.R." met on Monday, February 28, with guests to discuss their experience in the Soviet Union. The twenty-nine Williams participants comprised about one-half of a larger group, the New England Consortium of Colleges, which contained contingents from the Five College area and the University of New Hampshire.

Monday's meeting began with brief presentations by four panelists, who described some of the problems and pleasant surprises which they encountered during January. The difficulty faced by some with no Russian language background was eased by the hospitality and warmth of the Soviet people.

Following a reception there was a slide-show chronicling the three weeks spent in Kiev, Leningrad and Moscow. During this time the participants entertained questions from the guests, who were curious about the Russian religious atmosphere and evidence of political unrest. The presentation ended with the consensus that there is a great problem of perspective when Westerners view Soviet society. The students agreed that they saw an aspect of Soviet life which is different from our press reports, concerned mainly with May Day parades and dissidents.

'Stasis' montage masterful

by Theoharis C. Theoharis

"Stasis in Darkness" a dramatic rendition of poems from Sylvia Plath's Ariel and scenes from her novel The Bell Jar was given last weekend in the Studio Theatre of the Adams Memorial Theatre. It was conceived and directed by Dianne Thompson, and performed by Carol Soybel, Nina Girvetz, Elizabeth Beers, Ann Oberrender, and Ann Eakland. The production was masterful: more ambitions, more original, more intelligent, more skillfully effective than any student directed work here in four years.

The work was a montage—the scene—Plath's mind at the moment of her death, as she reviews her past. To open the show, the five actresses converged from five corners of the experimental theatre, humming eerily all the while, to form a tree with their arms and legs. Crawling through a space at the tree's bottom, Carol Soybel spoke the first line of "Elm", "I know the bottom," she says, "I know it with my great tap root." The poem here is the subject of the drama, not merely recited, but transformed, rendered in a dramatic mode. This transformation of poems into drama was the technique of the production. It did no violence to the sense of the poems, but with penetrating consistency focused very sharply the thematic and stylistic power of Plath's verse.

That eerie hum, the drone of the first scene was a symbol which presented and articulated at once the painful gruesome sounds of childbirth, of sexual intercourse, of a funeral dirge, of insane asylum patients, of Plath's shock therapy, and the mounting tension and immensity of Plath's longing for love and longing for death. The drone peaked and stopped when Carol Soybel thrust herself through the bottom of the elm, just as Plath's agony peaked and stopped when she died, by putting her head in an oven, and breathing in the gas. This accretion of many meanings in one symbol or image is a typical feature of Plath's poetry. The actors, used their own bodies and the bare architecture of the experimental theatre, windows and black cartons, to create over and over dramatic symbols and situations that were at once interpretations and recreations of the symbols and images in Plath's poems. These dramatic symbols were narrative, plotting the progress of Plath's life and career by highlighting and symbolizing the cruelty and grotesque intolerable harassment she suffered at different stages in her life as a Smith Girl, a member of the staff of Mademoiselle, a victim of sadistic and incompetent psychiatrists, and as a scarred survivor of "the atrocity of sunsets" shock treatments. In effect what Dianne Thompson and the five actresses created was a long dramatic poem on Plath. In the second half of the production, which included the shock treatment poem, "Hanging Man," the hard liberation poem "Daddy" and the final apotheosis of suicide "Lady Lazarus" that dramatic poem was as searing, difficult, and prepossessing as the poetry of Plath herself. "Stasis in Darkness" was a palimpsest, gouged with harsh, shrieking lines, radiant and scathing.

Margalit exudes emotional strength

by Julie Bermant

The Margalit Dance Theater Company which integrates drama, mime, rhythm, and music with dance will be in residency at Williams this Thursday through Saturday. Its founder Margalit Oved, now known simply as Margalit, approaches her works from all aspects of creation, from composing and singing music to choreographing, acting and dancing the pieces. She has created her own style developed from her Yemenite heritage and from the rhythms and lifestyles of Arabia, Africa, India, and Spain.

Characteristic of her style is its emotional impact on the audience. As the New York Times has stated, "Margalit has the emotional strength of a giant . . . How versatile this girl is! She can shift easily from the tragic vein to the most engaging of high comedy and to an equally appealing lyric mood. Her voice is a remarkable one for range and color and expressiveness and when she moves her feet seem to be actually caressing the floor."

Born and raised in a Yemenite ghetto in Aden, Saudi Arabia, Margalit began dancing at age twelve with the Inbal Dance Company in Israel and remained there for fifteen years becoming its principal dancer and performing throughout the world with it. Her own recently formed company has won unanimous critical acclaim both in the United States and abroad.

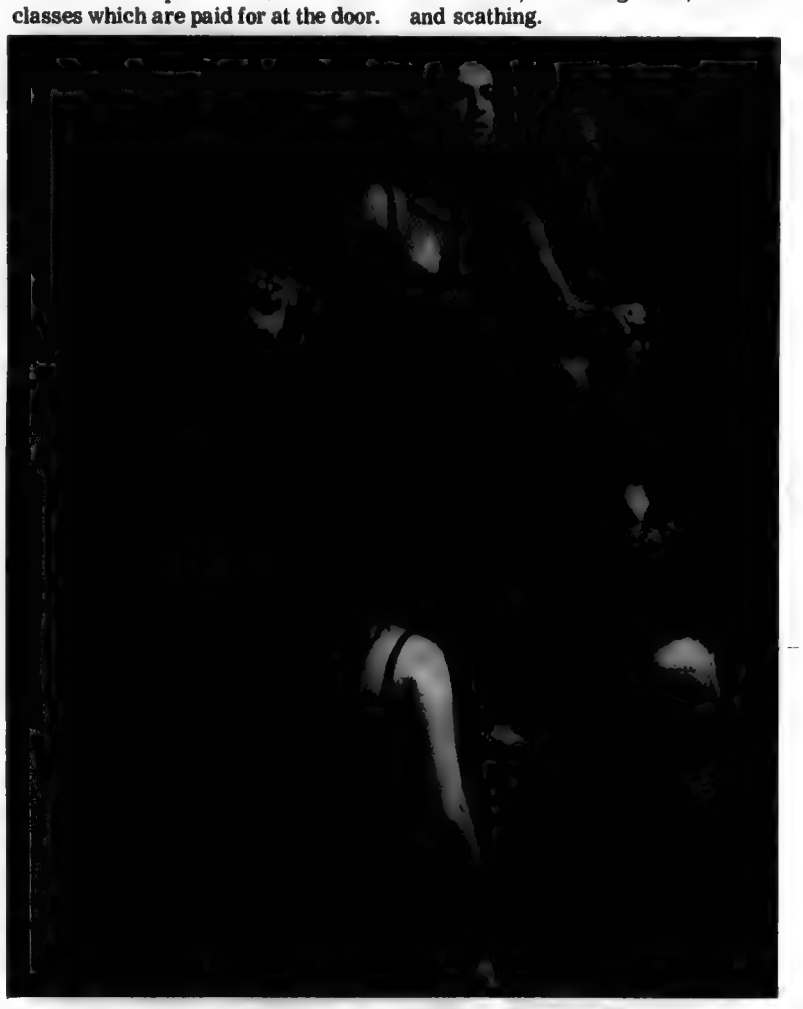
The Friday performance program which will be repeated Saturday, includes these pieces: "Through the Gate of Aden", "Landscape", "Beauty Without Shoes", "The Birth of a Drum", and "In the Beginning."

Anna Kisselgoff of Dance Magazine described Margalit's performance in the autobiographical work "Through the Gate of Aden". "Surrounded by her drums—and gong," Kisselgoff writes,—"she sits in a leotard and red turban and evokes the atmosphere of an entire town and the warmth of her family through descriptive vocalizing and extraordinary facial expressions. Within minutes she is transformed from a flirtatious youth to her devout father, rocking in prayer."

Wilma Salisbury of "The Plain Dealer" said in "Landscape", Margalit "created an eerie atmosphere with her wild animal-like singing-shrieking-chanting and her ferocious pounding on a metal box . . "

The residency begins this Thursday with master classes, an exciting amalgm of dance, theatrical movement and drumming, 3:30 p.m. Lasell Gym ($3.00 *), and a lecture demonstration in which Margalit recalls her sources and how her work has developed, 8:30 p.m., Adams Memorial Theater ($2.50 *). Friday includes an open rehearsal 11:00 a.m. - 3:00 p.m., A.M.T., and Performance I, 8:30 p.m. ($4.50 adults, $3.50 children 12 and under) and Saturday, an open rehearsal 1:00-4:00 p.m., A.M.T., and Performance II. (*Williams students admitted free of charge,  Williams students admitted for $2.00). Tickets available at the A.M.T. box office (413-458-3023) with the exception of the master classes which are paid for at the door.

Chapin shows authors' letters



An important collection of autographed letters from distinguished nineteenth century American and English authors has been presented to the Chapin Library by Mrs. Ellen Geer Sangster of Bennington, Vermont. A special display of these letters has been arranged for exhibition from March 1 to April 22 in the Chapin Library.

The majority of the letters are addressed either to Julia Ward Howe or her husband, Dr. Samuel Gridley Howe, both of whom were well-known reformers and humanitarians. They were then given by Mrs. Howe to her daughter-in-law, Fannie Gay Howe, before 1910, and were later presented to Mrs. Sangster.

Included in the group are letters from Richard Henry Dana, Maria Edgeworth, Ralph Waldo Emerson, William Lloyd Garrison, Henry James, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and John Greenleaf Whittier, among others.

Of particular interest is a long letter from Thomas Carlyle to Dr. Howe, who was the founder of the Perkins Institute for the Blind in Boston, and a penciled note meticulously composed in square letters from Helen Keller to Mrs. Howe—a touching tribute to the famous humanitarian. There is also a long letter to Joseph G. Cogswell of Boston, boldly signed by Goethe, and two letters from abolitionist John Brown. One of these is written from prison to the Rev. Thomas Wenworth Higginson and dated November 4, 1859 (less than one month before Brown was hanged). The other was written from American House, Boston, on March 4, 1858.

Various other items include letters from Edwin Booth, the actor, James Fenimore Cooper and James A. Hamilton, son of President Alexander Hamilton, who enclosed with his letter a lock of his father's hair. There is a brief note from John Quincy Adams to his son, Charles F. Adams, and a document attributed to Frederick William III, King of Prussia, and dated 10 November 1816.

Violinist Fargo to solo in third Berkshire concert

The Berkshire Symphony, conducted by Julius Hegyi, will give the third concert of its current season this Friday, at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall. Soloist will be Ernesto Fargo.

On the program are Benjamin Lees' Passacaglia for Orchestra, Franz Berwald's Symphony in C Major ("Singuliere"); and Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto.

Franz Berwald was a Swedish composer who lived from 1796 to 1868. Although not appreciated during his lifetime, his words enjoyed a revival and deservedly high recognition in the twentieth century. Unsuccessful in earning his living as a musician, he turned to several business ventures which gave him enough wealth to continue composing. He was the first Swedish symphonist and the greatest Swedish composer of the nineteenth century. His Symphony "Singuliere," composed in 1845, is in three movements, with the scherzo an episode in the slow movement.

Benjamin Lees wrote his Passacaglia for Orchestra in 1975. Although he was born in China, in 1924, he grew up in the United States and studied at the University of Southern California, winning countless fellowships and awards along the way. His compositions are for nearly all the common musical groups—sonata for two pianos, choral work, orchestral work, string quarter, piano concerto, one-act opera, and the like. His orchestral works have been performed by nearly all the major symphonies in North America.

Monetary incentives, possibly involving rebates to students in houses conserving energy, such as the committee discussed have been "discussed briefly," said Grabois. He claimed it was "wiser to determine how effectively energy consumption can be monitored" first before dealing with incentives. He described monetary incentives as "not easy to do in the first place and not wise to do in the second place." He said he preferred to depend upon "educating the community in the need for conservation." However, monetary incentives "have not been thoroughly explored," added Grabois, and refused to rule them out.

According to Grabois, the committee, represented by William T. Fox, Edward Brust Professor of Geology and Mineralogy, Assistant Professor of Geology John L. Dohrenwend, Shelton, and Zars recommended that the College devise its own monitoring equipment. Shelton noted that commercial equipment is extremely costly and does not perform the functions the College's heating system would require.

Grabois, acting upon the committee's recommendations will research the feasibility of devising a monitoring system in the Building and Grounds or science departments' shops. The project, according to Grabois, would be a "very modest business" and cost from $100-200. The result would ideally be a system by which the distribution of steam heat could be monitored in a manner similar to that by which electric meters keep track of electrical consumption.

snuck inside for an easy hoop on the ensuing inbounds play to give the Cardinals a 39-36 lead with 1:47 remaining. All Williams could do was foul and hope for the best, but the Cardinals calmly hit 13 of 14 foul shots during the final 1:36 to seal their seventeenth victory against just five defeats.

The loss was especially frustrating in view of the fact that Williams had succeeded in maintaining precarious lead since late in the first half when Gerry Kelly had rallied the Ephs from a seven point deficit into a slim but satisfying 21-18 halftime lead.

The Ephs hung on gamely in the second half, using some superb inside play by Brad Wolk (10 points, 11 rebounds, five for six from the floor) to ease into a 27-22 lead and then watching Wesleyan close the gap to one on four occasions before two free throws by Phillips finally tied things at 34 with 5:31 left.

The pressure began to build twenty seconds later as Phillips stole the ball with 5:10 left and Wesleyan coach Herb Kenny decided to play cat and mouse with the Ephs. Going into the four corners offense with the knowledge that both clubs were in the bonus situation, Wesleyan ran the clock down to 0:28 and called time out.

The Cardinals then waited until just five seconds were left in the game before going to Malinowski, who threw up an eighteen foot jumper from the left side with two seconds remaining. The shot was good but Malinowski was called for travelling and time ran out before Williams could get off a last second shot.

Kelly matched Wolk's 10 points before fouling out in the overtime period with two seconds left. Spangler pulled down 8 rebounds before fouling out also.

Malinowski led all scorers with 18 points, followed by fellow co-captain Phillips with 14. Williams outshot the Cardinals 20-15 from the floor but the game was decided on the foul line, where Wesleyan hit 22 of 29 attempts compared to Williams' 2 of 7.

Williams finishes the year with a solid 12-10 record, no small feat for a club boasting six underclassmen in its first seven players.

Martin Goldberg suffered in the 8 division from one of the numerous tourney foul-ups as he was incorrectly left unseeded. Facing a tougher draw, Goldberg was tripped 3-1 in the third round by the division winner from Western Ontario. Chip Lindquist survived two rounds before he dropped two oversets and, with them, the match 3-0.

Also having the misfortune of facing a divisional winner was Tim Belk in the C's. He fell 3-0 in the first round and then went on to the consolations where he won a match before being eliminated. Charlie Haines suffered the only true disappointment of the weekend for the Ephs when he lost a 3-2 heartbreaker to a Stoneybrook player in the second round. Haines figured to finish higher, but his game was hampered by the steamy Navy courts.

Poolmen 3rd in New England behind UMaine, Springfield

by Dennis O'Shea

Last weekend's New England Assoc. championships ended up very much like last year's. Once again, Springfield and Maine tussled for top honors to the final event (last year it was Maine by two, this time Springfield by six) while the Ephmen scrambled in ahead of the rest of the 30 team field, 55 points behind the Chiefs.

Again the Ephs clearly dominated all other Division III schools. Sixth place Bowdoin was the closest, 63 points behind Williams; Coast Guard lagged 30 points further back.

A series of stunning performances by junior sprinter Phil Wild lifted the natators from their dismal seventh place after disqualification of their 800 freestyle relay at the meet's opening session. Wild blew by Southern Connecticut's defending 100 freestyle champ Bill Krumm on the third length of the finals of that event and wedged open a half body length margin on the fourth to win at 47.395, six-tenths of a second faster than the college record.

He also anchored a pair of second place relays, reeling off a descending series of splits that astounded the entire league. The fastest, 45.6, was nearly a second quicker than the conference record for a 100 freestyle from a flat start.

The bizzare relay disqualification was triggered by Ron Pospisil, third swimmer for Maine's first place quartet, who miscalculated the number of laps his second swimmer had swum and stepped to the blocks two lengths early. Confused, third legs in most of the other lanes also stepped up. The others including 2nd place Springfield's Jeff Germain, in the lane next to Maine, checked when Pospisil dove on top of his teammate, but three lanes over and with his team right on Springfield's heels, Wild had to make a quick decision—and made the wrong one.

"The measure of any team is their response to adversity," commented coach Carl Samuelson. "The 800 relay was an adverse condition that might have been the end of any team's momentum, yet we were able to rise above it all, and I really respect that."

Wild and the poolsters responded with a torent of fine performances that left them 26 points out of third after Friday's events, put them 17 past Southern by the end and enabled them to stifle a UConn comeback effort by five points.

Stuart Deans knocked off his own 500 freestyle College record finishing sixth after a fourth in the 1650 and a 10th in the 200, while Wild, Guy Hoelzer, Dave Amlicke and Tom Beckett toppled 3.3 seconds from the 400 free relay mark in a second place finish to NE record holding UConn.

Freshman Todd Piper had a fine first New Englands, posting fifth in the 400 individual medley and 200 fly, and a frosh record sixth in the 200 i.m. Amlicke and Don Cameron netted second and third in the 100 back to Maine's John Naber look-alike (and swim alike) Jim Smoragiewicz, and Paul vom Eigen and Chris Clark whip kicked a 3-8 finish in the 200 breaststroke.

Bill and Tom Beckett and R. J. Connelly finished fifth, seventh and 12th in the 50 free, and Guy Hoelzer took seventh to Piper's fifth in the 200 fly and frosh Jim Goff's sixth in the 100.

Peter Howd and Jordan Lewis pulled in ninths in the 200 medley and 500 free respectively. Co-captain Duff Anderson, swam the 1650, 200 fly and 500, notching tenths in the latter two.

Phil Wild receives first place award for the 100 freestyle as second placed Bill Krumm (So. Conn.) and third place Gary Beale (U.Conn.) look on. (Farmakis)

Cardinals dunk purple in overtime

by Andy O'Donnell

Four months and four days of steady improvement and gradual maturation came to a frustrating end in the leaky surroundings of the Wesleyan field house Friday night as the varsity basketball team suffered a tough 52-42 overtime loss to top-seeded Wesleyan in the opening round of the ECAC Division II-III tournament.

The win marked Wesleyan's second triumph over Williams in three meetings this year after finishing in a regular season tie with Williams and Amherst for the Little Three title. Saturday night the Cardinals met Quinipiac, a 64-61 victor over Stonehill, in the tournament finals. Quinipiac won, 63-62.

The game was by no means an artistic success but was certainly a lot closer than the final score indicates. With both teams playing very deliberately on offense and suffering through atrocious shooting nights (Williams shot 38 per cent, Wesleyan 29 per cent), neither club was able to establish any control of the game. Wesleyan's largest lead was 15-8 midway through the first half, for instance, while Williams slipped into a five point margin twice early in the second half.

In the end, though, it was a bad case of carelessness and tournament inexperience that cost the Ephs a berth in the finals.

After fighting their way to a 34-all tie at the end of regulation time, the Ephs fell apart in the five minute overtime period, making key mental errors at all the wrong moments on which Wesleyan gladly capitalized.

Matt Spangler opened the period by hitting a jumper to give Williams its last lead of the game, 36-34, with 4:31 left. Steve Malinowski tied things for Wesleyan a minute later with a rebound bucket and then Jim Connery was fouled and hit the front end of a one and one to put Wesleyan ahead for the first time since the six minute mark of the first half, 37-36.

From here on in things became nightmarish for the Ephs. First, Mike Tanner and Andy Straka simultaneously went for a Spangler pass and lost the ball out of bounds. Then, following a Malinowski free throw miss, the ball deflected out of bounds off Williams and Earl Phillips

Eph skiers place third in Vermont's Eastern Regionals

Relying on the strength and depth of its cross country contingent, the women's ski team raced to an outstanding third place finish at the Eastern Regionals last weekend. The excellent WEAIAW finish which resulted in the qualification of five team members for the March 11-12 Nationals at Stowe, Vermont, was even better than coach Karen Fisher had expected.

Cross country leader Rachel Potter qualified with nordic teammate Ellen Toll and Ann Waters after strong performances, March 4. Potter skied to a fourth place finish on the 7.5 kilometer course, less than two minutes off the winning time of 27:34. Waters and Toll, placing 12th and 14th to qualify for the Stowe competition, assured Williams of an overall second place finish overall in the regionals. Ephs Gina Campoli and Sally Newtown finished 21st and 28th in the field of fifty in the strong Williams showing.

Although alpine powerhouse Matty Epstein was not at full strength for the regionals, her performance earned her an invitation to the nationals along with Corrie Johnson.

In Friday's giant slalom competition, Epstein finished ninth despite the injury which had kept her out of the recent Middlebury carnival. Johnson and teammate Ashley Smith also had good showings, finishing 29th and 30th. Other top skiers adding to Williams fifth place finish overall were Linda Fano in 32nd and Karen Ham in 39th.

Coming in sixth overall in the slalom division, the Ephs alpine unit was led by Epstein who finished eighth. Johnson finished 14th while Ham, Fano, and Smith placed 28th, 31st, and 33rd respectively for the squad.

Middlebury grabbed the top ranking overall in the regionals, the first to be held for women in the East. Although Williams repeated last year's performance by finishing third, coach Fisher was extremely pleased with its performance, especially that of Rachel Potter in cross country.

Squash squads return from national tourneys

Men

by Evan Bash

All in all, it was one very productive weekend.

First, an abridged, six man version of the varsity squash team partook in the annual squash get-together known as the National Championships and garnered enough points in a fine showing to tie for eighth. Then a poll of the coaches present at the Naval Academy tournament site properly recognized the Ephs' outstanding season record of 10-4 by voting the squad to a fourth place ranking nationally in dual meet competition, Williams's highest placement in twelve years.

To understand the discrepancy between the two lofty rankings, one need only examine this year's match results to find that Coach Dave Johnson's squad had the greatest strength at the seven, eight, and nine positions on the ladder. It takes a well balanced team to win 10 matches, however, as the elite six pointed out with spirited performances.

Thirty teams played in the tournament won by Western Ontario University. The Canadian school was followed by Princeton, Penn, and Harvard. Army and Trinity tied for fifth, while Stoneybrook inched in ahead of Williams and Yale by ½ point. In the dual meet rankings only Princeton, Harvard and Penn outplaced the Ephs.

Playing in the A division, Captain Marc Reinhardt fared very well, winning two matches before falling in the round of sixteen. As has happened all year, his conqueror was one of the betterplayers in this country; this time it was an eventual semi-finalist from Western Ontario. Arnie Cogswell made it to the second round where he

Women

Senior Janet Costikyan is still awaiting notification concerning her national ranking as a result of her play at the NCAA Squash tournament, February 26. Costikyan paced Williams to a fourth place finish at the National Championships at the University of Pennsylvania.

Ephs Jane Garvey, Laura Carson, Becky Chase, and Costikyan, all unseeded going into the tournament, played a combination of regular and consolation matches to secure a strong finish behind powerhouses Yale, Trinity, and Princeton.

On her way to a national ranking, Costikyan won her first two matches to qualify for the quarter-finals. Playing the tournament's No. 4 seed, Costikyan was defeated in three games.

Junior Garvey, playing No. 1 for the squad this season, won by default in her first round match, but was fed into the consolation round following her loss in the second major round. Garvey reached the quarter-finals of the consolation play before being eliminated in a good match.

Freshman Becky Chase also had a default in the first round and was fed into the consolation round after a loss in the second. Chase was defeated in consolation play but went on to win the consolation—consolation round of the tournament. Freshman Chase's outstanding play earned her the tournament's Future Player award.

Playing her way to the quarter-finals of the consolation round, Carson won two matches before being defeated by a tough opponent.

As a result of scoring which gives points for victories in the consolation and major rounds, the team, under the guidance of coach Graham Hone, earned the national ranking.

Annual 24-hour charity relay

by Frank Carr

Once again, the Williams Road Runners Club 24 Hour Charity Relay will bring over 200 runners, joggers, plodders, etc. into Towne Fieldhouse for a day of fun and fund raising. This "day" will start at 10:00 a.m. Saturday and end at 10:00 a.m. Sunday. Participants on the 14 teams will be looping around the tartan oval for miles and dollars, as pledges are being solicited on a per-mile basis.

The event, developed by Runners World magazine, consists of a ten-member relay squad who run successive individual miles for the 24 hour period or until they drop from muscle pulls, exhaustion, etc. With the exception of the WRRC "A" team and a few house teams, the groups on Saturday will not follow the official 10-man limit but go with a core of a dozen or more, supplemented by "guest milers" who will help to stretch the rest period between miles.

Peter Farwell '73, the founder of this unique campus event, is planning to return for the 1977 edition and get a look at the monster he created. Since 1972 the event has been used as a fund raising project and last year over $2,000 was collected from pledges. Athletic Director Bob Peck is coordinating the charity aspect of the event and urges students and faculty to pledge their favorite team this week or come down to Towne Fieldhouse during the mileage march and support the runners with a few cheers and a few cents (per mile of course).

According to Peck, the pledge dollars will go to the Williamstown Day Care Center, the Boys Club, the ABC Program and other local based charities. Providing entertainment for the runners and spectators will be the Jazz Band, the Pipe Band, Peter Wells and his highly acclaimed "American Walkabout", and most importantly a bake sale to provide those much needed carbohydrates.

The Williams Road Runner Club "A" Team ran 263 miles in last year's 24 hour relay. The women's team set a world indoor record, running 218 miles. (photo by Read)

Forum debates input, power

by Keron Walker and Nancy Richman

Participants in the Gladden school-wide forum resolved Wednesday night to meet with faculty and CAP members to discuss the tenuring process and other major decision-making routes at Williams.

Students expressed concern that communication between faculty, administration and the student body is insufficient. Spokesmen from all classes said that they were poorly informed as to the way decisions are made and proposed further discussions and meetings with the faculty to remedy the situation.

Approximately ninety students attended the meeting, along with four representatives from the faculty and the four deans of the College. "I might have wished for a little greater participation on the part of the students," Victor Bell of Gladden said. "However, there were many different views aired. A larger group might not have run so smoothly."

College Council President Steve Piltch observed that a large percentage of the people in attendance were either members of the College Council, or Gladden House affiliates.

Participants agreed that the major issue of the meeting was student input, but there was some question as to whether extant routes are adequate but unused or inadequate. Student-faculty parity on committees was discussed; Michael Katz, a member of the Faculty Steering Committee reported that a sub-committee had been formed to review the present make-up of student-faculty committees.

Specific areas in which students desired greater opportunity to participate were the tenuring process, admissions and the results of course evaluations conducted by faculty. A participant also noted that students have little input into the general academic policies which directly affect students, such as double majors, course dropping and taking a year off from school.

Dean of the College Peter Berek responded to questions concerning student self-government and faculty-student parity on committees. "There exists the potential of conflict between

by Stu Massad

The Student Housing Committee finalized decisions on off-campus living Monday night and passed a reform of transfer procedure which will be presented to the Committee on Undergraduate Life Monday. The Housing Committee also discussed target figures for freshman inclusion and equalizing male-female ratios in houses.

Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad read the names of 75 members of the Class of '78 who will be allowed to live off campus next year. The drop from last year's figure, Roosenraad acknowledged, will disappoint many students, but he emphasized that permission to live off-campus is a "privilege," not an alternative to residential housing.

Committee Co-Chairman Jamie Barickman proposed a reform of the transfer system which would process upperclass transfers in freshman inclusion. The proposal, Barickman said, "would give upperclassmen a significantly better chance of transferring to the Main Street row houses and Dodd," but would reduce slightly the chances of freshmen gaining their first choice by increasing the competition in the housing pool.

The proposal was amended to allow houses to establish quotas for transfer by class to keep class ratios in houses even.

Roosenraad opposed the revision, calling it a "fundamental change" from CUL guidelines. The CUL report issued this fall stated that the committee "endorsed the present practice of granting House transfers after freshman inclusion occurs."

The committee passed the proposal 11 to 8 and voted to send a delegation to next Monday's meeting at the CUL to discuss the proposal.

"I felt I just had to make some attempt to rescue the transfer system," Barickman said. He denied that his proposal violated CUL guidelines.

Roosenraad noted that up to 25 students, above the present figure of 75, may be granted off-campus permission because of "private factors" and special need. He declined to define these factors, noting that the committee had already approved retaining these spaces for special cases. He also assured members that pressure from individual students would not force the Dean to grant permission to live off campus.

The drop in the number of students permitted to live off campus, combined with a drop in incoming exchange students from 50 to 30 and the abnormal size of this year's freshman class "does put the College where we want it to be in terms of on campus residents." He referred to the administration's desire to open close to full next fall. Roosenraad noted that the size of next year's housing bills

Herwitz, Kelly in runoff for Council presidency

Tom Herwitz and Harry Kelly met yesterday and today in a runoff election for president of the College Council. One thousand three hundred forty-five students voted, or about 72 per cent of the College, according to Vice-president Randy Sturges.

According to Sturges, voter turnout was good in all houses except Perry, only twenty of whose members voted, and Gladden, whose participation was under 50 per cent. More than a quarter of all "no" votes came from Dodd House, he added.

This year's participation was the best in several years, said Sturges. "No" votes totalled 136, or ten per cent of all votes cast. Sturges noted that without them the election would not have attained the two-thirds total necessary for it to be valid.

Sturges was satisfied with the participation, claiming that it would have been very difficult to achieve a higher participation in a two-day election considering the lack of participation of Gladden and Perry and the difficulty of getting off-campus votes in the allotted time.

Peter Friesen was elected vice-president, Beth Geismar, Matthew Spangler, Cabby Tennis, Jim Parsons, Sarah Mersereau, and Peter Thayer won at-large positions on the CC. Molly Roach will be Division I representative to the CEP Committee on Educational Policy; Jane Garvey and David Koenigsberg will compete in a runoff for the Division II seat, and Jeffrey Delisle and John Larabee will runoff for the Division III seat. Cath Carpenter and Paul Goren will compete for the CEP at-large spot.

Runoff elections for the Committee on Undergraduate Life will be conducted for the Class of 1978 between Cordy Gould and Brent Shay, for the Class of 1979 between Bill McCalpin and Cathy Jackson, for the Class of 1980 between Carolyn Dye and Bart Mitchell, and for the at-large seat between Hans Giesecke and Lee Davis.

Daniel Sullivan, Bill Dahling, Douglas Orr and Cynthia Willoughby won election to the Honor and Discipline Committee, and a runoff will be conducted for the Class of 1979 seat between Linda Scheffer and Paul Rogers.

Tonight's election picks either Harry Kelly or Tom Herwitz to be CC president.

Students evaluate Food Service changes

This is the last article in a three part series discussing Food Services at Williams. It focuses on improvements in Food Services as perceived by students.

by George Schutzer

Salad bar. That is the word students interviewed by the Record used most often to describe the improvements in Food Services since Ross Keller became director eight months ago.

In an effort to gather student opinion food services' Bob Rickert started the Napkin Board in the North Baxter dining room. (photo by Oettgen)

In fact, that was the only improvement many students cited. Others listed the availability of ice cream and soda at every meal, improvement in Sunday night meals and the extension of dining hours on Sunday nights as Keller's major positive accomplishments.

Since September, salad bars at lunch and dinner in all the dining halls have included such items as olives, carrots, celery, croutons, bacon bits, cottage cheese, cucumbers and beans in addition to lettuce and tomatoes. Last year the salad tables usually contained only a bowl of pre-tossed salad.

Last school year the soda machines were turned on for only one meal per day. Now they are on at every meal.

Until late autumn Sunday dinner hours were from 5:30 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. Following student complaints about long dinner lines, Keller ordered dining halls to begin serving Sunday dinners at 5 p.m. Earlier in the year, he had changed the dinner hours in Baxter Hall from 5:30-6:30 to 5-7 p.m.

In an interview with the Record, Keller listed reduced menu predictability and increased selection at each meal as two of his major improvements, but few of the forty students interviewed listed these as improvements.

One student praised Keller for the stricter approach food services has taken toward checking of student identification cards. "It really annoyed me to see (a student) eat for free day after day," the student said.

Keller said that one of his goals as food service director was to make sure that all of a student's board money is put to producing the best possible meals for students during regular dining hours. His interpretation of this policy has angered many students.

Athletes who can no longer get rebates for meals they miss complain. Perry House steward Andy O'Donnell claims this policy may result in less selectivity for students, because it makes it difficult for a house to substitute a lobster dinner, for example, for the item on the menu. Before Keller joined Food Services, a house which planned and paid for a lobster dinner got a rebate for the meal not served. The same was true of some special events such as Fort Hoosac House's Strawberry Festival.

Food Services is also now charging for special services which it used to provide for free. For example, residential houses which ordered party food through Food Services used to pay only the cost of the food. Now there is a minimum order size and a charge of the labor involved in preparing the order.

Keller claims that by doing this, Food Services is charging groups for the expenses they incur. Thus the typical student is not paying for these extra services out of his board money.

Students have argued that this policy, in effect, isolates Food Services from the College as a whole, that decisions are made not in terms of what is best for the College but what is best for the students who eat regular meals at regular times.

Keller denied that "Food Services would like to isolate itself from the College and the special and educational needs of it." We just believe that the $925 board fee should be used exclusively for the food students are served 20 times per week, he insisted.

If this has resulted in a major change from last year, however, many students do not perceive it. The most common responses to the question, "What improvements in food services have you noticed since last year?" were "There is no net improvement," and "I need time to think."

Respondents who regularly eat in row houses often questioned, "Changes for the better?" but then cited some positive changes in the major dining halls. These students often limited their comments to the large dining halls noting that food quality and choice in the row houses has appeared to go down hill.

But some row house students did describe Keller's major achievement as elimination of the one meal per week when the cook cleaned out the refrigerator by serving exclusively leftovers.

The only point that students seemed in total agreement with was that the tacos served at lunch Wednesday were good and a welcome change.

Energy Inertia

Energy issues have been controversial and well publicized during the long cold winter. Peter Welanetz, Director of Physical Plant, conducted a study on the efficiency of energy use in classroom buildings. College Mechanical Engineer John Holden has shown that solar heating units are likely to become economical for some campus buildings in the next couple years. The Committee on the Campus Environment discussed a campus-wide energy conservation incentive program. The College accepted the concept of linking summer research grants to energy use reductions in Division III classrooms and laboratories. Assistant Professor of Geology John Dohrenwend proposed that students and residential houses receive rebates for energy conservation. Provost Neil Grabois is researching the feasibility of devising a system for monitoring steam heat usage. Reed Zars and Bryne Kelly have done a good deal of independent research on campus energy usage.

We urge college administrators, faculty and students not to forget with the advent of warmer weather the importance of energy conservation measures. The Williams community has made some inroads into energy conservation. Student consciousness of energy conservation has improved. As a result of the steps already taken in the past few years the College saved $200,000 this past year. Nevertheless, much remains to be done. Many of the projects undertaken to date have been exploratory in nature. Their payoff can only come when they are implemented as realistic energy conservation measures.

Students celebrated the coming of spring weather last Wednesday in traditional fashion—by turning the steps of Chapin Hall into a veritable beach for lounging, studying and learning the art of frisbee. (photo by Oettgen)

Notebook Scribblings

Time to clean out the basketball notebook and resurrect two columns that never made it into print due to space considerations before my bus leaves for Mars ...

Perhaps the most interesting aspect of last week's ECAC basketball tournament involved the teams that didn't make it. Springfield, 16-7 overall and 91-80 winners over Williams earlier in the year, somehow was left out of both the NCAA Division II tournament and the ECAC affair, while Central Connecticut, North Adams State, and Amherst were also left out in the cold by the ECAC.

The lack of a tournament bid resulted in a minor brouhaha at Amherst last week, where a tournament spot was considered a sure thing following the Jeffs' back to back defeats of Williams and Wesleyan, the tournament's first and fourth seeds. An article in the Amherst Student by Jeff Klein entitled "How the ECAC Shafted the Jeffs" reported that "the most insulting and aggravating aspect is that it appears there may have been a conscious effort to exclude Amherst" and quoted Williams News Director Andrea Diehl as saying "we were probably the most surprised people of all. Neither the coach nor the players expected this." ...

Mike Tanner finished his varsity basketball career with a total of 854 points in 66 games as a varsity player, a career average of 12.8 points per game ...

All time Williams scoring leader Harry Sheehy, continues his march towards the NBA, going over the 40 point mark twice recently while playing for the Athletes in Action East squad. In one of those games Sheehy went 21 for 24 from the field and 7 of 8 from the line for a total of 48 points against an AAU team boasting three NBA draft picks ...

Amherst coach Rick Wilson ended 29 years at the Jeff helm last Wednesday with a 110-69 rout of Norwich. Amherst now joins Middlebury in the market for a basketball coach ...

"You're driving on the highway from Reno to San Francisco when you suddenly start seeing purple, pink, red and black cows attired in masks and capes strewn along the highway."

Did anyone notice that all six Little Three hoop games were won by the home team this year?

Tonight's quiz: Name the Williams player who scored goals against Amherst this year in two different sports. Answer below.

A glance at the Ivy league standings reveals that Yale had even less success in basketball with their fellow league mates than they did with Williams. While Princeton, Penn, and Columbia lead the top-heavy league with an average record of 17-7, the best record among the remaining five clubs is Harvard's woeful 7-15 mark. Yale is a dismal 6-18 ...

Princeton is also enjoying a banner year in squash and swimming. The New York Times reported Sunday that the Tigers, 7-2 victors over Williams in a dual match earlier this year, defeated Harvard before over 1,000 fans a few weeks back at the new Jadwin courts. Labelled by the Times as the "Cadillac" of squash facilities, the 12 courts were built in 1968 at a cost of $15,000. Six of the twelve have electronic scoreboards, while two seat over 500 fans ...

In swimming, meanwhile, the gap between small and major college swimming was never so apparent than at the Eastern seaboard championships held last weekend, where Colgate, a 107-26 demolisher of Williams this year, could only manage an eleventh place finish, 304 points behind winner Princeton ...

Memo to the Prospect Aruba Committee: Perhaps John Havlicak would like a ticket next year. Witness the following quote from Hondo in a recent Globe interview: "What I'd like to do for the next couple of years is to be relatively free to do some of the things that I haven't been able to do because of basketball ... It would be nice to go to a warm climate, some place like Aruba. Now I've never done that."

Frats are entering a crucial phase at Amherst, the Student reported recently. "Amherst frats are currently at the crossroads," read the article's lead. The article reported that while 68 per cent of freshman men indicated a desire to join frats, only 31 per cent of Amherst women consented, with all but six women expressing interest solely in three of the Jeffs' ten frats.

Does anyone realize that in transforming Garfield from 19 to 35 rooms all party space will have been eliminated from the house? Or doesn't that matter anymore? Also, this chop - up - big - rooms - into - more - smaller - rooms for the hell of it approach to recent renovations (witness Currier and Bascom) really bewilders me ...

A guy who deserves a huge pat on the back is one Buzz Inboden, the gregarious Winter Carnival czar who organized the best Winter Carnival in many a year three weeks back ...

Of the five members of the theater department, four have graduate degrees from Carnegie-Mellon. And now that the only non-CM member is leaving, what kind of odds would Nathan Detroit offer for the name on her successors' graduate diploma?

One of the most likeable men to grace Spring Street passed away a few weeks ago. Seniors and juniors will remember Bud Anderson as the highly affable proprietor of St. Pierre's Barber Shop, a gentleman who really cared about Williams College and its students ...

Quiz Answer: Chick Johnson, who tallied goals in the 3-2 soccer loss and 5-0 hockey win against Amherst ...

Finally, a tidbit from the Globe of two months back ... You're driving along the highway from Reno to San Francisco when you suddenly start seeing purple, pink, red, and black cows attired in masks and capes strewn along the highway. You wonder, is this a WGSO initiation or the work of an Amherst alum heavily into paint chips? Not necessarily. According to the Globe, it is a Celebration of Wonder (COW), the work of San Francisco State University art professor Mel Henderson, who said his purpose in erecting the life size bovine cutouts was to "delight and surprise".

Freedom of speech

To the editor:

I am not at all surprised that you refused to print my article on Uganda on the pretext of a technical fault. Is this the liberal ideal of Freedom of Speech and Expression?

Your action only goes to support, in part, Stokey Carmichael's charge that there is no Freedom of Speech in the United States of America; "there are only illusions of democracy." As a student of this college, I should have the right to express myself in the student newspaper regardless of the political opinion expressed, if freedom of speech does indeed exist in this institution. You have shown me and some other students whose articles you have refused to print in the past that the democratic ideal of free speech does not exist in this liberal arts institution.

I believe that you and your editors exercise dictatorial powers over the college community, especially the student body. You and your editors are not elected by the student body, and yet you claim to represent student opinion. Your newspaper is supported by student funds but your staff is not accountable to the student body; you dictate what goes into the paper and what stays out. Such is the power you and your clique wield on the campus, as if it were a privately run newspaper. The present system by which you and your unelected editors appoint the following year's chief editor and staff leaves much to be questioned in this procedure.

To remedy this dangerous situation, I suggest that you and your staff resign and that student elections be held to fill out your positions. By so doing the student body would get a representative body on the Record staff which in turn would be forced to entertain a broader spectrum of student opinions. This should make the Record, now hardly worth calling a newspaper, the intellectually stimulating newspaper that ought to exist in the liberal atmosphere of this prestigious institution.

Yours Sincerely,
Nana Frimpond-Mensah, '77

If we wanted to be dictatorial we wouldn't bother printing your letter, Nana. It cost us $8.60. Perhaps if your viewpoint had been in by the prescribed deadline of 2:00 p.m. in proper newspaper format, there would have been room reserved to run it. We did not "refuse to print" your viewpoint. Rather you were told that it could not be run in that issue because there were space problems and because your Viewpoint contained footnotes. While the RECORD can in no way guarantee that all unsolicited Viewpoints will be printed, we do promise that none will be rejected because of the particular political opinion it expresses.—Ed.

Dodd cuisine

To the editor:

Recently, I had the pleasure of forsaking the meager diet of the New York City law student to return to Williams and Dodd House for Winter Carnival. As always, my appetite was completely satisfied by chef Peter Brazeau, with much help from Gary, Evelyn, and Mrs. Brazeau. The February 22 Record gave an accurate description of Peter. The dining room is the center of much of the Dodd house social experience. It was truly a pleasure for me (thought not always for Pete) to work with him as steward of Dodd House last year. Everyone in Dodd House knows that Pete can always be counted on for a good meal and good conversation over a cup of coffee when he gets a spare moment. Pete has not always received the best treatment from the College, but anyone who saw him return to Dodd House from the hospital for his Amherst weekend feast in 1975, after hurting his back that morning, knows his total dedication to the members of Dodd House.

Unfortunately, Ross Keller was not there to see Pete that day. The article on Food Services in the February 25 Record shows that the Department does not seem to appreciate the hard work Pete and the other row house chefs put in. There have been rumors in the past of the impending demise of row house living at Williams. Now, with or without official sanction, Food Services is placing crippling pressure on the heart of row house living, their dining facilities. Eliminate row house dining at Dodd, and you remove what social cohesion a house that size can possibly have. Row house living shaped three of my years at Williams in a very positive way. It would be a great loss to the College if this one small department could destroy a unique and valuable part of the Williams education.

Sincerely,
Bill Moehle '76

All-Star teams snub Ephs

hotbed of college hoop, Maine, we come up with junior center-forward Greg Fasulo from Bowdoin.

Moving westward, Norwich sophomore forward Joe Marciewicz is the team's third member. Rounding out the squad are a pair of Little Three forwards, Jim Rehnquist of Amherst (surprise!) and Steve Malinowski of Wesleyan.

The purpose of this column is not to question the abilities of any of these players, check the ECAC scoring and rebounding totals and they're all there, or at least were supposed to be at the start of the year. (The "all-press release team", or the "all-box score team").

The squad is basically a group of run-and-gun, give-me-the-ball, fire-it-up-from-thirty, selfish basketball players. If this is what comprises an all-star, why didn't the coaches or writers who voted on it just go all the way and add the hero of the howitzer, WPI's Rick Wheeler?

Between them, Marciewiez (strictly all-ugly) and Harvey will take more bad, forced shots in one game than most players take in a season. Harvey has twice come into Lasell Gymnasium with enough press clippings to fill a briefcase and Williams fans are still waiting for him to break 20.

Fasulo is a fine small-college forward, but would not score 23-24 points per game on a good team. He's basically a big fish in small pond (or a big Polar Bear on a small iceberg). Malinowski is a physically imposing 6'3" forward who spent three years forcing up shots before reforming and helping Wesleyan to a fine season. But why reward 14.3 ppg. and reformation when Mike Tanner hit nearly 19 a game and accomplished the same type of thing with a bunch of underclassmen.

Although he didn't live up to his 1975-76 year, Jim Rehnquist is an all-star by any standards, but one in five isn't too hot. It's somewhat hard to understand how a player the caliber of Brandeis' Joe Carter, who, in the word of Williams mentor Curt Tong "devastated everybody," could have been left off.

But let's face it, this is a selfish column. After seeing those names on an all-star team, one has to wonder why Gerry Kelly, Mike Tanner, and Brad Wolk aren't mentioned.

Sure, the only statistical title Kelly will ever win is for floor burns and the only thing glamorous about Tanner is his cute little moustache. Wolk never gets 30 rebounds, just 15 every game, and without accompanying slam dunks. But these guys are Damn near as good as anybody Williams sees all year, and to see some of the aforementioned gunners on all-star teams ahead of them is ridiculous.

A compromise might be in order, but any Division III all-star team I make up would start with Gerry Kelly, and we'd settle from there.

Council validates election, funds student course guide

In a move to increase student input into tenure decisions, the College Council voted to allocate funds for the publication of a faculty evaluation questionnaire. Representatives also discussed the fate of the Student Course Guide and the results of this week's election.

Standing Committee Representative Hervey McIver requested a $100 allocation for the printing of a faculty evaluation questionnaire that would "give every student a chance to comment on any junior faculty member inside or outside the department of his major or intended field of study." Student responses to the questionnaire would be summarized by the Standing Committee and sent on to the CAP for its consideration in tenure decisions.

McIver's proposed format for the questionnaire would involve having a student first specifically define the nature of his association with a particular professor, and then allowing him to comment on various aspects of the professor's merit. Students would be asked to sign their names on the questionnaire, in order to avoid what McIver called "stupid comments." McIver added that all names would remain confidential to the Standing Committee.

Council members voted to accept a recommendation from Treasurer Clarence Otis to limit the budget of the Course Guide Committee to $900. Otis' recommendation also stipulates that only courses which have a registration of 10 or more students, and in which at least 25 per cent of course members have responded to the questionnaire, should be included in the Student Course Guide.

In other action at Wednesday night's meeting, Cabby Tennis reported that the CUL is discussing the possibility of randomizing the racial inclusion process for incoming freshmen. The CUL also voted to delete the clause on the freshman rooming application allowing incoming students to specify preferred extra-curricular activities. Tennis explained that this clause "tended to stray from randomness" and added that it was "just padding for the racial situation."

Athlete of the Week

Athlete of Week honors go to Wild

Natator Phil Wild grabs this week's Athlete of the Week honors as a result of his excellent performances at last week's NE Championships. Breaking the college record in the 100 yard free, Wild pulled ahead by a half body length on the fourth lap to win the race in 47.395. Wild also anchored two second place relays, with an incredible 45.6 split to knock a second off the 100 yard free (flat start) conference record.

Rachel Potter earns an honorable mention this week for her strong showing at the Eastern Regionals last weekend. Potter, headed for the Nationals March 11, skied to a fourth place finish in the 7.5 kilo. course, to lead the Williams contingent.

might be raised if the housing system is not filled.

"The number of off-campus applicants from the Class of '79 is heartwarming," Roosenraad said, "because that's way down from last year." Only 23 sophomores applied for off-campus permission. Four members from the Class of '80 also applied for permission.

The committee began to calculate the space that each house will have available next year to house freshmen. Roosenraad remarked that upperclass enrollment will total about 1350 next fall. House representatives also set target figures to correct male to female ratios, especially in Dodd and the Mission Park houses, where the ratio is greater than two to one.

the faculty and the students," he said with regards to long-term policy, "but the greatest power anyone can have is the ability to persuade with good reasons."

It was the concensus of those participating that a single principle would not alleviate the tension in the many areas discussed. One student asked for a definition of Williams' philosophy of education, maintaining that it was necessary to have some criteria to go on before attacking the system.

Reactions to the meeting were varied. While one participant expressed frustration that "nothing was accomplished," others felt quite differently. CC Representative Cath Carpenter said that she found it "thought provoking." The forum was, he said, "a collection of different types of people, expressing frustration at the decision making process here, and it was a productive one."

The Gladden House sponsors concurred. "The issues at the forum probably stirred up the campus more than attendance at the forum would indicate. We have to continue to go back to the students and cultivate their involvement," Bell said.

Participants in the forum generally agreed that the structure of student government at Williams was not the significant issue. In one sense, as one participant noted, the legitimacy of the College Council was affirmed. Piltch said that Tuesday's election results had already indicated this.

Over 200 runners pull all nighters tomorrow

by Frank Carr

The infectious distance running bug is spreading outward from the hard core track jocks as fourteen teams will take part in tomorrow's Sixth Annual Williams Road Runners Club 24 Hour Charity Relay. The gun goes off at 10:00 a.m. tomorrow and the "dollars for distance" extravaganza will begin. Over 200 runners will take the "Towne Tartan Tour" with some enthusiasts getting all too familiar with the green substance before the 24 hours are up.

The Williams Road Runners ten-man contingent is hoping to break the 270 mile mark and to do so they will need a team average of about 5:20 per mile. A 5:20 mile may seem quite anemic next to John Walker's 3:49.4, but it is faster than most Record readers could go for a single mile and besides, the WRRC maniacs will be running about 28 of them. The team is made up of seniors Tim Pritchard, Gary James, Chris Flavin and Ed Bacher; juniors Frank Carr and Joe Kolb; sophomore Steve Polasky; plus three hard core Alumni Peter Farwell '73, Scott Lutrey '75 and Paul Skudder '75.

The WRRC squad will use only these ten athletes and no "guest milers" in order to comply with the official rules and qualify for the national rankings coordinated by Runners World magazine. Other teams are encouraged to "go official" and use only ten runners, but the WRRC cannot be held responsible for inadvertent loss of life. The remaining thirteen teams are: the Striders of the Purple Valley (faculty - staff - students - alumni - administration), the Faculty Veterans, Mt. Greylock H.S. Boys, Mt. Greylock Girls, the County Harriers (Mt. Greylock and Hoosac Valley X-C runners), The Dapsangs (Armstrong-Fitch), Spencer House, Dodd Squad, 'Coyotes", Williams-Sage, C-Weeds, Tyler-Garwood and a conglomerate team from the Greylock Quad.

Renzi Lamb is acting as the general administrator at the Fieldhouse and is expected to run a guest mile (without cigar). Athletic Director Bob Peck urges spectators to come down.

Layden on sports

NCAA All-What?

by Tim Layden

Any sports fan who is worth his weight in Topps bubble gum has spent the post season of his favorite sport anxiously awaiting the release of the "all-star team," hoping both to see his own favorites on the squad and drool over the impressive statistics of the others who made it.

However, one could not call himself a bona fide fanatic unless he has contemplated suicide or the murder of a close friend (who happens to follow another team) over the selection of the "wrong player" to a post-season team. And after all, how often is any all-star team "right?"

Think about it Celtic fans. How many New York enthusiasts were you ready to mangle three or four years ago when Walt Frazier was a perennial all-star and you all knew Jo Jo White was better? Pirate fans, for how many years did you guys feel Manny Sanguillen was a better all-around player than Johnny Bench? Just a couple of examples.

These, however, are minor blunders compared to the colossal atrocity which appeared on the Scoreboard page of the Boston Globe last Monday. Under the alias of the "NCAA Division III, District I all-star team" appeared the most absurd collection of names I have every had the displeasure of reading. The team was aptly dubbed by Williams' resident golden quill of basketball, Andy O'Donnell, as the "All-reputation team." I've got some other possible titles, but let's take a look first.

To begin with, let me warn against trying to find any guards on the team, there aren't any. Let's start way up north with Colby College and junior forward Paul Harvey. Moving south, but not a hell of a lot, as we stay in that

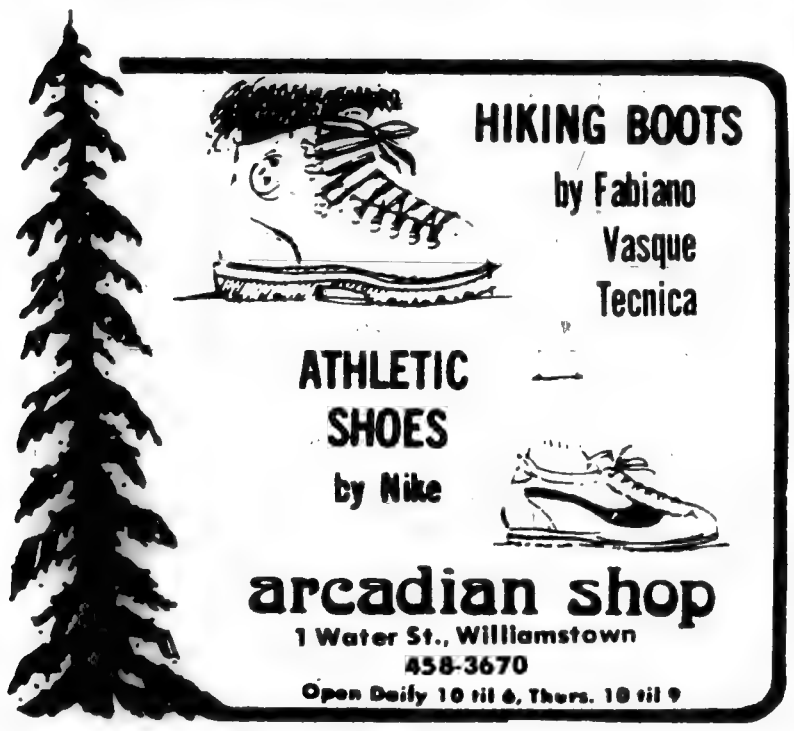
by Frank Carr

Seven members of the Williams Road Runners Club qualified for the April 18 Boston Marathon as the Club traveled to Middletown last Sunday for the annual "Conn. 'Thon." Sophomore Steve Polasky led the WRRC contingent with an excellent time of 2 hrs. 46 min. Polasky finished 22nd in the field of over 200 runners and looks set for a superb race at Boston.

In his rookie attempt at the 26.2 mile test of endurance, Rusty Anderson cruised to a time of 2:54:58, easily breaking the 3 hour Boston qualifying standard. Marathon veteran Bert Saul completed the trek in 2:55:30 for 41st place, just one spot behind Anderson. Junior Dan Riley produced a 2:56:39 in his first attempt at the "classic distance" with the pacing assistance (for the last 21 mi.) of Joe Kolb.

Moving up one position from her finish last year, Michelle Cutsforth garnered the runner-up spot in the Women's Division at 3:19. Annie Eldridge followed Michelle with a 3:38

Skiers place 12th in championship



A five man Williams contingent finished 12th out of 24 teams at the N.C.A.A. men's championships at Winter Park, Colorado. The Ephs, with two points, were the last scoring team in the standings.

Sophomore Don Tarinelli gathered Williams' only points with a 22nd in the slalom. Top alpine skier Andy Mikell had a tough weekend, falling in both the slalom and giant slalom. Sophomore Josh Dembriski fell in the slalom, while junior Chris Welch fell in the giant slalom.

Senior Gary James finished 24th out of 60 racers in the Nordic race, just missing a scoring opportunity. In all events, competitors had to finish in the top third of the field to score points for the team.

Most Frosh rank Greylock, Dodd-Tyler as first choice

by Paul Thomas

Greylock was the most popular housing choice for freshmen, followed closely by Dodd-Tyler, according to Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad. Seventy-nine groups listed Greylock first, seven more than Dodd-Tyler's total of seventy-two.

The Row House category ranked third in the number of first-choice applications trailed at a distance by Mission Park and the Berkshire Quad.

In addition, twenty-nine groups opted for Row Houses, seven for Mission Park and three for the Berkshire Quad.

Roosenraad estimated that applicants who listed Greylock as their first preference have about a fifty per cent chance of getting in. Those who picked Dodd-Tyler will face one in three odds, steeper because this category has fewer openings than Greylock. Freshmen requesting Row House rooming will probably receive their first choice.

Roosenraad said that the number of applications to Greylock was comparable with previous years. The tally of people applying to Dodd is "heavier" than it has been, possibly, because it is no longer in the same category with the Berkshire Quad, he added. Row Houses were only slightly more popular than Mission Park was last year.

The exact numbers of individuals applying to each category are not yet available, Roosenraad said, adding that the average group size was about 2.6 people.

The choices of fourteen freshmen who did not submit housing forms by the deadline were not included in these figures, Roosenraad said.

It is not known what percentage of freshmen will receive their first or second choices, Roosenraad said. Almost no one in the Class of 1979 was placed in third choice housing, he noted.

The inclusion program will be run on the computer during spring break. Freshmen should be informed of their house affiliations when they return from vacation.

Last year's Course Guide questionnaire met an abrupt end in the paper shredder. This year's is due out mid-April.

Guide to appear in April, evaluates 100 to 150 courses

This year's Student Course guide should be ready for distribution a week before registration, around April 17, according to Course Guide committee member Michael Lissack '80.

The College Council reallocated $900 for the guide last Tuesday, enabling the Course Guide Committee to print about 1900 copies for the members of the Classes of '78, '79, '80, and '81.

The guide will review only those courses which received at least five respondents to the questionnaire circulated by the committee. In addition, the course must have had at least ten students in the course itself and at least 25 per cent of the students in the course must have responded in order for the course to be evaluated. The committee received an overall response of about 33 per cent on all courses.

Although final figures are not available, one member of the committee reported that between 100 and 150 courses met the above requirements.

In the interest of providing more information to students, Ross Keller, Director of Food Services, will appear before the College Council tonight at 9 p.m. in Griffin 3. As usual, the meeting is open, and all those interested in questioning Keller are urged to attend.

Herwitz stresses CC receptiveness

"The first step toward any change is getting information about the problem. Right now there is a general lack of information on campus about major problems."

Newly elected College Council President Tom Herwitz said that getting information to students should be the first problem the council deals with. "The representatives must really go out and do their job of collecting and disseminating information."

Herwitz defeated Harry Kelly in a run-off election Thursday and Friday, 522 votes to 421 votes. "I feel the fact that I was an outsider had a lot to do with my getting elected."

"I don't want to push my views on to the CC," he maintained. "The most important thing I can do is to represent things the students desire to the administration. There are things I want to do, but it isn't really the place of the president to dictate."

In an interview Sunday, he said another objective should be "channeling the ideas and the impetus of the Gladden House forum into the council. There's no need to separate the CC and the forum." He claimed the council can achieve the goals of the forum more effectively because the council is more representative of the student body. "The CC was proved valid by the two-thirds voting (in last week's elections)," he added. "The council should not be abandoned or impinged upon."

Discussing the visibility of the council, he remarked, "The CC is not an elitist body." People should realize they can come to meetings and make motions from the floor. Herwitz plans to use the campus media to become more visible. "I've always tried to be open."

The new president's position on various issues are outlined below.

Student Course Guide: The course guide serves a lot of valuable functions, especially to incoming freshmen. The biggest problem right now is getting them filled out, and the council has got to work with the course guide committee to get a better response from the students. We've also got to be aware of faculty viewpoints. Last year's course guide really didn't do justice to some courses and faculty, and the faculty objections killed it.

Parallel Committees: Parallel committees are a first step to getting student opinion across to the administration. They're an opportunity for a more effective use of student viewpoints. Students who want to serve on the committees will probably be asked to submit self-nominations and be chosen by the council. "I'm not ruling out a general schoolwide election, but it is less probable."

Food Services: Nobody really knows the details about food services. Examining Ross Keller's books are essential, for we have no grounds to say anything until we know about the budget.

Committee drops 3-exam day

The Registrar's office will continue to schedule exams on a two-per-day basis following the Calendar and Schedule Committee's rejection of a three-per-day proposal. "The problems in exam scheduling are still manageable," said committee chairman Paul G. Clark concluding, "We can postpone the move to three a day, at least for this spring."

Clark explained the rationale behind the proposal which would schedule exams at 8:30, 12:30, and 3:30 each day. "With a two-a-day schedule, you can't eliminate exam conflicts; with three-a-day you can," he said. Reducing the number of exam conflicts would mean that fewer students would have to remain on campus until the last day of exams to take make-ups and fewer instructors would have to prepare make-up tests, Clark added.

Fifty-two students faced exam conflicts this fall, according to statistics supplied by the Office of the Registrar. Eighteen instructors were forced to prepare make-ups due to these conflicts. Using a three-per-day exam schedule, there would have been 14 conflicts and 7 faculty members would have written mandatory make-ups, according to Registrar George C. Howard.

Several committee members objected to the increased number of students who would have two exams in one day under an eighteen slot system. "The educational value of taking exams would be damaged "if more students faced two exams in one day," Craig Hallsteen '77 argued.

According to Howard's figures, 155 students had two exams in one day last term. If a three-per-day schedule had been implemented, this figure would have been increased to 220, Howard reported.

CUL vetoes Housing transfer policy

by Stu Massad

After two hours of debate with the Housing Committee Monday, the Committee on Undergraduate Life reaffirmed present transfer policy, rejecting a change proposed by the Housing Committee.

The present system, which will be tried for the first time this year, provides that transfer applications be run randomly after freshman inclusion, maximizing freshman first choice and shuffling transfers among spaces opened by students transferring out. The Housing Committee proposed that transfers be run randomly with freshman inclusion, with quotas for each house by class, (decreasing the odds for freshman first choice) but opening spaces for transfer into more popular houses.

CUL members cited a need for continuity in house membership, a desire to maximize freshman first choices, and an emphasis on reasons of social atmosphere, not physical plant, for obtaining transfer as their reasons for retaining the present system. Members also noted that greater risks in the present system tend to prevent massive transfer, increasing house stability, interpersonal ties, and thus the educational value of the residential house system.

A Long Night's Journey Into Day

Sleeping Easily

The sun rises over your typewriter with the last page of "Kant's Epistemology" still in the carriage. With some caffeine, illicit chemical, or utter will power, you have weathered one of the most dreaded of all college experiences: the all-nighter. There is still a half hour before you must expound upon existentialism in French class so you take more stimulants. What wouldn't you do for an hour of sleep?

With the test over, Ft. Lauderdale's beaches suddenly don't seem so distant, and you crawl into bed. You are physically, mentally, and emotionally tired, but your legs begin to quiver and your eyelids to flutter. The all-night hangover has set in so you reach for the Sominex . . . careful, don't kill yourself.

Having abused your body all night, natural sleep is important. Alcohol and downers may seem natural but they can mix with whatever you took to stay up—even tea—to cause extreme disorder.

Suppose, to use the extreme case, you used speed to stay up and now take barbituates to relax, you not only chance the effects of these lethal toxicants, but also the pernicious up-down cycle that might take medical aid to break. Mixing Valium, for example, and speed, would be deadly.

Major exam required again

In response to a Record article declaring major examinations optional, Dean Peter Berek said that at the April 1975 faculty meeting "they voted to make them compulsory."

The April 9, 1975 Record ran the headline Senior major exams optional, and the late William Gates, then chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy, an opponent of the compulsory exam said that, although the faculty voted not to abolish the exercise, "we're more protective of departments that want to continue major exams, but our main point was accomplished."

The difference focuses on whether the faculty legislation stipulating an exercise that "may be incorporated in or distinct from" the senior seminar requires an exam in addition to the seminar. Several departments, including Economics and Psychology have abandoned or made the exam optional, while others still give an exam.

CEP chairman George R. Goethals noted in Monday's meeting that because of the actions of these departments the "exercise is optional, this year anyway." One CEP member called the language "clearly unclear" and another noted that "it wasn't good legislation."

In tomorrow's faculty meeting the CEP will recommend that no department change its procedures this year.

NEWS BRIEFS

Financial Aid

All students, including those currently receiving financial aid, who wish to be considered for scholarship and loan assistance for the coming academic year should pick up forms in the Financial Aid office in Hopkins Hall before spring break. Applications and further information is available from Director of Financial Aid Henry N. Flynt, Jr. Filing deadlines are April 15 for the parents' form, and May 14 for the students' form.

Standing Committee Questionnaires

Student evaluations of professors who are scheduled to come up for tenure in the next few years will be distributed shortly after spring vacation through the mailroom, according to Standing Committee chairman Hervey McIver.

The questionnaire will involve such issues as student-faculty relationships, quality of teaching and the scholarship of the professor. The responses for a particular professor will be summarized when that professor comes up for tenure. The purpose of the questionnaire is to increase student input into the tenure process.

Recycling

Recycling boxes for regular paper have been placed at both entrances to the Baxter mailroom. Only regular paper may be placed in these boxes, since cellophane and glossy paper must be recycled separately.

News and Notes from OCC

The previously advertised "Jobs in the Outdoors" Conference in Boston on March 26 has been closed to new registrations as of last week. If anyone would like information on the Conference, contact Jeff Wood at OCC after Spring Break.

MARCH 17 is when applications must be postmarked for the LSAT test to be given April 16. That's tomorrow.

WCFM changes public Opinion

WCFM announced that it is expanding its public service feature Opinion to four times a day (during the Seven O'Clock News, at 11:20 p.m., 8:20 a.m., and 1:20 p.m.). People from the college or community who have an opinion to express on any issue of concern to them should contact the WCFM news department. The opinion will be recorded, and aired at those four times.

Viewpoint

The Council's Second Chance

by Larry Mitchell

Elections are over and the College Council has survived. Or has it? While the "noes" did not win, and an abolitionist was not elected, neither were the "establishment" candidates. The election of Tom Herwitz may well in fact be a rejection of the existing council.

As an outsider, Herwitz will have to learn very quickly the procedural pitfalls which have, in the past, kept the council from fulfilling its roll as an effective student government with a real voice in the administration. It is this past failing which must be overcome before new actions are taken.

But Herwitz's election demonstrates the willingness of the student body to give council another chance. The council has been beating its heads against the wall for the past year in an attempt to extract student opinion, and its sole reward has been sore heads! Gladden's secession and Perry's boycott, not to mention the "vote no!" campaign and various petitions, all served to awaken a dormant concern among Williams students that they weren't making their own decisions, or at least not affecting those made for them. The Gladden forum was productive, in that it fostered understanding of both the problems the council has faced, and the sources of discontent. Even so, that forum was composed largely of Gladden people and council members.

While the council most certainly should take these "dissident" ideas into consideration, one of the most important things for it to realize is that these movements, despite their substantial press coverage, are in fact minority movements. The council has yet to hear from the bulk of the student body, and so must continue beating its heads.

It must be realized too, by those who are discontent, that it is foolish to expect (or even hope) that reform, if indeed generally desired, can or should occur overnight. Give the council time, now that reform ideas have been expressed, to thoughtfully rather than hastily respond to them.

The past two weeks may well have given the council the support and encouragement it needs. It can finally take comfort in the knowledge that there are other concerned Williams students willing to express an opinion.

The greatest danger however, is that the "noise" made over the last few weeks will die. Should this occur, the council may well be allowed to continue wounding its skulls! It is up to the students to keep the body active and responsive. If it is the council's responsibility as representatives to keep students informed, it is the students' responsibility to see that council members do the job for which they were elected. Only then can the College Council be a representative and meaningful student government.

Letters: Behavior, energy, activism

Forum attitude

To the editor:

I would like to take this opportunity to condemn the behavior of Prof. Gary Jacobsohn at the open forum held Wednesday night. In response to a statement made by Dave Forrester about what he considered the administration's fascist tendencies, Jacobsohn was malicious and abusive. His attitude reinforced the opinion that Faculty and Administration view their relationship to the students as paternal, especially when he said: "If it were in my power, I'd like to wash his (Forrester's) mouth out with soap." Such personal attacks serve no end but to foster student-faculty antipathy. Dave Forrester should be praised for the restraint he exhibited under duress. I am now convinced that it is imperative for the students of Williams College to demand an active role in tenure decisions— to insure that the Gary Jacobsohns are eliminated.

Tom Davis '79

Credit due

To the editor:

I am pleased that issues confronting the Committee on the Campus Environment have been followed by the Record. Notice that I did not say "carefully followed," for that would not be true. The "Byron Kelly" of whom you speak in the article, "Environmental Committee Discusses Heat Monitoring," (March 8) is an entity of your own carelessness. This misspelling was even pointed out in a letter to the editor February 15 of this year, by the author, Byrne Kelly.

To make matters worse, it was reported that both Byrne and I had been involved in some "independent research" last year which had come up with a few heat monitoring ideas. It doesn't bother me so much that Byrne be credited for a year at Williams in which he was never enrolled, or for research in which he was not involved; but it does bother me when I think of people who have spent time and energy on this project and who were never contacted. If I had been called, I would have exclaimed that many of the finest contributions to this project have come from the mind of Emile Oullette who works in Bronfman Science Center. I can safely say that without his counsel the Committee on the Campus Environment would never have received the ideas it did for monitoring steam distribution. So three cheers for Byron whose absence reminded me of someone who had really been forgotten.

Now I've worked myself up. One last comment concerning the same article. Neil Grabois, when questioned about the introduction of an energy incentive program, was quoted as describing the idea, "not easy to do in the first place, and not wise to do in the second place." The word wisdom, for me, has always connoted a certain strength and scope of perception. I often wonder what it means to other people when they use it in every day language. To get to the point, I wonder what Neil Grabois meant by the use of "not wise" when evaluating an incentive program in which he never asked what we thought it could do. He never asked how much energy the plan might conserve (about 30,000,000,000 BTU), how much money it might save (about $100,000), or indeed its claim as an educational tool.

There's the limit to my harangue. I have a suspicion that either I've directed my comments to another misquoted statement, or I'm bound to be in turn reprimanded for understatement.

Reed Zars '77

Priorities

To the editor:

What with open oppression in South Africa, repression of Iranian students in the U.S., murder in Uganda, biological warfare experiments on an unsuspecting public in America, world hunger and starvation, etc. etc., I was reassured to read the Williams Record of March 4.

The "passive" students of the '70's are concerned! They list as a priority problem—food quality on campus, and will actually organize and protest the fact they are receiving .6 oz. of ham in a sandwich instead of 1¾ oz!

CEP in review: Part III

by Chip Buckner

"Because 30 to 40 per cent of Williams students graduate with honors, the program is no longer designed for the exceptional student," said the 1969-1970 Committee on Educational Policy report. On the one hand, honors is an educational activity for those motivated to more, concentrated work, and a "system of rewards" on the other. A majority of the CEP decided that these should be offered separately; there should be a way for all students to pursue a field in depth, and academic excellence should not be tied to it.

The prevailing attitude against the honors degree, reported the Committee in 1974, was a suspicion that the small honors seminars provided a superior education that the non-honors candidates taking larger classes subsidized. Another concern voiced by opponents was that the candidates also received subsidized grades as well, since professors were reluctant to give low grades to their honor students. As a result of their study, the CEP decided to revamp the honors program.

The revised major programs (CEP in Review: Part II) would provide for the in-depth study requirement. The committee explored several options for the demonstration of excellence.

A "degree with honors is redundant," ran the report. It simply restates the thesis or specialization grade. A much more egalitarian system would be a senior seminar in which each major would participate, and the abolishment of the honors program.

The CEP realized, however, that this might not be popular with students or faculty, so they provided an alternate plan. It recommended departmental options, to be previewed and periodically reviewed by the CEP to guarantee a college-wide standard. The major innovation was to require three courses in the honors sequence and to allow the department to decide after the second course what students will be premitted to continue in the program.

The faculty did not pass either the motion to abolish honors, or to revise it in this way, instead substituting what then CEP Chairman William Gates termed "our motion in a clearer language." The new honors program goes into effect this year for the class of 1978.

New honors program

1) Departments and programs offering majors will assume responsibility for stating criteria and procedures for both candidacy and the award of the treatment of students throughout the campus, all departments and programs offering a major will offer at least one pattern of studies for the degree with Honors.

2) Such patterns of study will consist of three clearly related courses (thesis, independent study seminars, regular courses) chosen according to the following guidelines.

a) If the pattern of study falls wholly within the major, either a thesis must be written or one of the courses must be specifically designed to coordinate that pattern. At least one of the three related courses must be taken in addition to the number normally required for the major. At the discretion of the department or program, one of the three may be a Winter Study Project and another may be substituted for a course included in the regular major. (For a nine course major this would mean a minimum of ten courses plus a Winter Study Project.

b) If the patterns of study is an interdisciplinary one involving work outside the major, two courses offered by other departments or programs will be included in the three course honors requirement. The third course will be an independent study or a Winter Study Project or a course specifically designed to explore the interdisciplinary topic. All such courses must be taken in addition to the number normally required for the major. (For a nine courses major this would mean a minimum of eleven courses plus a Winter Study Project).

3) After the student has completed the first two of these three courses, the department or program will examine the student's achievement and determine whether the student is admitted to honors candidacy.

4) Programs and departments not presently offering majors may develop similar criteria for an honors offering.

5) It will be the responsibility of the CEP to assure equivalence among these honors offerings through initial and continuing consultation with individual departments and programs.

6) Departments and programs will develop their criteria, procedures, and patterns of study in time for preliminary discussion and review with the CEP in March, 1975. To be certain that individual proposals conform to the spirit of his motion the CEP will submit those proposals to the Faculty by the May, 1975, meeting for consideration and appropriate action. The new Degree with Honors Program will come into effect in the academic year 1976-77 for the class graduating in 1978.

'Presently Untitled' emerges with enthusiasm

by Thomas Herwitz

There was a new play in town last weekend in the cramped auditorium in Jesup Hall; not only was it brand new, but it was also entirely student conceived and written—by Martha Williamson and Marc Lichtman. Not that that fact need be a qualifier, but rather that itself is an impressive accomplishment. The play—as a whole—did not have the student-amateurish feeling that is perhaps the greatest pitfall of works of its kind. The enthusiasm, the interspersed wit, and the wonderfully pleasant music carried the musical over the rough seas of its creative emergence.

Presently Untitled . . ., as the play is called, is a rather scathing look at the art world of "avant-garde" New York and its galleries and social surroundings—indeed the "business of art" as certain elements of our culture now see it. In a comic manner it mocks the gross hypocrisy and pretense of that art society. One immediate problem is the tired and already sapped field of modern art jokes which the play at times unfortunately falls back to.

Certainly there were the rough spots—the slow, lengthy scene between the opening number and the first song; the cold ending which leaves everything hanging; the inaudible lyrics in a number of songs; and, at times, some corny, standard musical fare in jokes and actions. But there were at the same time some magnificent ideas and moments—full of humor and laden with enthusiasm and originality—and these parts made the whole enjoyable and very worthwhile. The "Ode to Jacques Porte" brings to a climax the underlying allusions to religion, the artist as messiah, and the godliness of those who can interpret the mysteries of modern art (a nice allusion with references scattered throughout the first act). The number itself is a funny mocking of a choral reading, singing praise to the new "Messiah". The plays structure was quite good; and a number of the references and many of the lines themselves were extremely funny and rather ingenious as well.

Marc Lichtman's music was a high-point of the play indeed. Lichtman has demonstrated his ability for writing highly appealing music before, and this group of songs was no exception. His favorite form is presenting individually a number of harmonic lines and then tying them together to end the song in a duo or trio. This works quite well for the music though at times the lyrics become garbled. His music parodies and captures the essence of certain musical styles—as witnessed in the "Ode", "Come Back to Greenwich", and "Doing a Little Business with Friends". He has also written two wonderful love songs in "Waiting for You," and "In Autumn".

Chris Skudder has done a magnificent job in decorating Jesup. His settings, in fact, have shown that Jesup is a useable space for theater. Cramped as it is Skudder extended the stage out into the hall to give a much roomier atmosphere. The small Jesup stage was transformed into an impressive apartment scene. Also notable was the elevator which helped in the transition between scenes.

It is hard to single out actors for performance. The casting was generally quite good—though it is always hard to find a mixture between acting and singing in such a production. David Barnes as a natural, loose actor did a wonderful job with Jake Porter. Some new faces—Dave Studenmund, Liz Varley, Fabienne Marsh among others were quite good and were a welcome change.

It was a new event. It had its problems. But the fact that those could be overcome and the good aspects of the show could shine through, made it an enjoyable evening. Congratulations on the start of a brand new thing.

Margalit dances draw from tradition

by Nina Girvetz

Last Friday and Saturday nights at the AMT, Margalit Oved (or was it some tiny, dark, exotic bird—an ancient spirit—a gazelle?) danced into the center of the stage, stopped, and looked out at all of us. A sly smile broke across her face, and with a piercing whoop and the crash of a gong, she introduced us to her native land, her history and her family. She told us wonderful stories, she sang "like a dove", like a sheep, like her arabic father, like the hot, burning wind of Aden. Her voice was unique and stunning.

Margalit's rhythmic, striking choreography is a special mixture of contemporary dance technique and folk elements drawn from her Middle eastern origins and training. The pieces performed by her excellent company of six dancers were unusual and very exciting.

"Landscape", a dance that evoked a primitive world of struggling animals and harsh desert elements, was intense, gripping, and well executed. The intricate movement bordered on frenzy—all the gestures seemed to capture the very essence of the animal or element being portrayed. Margalit sang the eerie score, accompanying herself on drum and tin can.

"Bessamim—The Beauty Without Shoes", the Eastern counterpart to our Cinderella story, was a funny, colorful dance of wonderful caricatures. The two dreadful, screeching sisters were played with gusto by Lula Washington and Sara Elgart; they shrieked and vibrated into all manner of comical contortions. France Mayote once again stood out as the wide-eyed, charming saintly sister who tried so desperately to set straight the total havoc the other two took so much pleasure in creating. Her almost Flamenco pas de deux with handsome Chris Laabs (the Spanish Prince) was made comical by the ridiculously long train on her white Spanish gown, and by their delightfully expressive faces and bodies. The bright, extravagant costumes and set pieces fulfilled perfectly the needs of the dancers and created a wonderful fairytale atmosphere. The music and motion integrated Spanish, Oriental and Indian flavors with blunt, entertaining, high energy antics.

Margalit returned to the stage by herself, this time to chant a beautiful Hebrew song "Sh'demati" as she beat the floor like a drum. She then took up the large clay drum and began to caress and play it with her fingertips, playing faster and faster until suddenly—another radiant, sly smile, and, as if by magic, a tiny baby drum was born out of the big one! (We decided that this woman is a witch- an imp- a wit.)

Her Adam and Eve story, the last piece on the program, was danced by Margalit herself and Chris Laabs, a really fine dancer with a tremendous flair for dramatic interpretation.

And while these drugs might put you out, they also eliminate crucial "dream sleep" needed to feel fully rested. Here are a few safe alternatives for paper-weary nocturnalists:

Folklore Sleep

The folk suggest "a warm drink before bed" to cure insomnia, and here they have something. Many warm drinks produce a mild state of low blood sugar and have a soothing, somnolent effect.

Sleepiness also results after any sudden input of sugar. On an empty stomach, a Hershey bar will give you an initial spurt of energy. But then the rapid influx of sugar leads the body to over-react in order to balance the content of sugar. It withdraws more sugar from your blood than was consumed and you feel a quick drop in energy.

Cocoa, coffee, and tea of the Salada type will each lower the blood sugar, but because they also have caffeine, the sedative effect is obscured. Those who already have a partial tolerance for caffeine may find that a cup of hot coffee relaxes them because of the blood sugar factor—a paradox that surprises the no-caffeine people.

The solution for caffeine addicts with all nighters ahead is to try high protein foods like peanut butter, nuts, seeds and fruit. That way you'll need alot less coffee, and whatever else you take, to keep the pencil going until sunrise.

Herbal Sleep

Insomniacs who cannot digest warm milk should try herbal tea. Teas made from spray plant, chamomile and lady's slipper root make good relaxants. As for the "lettuce opium," Korean Gingseng leaves, Damiana leaves, and dozens of other herbal "lows" available, suit yourself. Warning: these may alter your consciousness so that sleep is out of the question.

If you are curious about the notorious and illegal cannabis sativa you can go to Alaska, the only state in which it's legal to grow, buy, smoke and give away marijuana—in your own home, that is. At the turn of the century, pot was labelled in U.S. pharmacy texts as a legal tranquilizer. It will still cure your pains and put you to sleep, the only unhealthy side effect being a jail sentence.

Relaxing

After an all nighter, your body's natural time clock has been thrown out of line. A good way to allow your metabolism to redirect itself is to practice muscle relaxation. Many think that mental and physical relaxation are two different things when in fact they are two aspects of the same thing. When you learn the art of relaxation basic to yoga, you will find that your mind floats free of stress as your body lies free of muscle tension.

There are some things that don't always work: ear wax, sleep records, sleep lights, talking, Robert Redford pillows, heated water beds and other sleep gadgetry.

I like saunas (there is one at the Treadway Inn) backrubs, and lullabies. Anything is valid which helps to soothe, and to let you shut off the over-worked machine between your ears. Tell yourself that tonight, tomorrow and all of spring break the sun will rise over your typewriter without you.

Relay '77 totals 3293 miles

by Frank Carr

The sixth edition of the Williams Road Runners 24 Hour Charity Relay produced a countless array of aches, pains and blisters, plus a new record total of 3293 miles. Over 200 runners on 14 teams sped round and round the tartan track as Linda Ronstadt and Earth, Wind and Fire spun continuously round the communal record player. The relay was highlighted by the return of its founder, Peter Farwell '73, who travelled all the way from Illinois to see how his "child" had grown up.

Under Farwell's guidance, the WRRC 10-man contingent amassed 270 miles 1496 yards, the second highest total in the club history. The nine remaining gallant souls, with per-mile average in parentheses, are: Chris Flavin (5:27.5), Paul Skudder '75 (5:44.0), Scott Lutrey '75 (5:06.4), Tim Pritchard (5:19.3), Joe Kolb (5:14.7), Frank Carr (5:20.4), Steve Polasky (5:19.4), Mike Behrman (5:13.4) and Gary James (5:11.0). The ten-member Road Runners team was not actually finalized, and the decision to "Go For It" was not made until after the relay had started. "It" meaning the 24 Hour Relay World Indoor Record. The record distance of 278 miles was set in March of 1974 by the same "informal group of long distance runners" who were trying to break it on Saturday (and Sunday).

The WRRC opened up the event with a blazing pace as Lutrey, Kolb and Carr averaged 4:59.5, 5:00 and 5:01 respectively for the first ten miles. During this period, Lutrey tied with Farwell at 4:49 for the "Tom Cleaver Idiot Award", given annually to the individual who, being of sound body and mind, runs the fastest mile in the opening hours. After eight hours, the squad was right on the world record pace but wisely decided to "bag it" when James dropped out with chest pains after 12 miles and Skudder took his own sabbatical following his 18th tour around the fieldhouse.

Peter "Deacon" Farwell ushered in the second half of the day long event with a Piel's Real Draft and plotted how to survive through his next 17 individual miles. The eight WRRC'ers did survive until 10:00 a.m., but not without the help of generous supplies of Gatorade, Atomic Balm, skin lube, band aids and hot showers. The team averaged 5:18.9 per mile, with the "Aching Octet" running 30 miles apiece. The runner with the fastest 30th mile was given the Peter Farwell "What Me Tired?" Award, and this year the award was taken back to Northbrook, Illinois after the Deacon himself managed to run a 4:47 last mile.

All relay pledges must be picked up by solicitors and returned to the Phys. Ed. Office by Friday, March 18.

The WRRC Relay is not just a long and grueling race on the track, but a special event in the Williamstown area. The hundreds of non-track runners who participate are not trying for records but for pledge dollars, and this is the most important part of the event. The other 13 teams who added to the record mileage (and hopefully pledge dollars) of Relay '77 are: the County Harriers (265m.), C-Weeds (245.5m.), the Dapsangs (242m.), Mt. Greylock High School Boys (242m.), Williams-Sage (240m.), Tyler-Garwood-Dodd (239.5m.), Armstrong-Pratt (233m.), Spencer House (229m.), Greylock Rigor Mortises (229m.), Faculty Veterans (220m.), Coyotes (220m.), Mt. Greylock H.S. Girls (211m), and the Striders of the Purple Valley (207m).

Other highlights of the relay were a guest mile by the Pipe Band, excellent tunes by the Jazz Band, including "Happy Birthday" for Joe Kolb during his 15th mile, Peter Wells' "American Walkabout", Buster Keaton in "The General", plus a mad streaker whose quickness has earned him a bid on the WRRC team in 1978.

Women skiers win fifth in nationals

Williams' women skiers accomplished the seeming unbelievable this weekend in taking fifth place in the first AIAW National Women's Collegiate Ski Championship with only half a team competing. The five ski team members who qualified for the competition travelled to Stowe, Vermont last Thursday hoping to turn in their best individual performances at the national meet, while attempting to score toward a team standing with a half team handicap.

The meet began with a one-run very technical giant slalom on Stowe's Clip Trail. Martha Epstein took fifth place behind winner Toril Forland, an olympic bronze medalist from the University of Utah. Corrie Johnson took 35th place in the 81 woman field scoring 23 points for Williams.

The 7.5 kilometer cross country race was held in 55 degree weather on a demanding, hilly trail at the Trapp Family Lodge. Middlebury skiers took first, second, fourth, and fifth place, while Dartmouth captured third, sixth, and seventh. Williams was fourth place overall with Rachel Potter in 12th, Anne Waters in 17th, and Ellen Toll in 30th in the 65 woman field. The end of the first day of competition found Williams in fifth place, only 2 points out of fourth.

Saturday's slalom race at Little Spruce was again won by Forland of Utah. Epstein placed 16th and Johnson 41st to grab 52 points for Williams.

The final event of the Nationals was a 4x5 kilometer relay race at Trapps, the first important intercollegiate relay ever held. The race was a 14 minute sprint with a difficult downhill section which caused many falls early in the race. Williams found itself in 8th place after 3 events with three excellent cross country skiers and alpine skier Marty Epstein on its relay team. With fifteen official teams entered, Rachel Potter went out fast from the mass start into second place, finishing the lap in third. Next for Williams was Ellen Toll who was passed by US ski team member Pam Ritchet, handing off 4th place to Anne Waters. Waters regained third place for Williams, turning in one of the fastest lap times of the day. Epstein skied the fourth leg, managing to hang on for seventh place finish in only her second time on cross country skis. Williams beat UNH and New Mexico by sufficient point to take fifth place after the four events were totalled.

Middlebury College would have won the meet but was unable to score team points due to a flap with the AIAW. Dartmouth won turning in its best performance of the year for 448 points. The University of Utah had 416, UVM 352, UMaine 324 and Williams 295 for fifth place.

Senate confirms Jorling appointment; prof takes reins of major EPA division

by Nancy Richman

Thomas C. Jorling, Director of the Center for Environmental Studies at Williams and Associate Professor of Environmental Studies, has been named to a top position in the Environmental Protection Agency. Jorling will head one of the five major divisions of the EPA as Assistant Administrator for Water and Hazardous Materials.

Jorling's Senate confirmation and swearing in is expected to take place within five weeks. After finishing the semester at Williams, he will be on leave of absence from the College.

Jorling was one of the four finalists for the position of Head Administrator. Doug Costle was appointed however, two months ago.

As head of the Office of Water and Hazardous materials, Jorling's responsibilities will involve such highly visible issues as water pollution controls, regulation of industrial waste, and the development of new types of treatment plants. Jorling's agency will also have to deal with such timely problems as oil spills, water shortages, dam building and flood control. "There are very few issues that this arm of the Agency deals with that aren't controversial," Jorling observes.

Jorling explained that he decided to accept the position because he "had been responsible for much of the recent legislation with regard to environmental issues" and wanted the opportunity to be able to oversee its implementation.

Jorling sees his department's principal challenge as a reeducation of the American people toward human waste. "In Western societies, there is a repulsion toward human waste that impedes an increasingly necessary view of it as a resource," Jorling says.

Jorling says his agency must examine alternatives for treatment plants, find new ways of recapturing nutrients in the effluent, and work on ways to recycle these nutrients into the land. Jorling pointed out that Muskegan County in Michigan has implemented such a program and has not only solved its waste disposal problems, but has also made money from the increased agricultural production that the reclaimed waste products have made possible.

Jorling will be in a position to influence the largest public works project in the country now, Waste Water Construction Grant Program. His office is in charge of improving the management of the $4.5 billion that goes into the project and directing the way in which the money is spent.

Jorling feels optimistic that the EPA will become a more active agency under the direction of the Carter administration. He observed that "every instance that I have seen in the last several months in dealing with government officials indicates that they and the President are very sincere about support for environmental protection and dedicated to different ways of conceiving of problems and solutions."

Jorling holds both an advanced degree in Ecology and a law degree and has used his combined degrees several times before in Washington, D.C. From 1969-72, he served as the Minority Counsel for the Committee on Public Works in the Senate. That committee was responsible for most of the laws under which the EPA now works. For a year before that, he was the Assistant General Counsel for the Smithsonian Institute and from 1966-68, he was the Attorney-Advisor for the Solicitor's office of the Department of the Interior. Jorling, 35 has been at Williams since 1972.

Jorling participated in the institution of a special program and Center for Environmental Studies at Williams. Under his direction, the center has grown to include three major facilities: the Environmental Analysis Laboratory which permits a full range of chemical and physical analyses of water, soil and biological material; the Environmental Documents Library: and a 1600 acre woodland, the Hopkins Memorial Forest, which is a living resource for a wide variety of projects at Williams.

Henry Art, Assistant Director of Research at the center, will assume Jorling's responsibilities at the center next year.

'Honest' inclusion satisfies 80% of '80

by Keron Walker

According to Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, four-fifths of the freshman class received their first or second choices in the upper class housing inclusion process completed during spring break; 11.6 per cent were placed in their fourth or fifth choices.

Over 60 per cent of the freshman class, 304 people, listed one housing category, the Berkshire Quad, as their last choice for housing in the next three years.

"When over half the class chose one group of the five as their last choice, it was inevitable that some were placed there," Roosenraad said. "I think that this year's process was successful, and there have also been positive reactions from the CUL and the Housing Committee," he added.

"It's difficult to compare this lottery with those of previous years," Roosenraad continued. Last year, no one received his fourth choice in housing and only 5.4 per cent received their third choice. "This year was not less satisfactory, it was merely more honest." Roosenraad went on to say that the four categories used in previous years obscured the choices and prevented applicants from clearly stating their preferences.

"In this particular lottery, we rated success by the number of people who received their first, second or third choice," Roosenraad said. More than 88 per cent of the applicants met this criterion.

Nine freshmen, in three groups, applied to the Berkshire Quad as their first choice. Of the 28 who this year received their last choice in housing, all (5.7 per cent) were relegated to the Berkshire Quad. Of the 29 (5.9 per cent) who received their fourth choice, nineteen drew either Fitch or Prospect.

Roosenraad expressed concern that physical distinctions like these were the only criteria considered by freshmen. "The atmosphere of a house is determined by its social functions and the people who live there," he said. He added that both he and the CUL were not willing to place as great an emphasis on physical plant as freshmen appeared to, and that both he and the committee were concerned rather with upper class satisfaction in "unpopular" houses.

"The number of transfers out of, say, Fitch is analogous to the number of transfer requests out of the Greylock Quad," Roosenraad said, adding that this number is "significantly lower than the number of those to leave Mission Park." Several students who have been placed in the Berkshire Quad against their wishes have since expressed surprised satisfaction with their housing situation, Roosenraad noted.

Roosenraad recognized several trends in this year's inclusion process. First choice applications to Row Houses were fewer than last year, presumably because Dodd and Tyler, which offer Row-House like accommodations, were separated from Fitch and Prospect. Fewer groups of more than four applied to Mission than in previous years. Roosenraad also noted that the popularity of Mission Park has steadily increased from year to year.

Roosenraad said also that those small groups which wished to arrange swaps in order to increase satisfaction "without affecting the general principle of diversity" should see him as soon as possible.

Major exercise revised

The Committee on Educational Policy will recommend that the senior major exercise be made optional at the faculty meeting Wednesday. The move came after the faculty voted 47-37 to make the exercise optional "de jure" rather than optional "de facto." The committee will work on the precise wording of a resolution at its meeting Monday.

Despite the apparent mandate, committee members are not sure that their resolution will pass.

The CEP noted discrepancies between the various departments and resolved that it should do something. Some departments offered comprehensive examinations, while other required no extra work. When it looked at the faculty legislation, however, it could not decide what they had originally intended. Rather than make an arbitrary interpretation, it consulted the faculty.

According to the Gates Report, the major exercise has been the subject of "widespread dissatisfaction" for at least the last ten years. Under the late-William B. Gates' chairmanship the committee sought first to prohibit and then to make optional the major exercise.

Fuel budget stays intact

"At this point, unless we have some unfortunate weather, we should be able to come in within our operating budget," said Director of Physical Plant Peter Welanetz about heating costs at Williams.

"We have had a considerably more severe winter," Welanetz stated. He noted that this winter had been 12 per cent colder than last, with a 514 degree-day difference. He remarked that unusually warm days last month were too short to have affected the overall trend.

Fuel consumption this year increased less than 2 per cent, however, from 968,951 gallons to 987,415 gallons, even though the previous winter had been slightly warmer than average. Welanetz cited a variety of energy conservation measures accounting for the lower consumption. Overall costs of heating went up this winter as the price of fuel oil went from 27.8c to 33.5c per gallon. The increase had been expected and budgeted for, Welanetz said.

"I don't think any serious ideas about energy conservation should be overlooked," stated Welanetz. But, he cautioned, "we have to be pretty careful how we approach energy conservation measures," as hasty mistakes would be expensive. He noted that his department has implemented most of the "obvious" conservation measures, and further steps will require capital outlay.

Kelly, Lissack win council posts

by Ray DeMeo

The College Council elected Wednesday night, Junior Harry Kelly as Treasurer and Freshman Mike Lissack as Secretary for the 1977-78 school year. Representatives also discussed entertainment alternatives for Spring weekend, including the possibility of an ACEC-organized Spring concert.

Harry Kelly replaces Clarence Otis as Treasurer after defeating Charles Sanders for the post in a Council election. Mike Lissack, running unopposed, received the Council's unanimous approval as Secretary. The Elections Committee recommended Kelly, Lissack and Sanders after interviewing and reviewing the applications of several prospective candidates for both offices.

The Council devoted a large segment of Wednesday night's meeting to the question of Spring weekend entertainment. ACEC Chairman Jim Bowe explained that a Spring concert featuring a "major band" would require a minimum allocation of $2,500 from the treasury. While many representatives were enthusiastic with the idea of a major Spring Concert, Treasurer Clarence Otis noted that since only $3,200 remains in the treasury, and since certain groups have allocations still forthcoming, Bowe's request of $2,500 was "stretching it a little." The Council defeated a motion by Don Toumey to grant the desired amount to the ACEC.

Members considered alternatives to a major concert. Jeff Verney suggested that the ACEC and WHEW might combine forces to schedule a dance concert featuring a major band. WHEW is already funded to provide Spring weekend entertainment on a smaller scale. The Council then accepted a motion from Andy Goodell, calling for the ACEC and WHEW to meet jointly with the Finance Committee next week, and for the two groups to arrive with "concrete proposals" at the Council's next meeting.

In discussion of ACEC financing, Goodell criticized the "slowness" with which the committee provided its budgeting figures. Conceding this point, Bowe pointed to a "lack of coordination" in the college regarding the organization of entertainment, and suggested the possibility of creating a paid "ombudsman" to oversee financial proceedings. Council President Tom Herwitz supported this idea, and pointed to the need of establishing an ACEC business manager.

In other debate Wednesday night, representatives accepted a motion from Cliff Mitchell calling for Director of Food Services Ross Keller to "open his books" to the College Council. Mitchell accused Keller of "working entirely in the dark" in his budgeting procedures. He was prompted to his criticism by Don Toumey's report that Keller had denied the Food Service Committee access to specific food budget data for residential houses.

Tom Herwitz announced that self-nominations for the Finance Committee will remain open until noon on Monday, April 11. The Council will elect new committee members at its meeting on Wednesday, to be held in Room C of Greylock.

A Cry for Reform

Now that the flurry of political activity preceding spring break has given way to concern over impending school work and maintaining suntans, it is possible to put these events into perspective.

So far, the political history of 1977 here features student outrage over a CAP tenure decision; the defeat of a CC constitution referendum; the secession of Gladden House from the council; a swollen list of candidates for CC president with campaign mottos ranging from "reform" to "revolt" to "who cares?"; and a forum seeking a new form of student government.

Although the political atmosphere on campus has returned to normal, the events of the last three months spell out a general dissatisfaction with student government at Williams. Some important lessons emerged from this episode that new CC officers and committee members should consider as they settle into their positions.

(1) No student consensus exists on the form and function of student government. Gladden House's search for one alternative system that represents the entire student body is doomed to failure, for the student body encompasses a vast range of attitudes.

(2) The problem reformers should address is not how representatives are selected, rather how delegates perceive and carry out their functions. Gladden House complained that members of the CC did not represent the students yet no new selection process or structure guarantees improvement. Reformers would be more productive by putting pressure on the current system rather than looking for a new system.

(3) Students are finally becoming aware that student-faculty committees hold more power than the College Council. The committees have the authorization to make the major changes. The council plays the important role of linking these committees to the student body. A key to improving the council is strengthening the links between the committees, the council and the students.

(4) Dissatisfaction seems to stem from students' lack of information about what is going on in the government here. Students complain that they don't find out about a process until it is too late. Both the students and the council are to blame for the sense of powerlessness that results. Students need to take greater initiative in understanding the procedures that Williams uses; council representatives and committeemembers must share their knowledge with constituents. Raising student awareness is a prerequisite for expanding student power.

The results of the presidential election reflect the prevailing mood on campus. By electing Tom Herwitz, students have rejected revolution and accepted reform from within. Hopefully, this call for reform will not be forgotten as the events of early 1977 fade from memory.

What Price Division 1?

"No coach, no owner, no general manager can control his destiny in the pros. If you like being a puppet, great. Not me. If I am going to be blamed for a decision, I want it to be my decision."

—Ned Harkness, in Sports Illustrated, 2-7-77

It was his decision and he was blamed for it, but the real loser may well turn out to be the Union hockey program that he worked so hard to establish.

Three weeks ago, as Williams students packed their bags for spring vacation, Union hockey coach Ned Harkness received a vacation of sorts himself. Acting upon a letter received from Williams President John Chandler detailing an alledged recruiting violation by Harkness, Union President Thomas N. Bonner slapped the high powered 58 year old coach with a two week suspension from his coaching duties.

The suspension further compounded an already volatile situation in Schenectady and unleashed a flood of newspaper publicity praising Harkness' gung-ho attitude towards winning and criticizing Williams' behavior and the rules of the New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC), to which both Williams and Union belong and whose rules Harkness was found to violate.

Few of the comments reflect a clear understanding of the philosophy behind the NESCAC, however, and most revel in Harkness' success while dismissing his violation as a minor mistake that pales in light of his "miraculous" (Bonner's term) 40-6-1 record at Union. Quite frankly, I find this attitude extremely dismaying.

Last April Harkness visited a Canadian youth at his home for the purpose of explaining the financial aid possibilities that exist at Union. Williams officials learned of the visit the following fall and notified then-Union Athletics Director Tom Kirshner that such visits violated NESCAC recruiting rules. Kirshner approached Harkness about the matter and also notified Bonner. Harkness told both that there was no truth to the allegation that he visited the boy's home.

Two days after Union lost to Merrimack in the finals of the ECAC Division II tournament Bonner received Chandler's letter. Harkness was again questioned and this time admitted both to the violation and to an initial cover-up. Bonner then suspended his coach pending review of the matter with the executive committee of the Union trustees.

"I lied, but I lied to save my hockey program," Harkness told the Albany Times-Union. "I lied to Dr. Bonner, but I lied for a reason. When Dr. Bonner asked me if I had visited the boy in the fall, I told him 'No, I didn't' " But at that time in November this was a hostile campus when it came to Ned Harkness and the Union College hockey team.

"So I weighed all the factors. If I told Dr. Bonner the truth, my entire hockey program would have been ruptured. We would never have gotten our season off the ground. This way they buried me, but they didn't bury my season or my players. It was a calculated risk, and I lost.

"I think the penalty was worse than the crime, but so be it. It was something wrong, but it wasn't murder. I'll pay the price."

In each of his interviews, Harkness continually emphasized his team's success and his desire to enter Division I as soon as possible. You have to make a choice between a winning program and rules that interfere with the success of that program, he seemed to be implying. And he found support in the press.

"I'm a competitor," he would repeat. "I don't want to see the boy go somewhere else when I'm recruiting. Maybe if we'd had a 5-10 season, everyone would have been happy."

"The athletic rules of the NESCAC are as ancient as the cornerstones of their first buildings," wrote the Albany paper.

"The suspension of Ned Harkness represents everything that is hypocritical, self-serving, and petty about college athletics," wrote John Powers in the Boston Globe. The affair constitutes "a crossfire of jealousy and greed that is quite unseemly for a conference—the NESCAC—with such lofty principles."

"Williams spent a year putting this together," Harkness charged.

Nothing could be farther from the truth. The trouble with such criticism is that it views the NESCAC through NCAA glasses. And the two don't always dance to the same tune.

Point 1: Williams was not a tattletale, as Powers implies The NESCAC does not operate like the NCAA regarding rule violations. It does not hire investigators or conduct grand jury extravaganzas. Instead, it works on a system of trust and honor in which league schools are left to police themselves.

If school A obtains information that school B has violated an NESCAC rule, for instance, it then relays that information, even if somewhat heresay, to the athletic department of school B. The athletic director of B then confers with the coaches of the sport under question and reports back to A. If B reports that he found no evidence to support the allegation, then his word is accepted and the matter dropped. If he confirms the allegation, the matter is reported verbally to all NESCAC officials at their annual meeting. Disposition of the violation is left to the offending school, however.

Point 2: Against this background, it is clear that Harkness' real mistake was not his violation of the NESCAC rule but rather his cover-up of that violation. There is evidence that he was unaware of the rule initially. But in lying to his president and athletic director he put them in the unwitting position of seriously misrepresenting the case to fellow NESCAC schools and effectively undermined trust both in them and the conference.

The sad irony of the entire situation is that Harkness achieved the success he so dearly sought, but he may have achieved it at the expense of his hockey program. At the least, a grim shadow hangs over his chances of going Division I.

On the heels of the Harkness suspension however, Union's Director of Admissions resigned his post last week after being suspended following discovery of an "admissions irregularity" reportedly involving a freshman member of the hockey team.

And following the Middlebury-Union hockey game in January, Middlebury President Olin Robison decided to cancel hockey games with Union "for the foreseeable future", citing the "apparent incompatability of philosophies and aims of policies and programs" as the reason for his "uncommon" move.

Late last week the trustee's executive committee lifted Harkness' suspension and recommended that Union pull out of the NESCAC. Many faculty members were reportedly stunned at the committee's statement, which mentioned neither Harkness' suspension nor his lying. A vote on the proposal is due next week.

Letters: Coaches, new CC

Peck on CAP input

To the editor:

I should like to respond to the recent letter by Chris Vogelsang in the March 8 issue of the Williams Record.

Chris's letter is somewhat inaccurate as there are three means by which student input is received into the department. The first is through the informal contacts that students have with "senior staff" which are collected each year at the time that I must write my CAP memo recommending department members for continuing appointments. The second opportunity is through a departmental questionnaire which is handed out to students in physical education classes. The use of this questionnaire, as is the case with the whole faculty, is purely voluntary. A staff member may use the questionnaire and may share the results with the department chairman if the staff member so chooses. The third method which was instituted this year is a method by which the department chairman interviews selected students. This past fall I interviewed twenty-two (22) students in connection with three staff members whose contracts were to be renewed or who had the possibility for promotion. I believe this was a thorough process as regards these particular staff persons. The method was found to be very helpful to the department chairman in making more definitive judgements about staff persons.

Sincerely yours,
Robert R. Peck

Kelly supports CC

To the editor:

After three weeks of difficult and divisive campaigning, Tom Herwitz has won a resounding victory as president. He faces immediately two enormous challenges: first, convincing the administration of the need for serious reform and second, convincing the student body of the need for unity and perseverance in the students' rights movement here. It is not going to be easy, this confrontation with the powers that be, and Tom will require the support of us all to face the challenges ahead.

We presently are divided into a number of antagonistic groups: those who want to reform the council as their immediate goal, those who want to radicalize the campus root-and-branch, those who seek profound but more modest change, and finally, those who don't care. The nature of people makes it hard to unite quickly after hard opposition, but the facts are that egotism in the form of non-cooperation is unproductive and unfair, especially to Tom, who has worked hard for his victory. He won fair and square and deserves our support. None of us will ever be completely satisfied, but the rules of the game demand that we give him our support nonetheless. Our movement may fade like so many here before, but if we forget our differences and support Tom with our advice and action, what we begin this month will not be silenced easily.

I thank those people who supported me; your votes of confidence are an honor I won't ever forget. However, defeat is no excuse for disappointment and withdrawal. We must be true to our votes to reform, and make the election only a beginning. There are, in the future, great benefits for us all, but only if we cooperate. The administration will only bend when confronted by the anger of 1900 mobilized students. If we honor our commitment made in our vote, then the election's result should only steel our determination. Tom Herwitz has earned our support—let's bury our differences and support with all our strength the man we've elected President.

Good luck, Tom!

ACTWU's 14-year old inst Stevens has become more re desperate.

noral clothing is apparent as on, in the words of one of its ategy memoranda, seeks to dit the Stevens name to the and as the Union appeals to s organizations for support.

ne crusader-union was forced ederal Court recently to pay lion for deliberate destruction ayser-Roth plant in Dayton, ee. It was found guilty in 1974 National Labor Relations NLRB) of refusing to meet the bargaining agent nting its own employees. In her similar case, the Southern ion, acting as the bargaining agent for ACTWU employees denounced the Union's indifference to its dues-paying members' concerns, maintaining that, "The very union which cries out for assistance from the American Catholic Bishops against an employer such as Farah Manufacturing Company has turned to tactics against its own employees which are analogous in every respect to those it accuses Farah of employing." The Clothing and Textile Workers Unions cracked Farah with a consumer boycott in 1974. Now it wants J. P. Stevens.

The available union literature seeks in every way to depict J. P. Stevens as a "Monster Enemy." The summary thereof presented on this page two months ago contained many fallacies and unqualified statements.

The article begins with a moving statement by Boyd Leedon, a former NLRB chairman. Mr. Leedon held his position during the Eisenhower administration. Any remark by him as NLRB chairman would have to be considered somewhat dated, to say the least.

The article proceeds with its indictment by declaring that "J. P. Stevens busts unions, runs unsafe factories, pays substandard wages, and discriminates against black and female employees." Completely unqualified reference is made also to federal convictions of price-fixings, wiretapping of Union organizers, and tax "evasion". The qualified evidence includes the following:

—Whereas there have been 15 NLRB decisions against J. P. Stevens in its history, there have been 18 Labor Board decisions against the Union. Some unions have had, incidentally, more NLRB rulings against them in a year than Stevens has had in its lifetime.

—The February 15 "Viewpoint" stated that, "Cotton dust levels in Stevens plants are three times the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) standard." The available union literature itself cites this as the case in only one of Stevens 85 plants. Not unsensitive to employee safety, Stevens has a major program underway to meet the OSHA requirements for cotton dust control on the required schedule; meanwhile, the Company provides respirators for employees in critical areas. As to noise levels, the problem is industry-wide, and Stevens will continue to supply employees with hearing protection until machinery technology is improved. Of the 41 industries included in National Safety Council evaluations, textiles rank fourth safest in number of lost-time accidents. In lost-time accidents Stevens stands consistently with the leaders of the industry.

—The article printed here maintained that "Stevens wages are 30 per cent below the national average of $4.60 an hour." In fact, they are 13 per cent below at $3.98 an hour.

—Allegations that it is Stevens practice to discriminate against minorities and women seem quite weak when viewed along with the facts: Minorities comprised in 1976 23 per cent of Stevens work force as opposed to 11 per cent of all employees of manufacturing in general, according to Bureau of Labor Statistics; Stevens work force is 42 per cent female, compared with 29 per cent in manufacturing as a whole. It should also be noted that J. P. Stevens, Inc. has contributed to date nearly a quarter of a million dollars to the United Negro College Fund. Its contributions date back to 1955.

—With regard to the 1964 price-fixing conviction involving one Stevens employee and employees of a number of other companies making industrial fiberglass products, the government attorney handling the case stated in court that Stevens senior management did not have knowledge of and had not approved the actions of the employee involved. With regard to the 1973 wiretapping case involving two Stevens employees indicted for the bugging of a union organizer's motel room, the U.S. prosecuting attorneys neither alleged nor implied that the company had responsibility for it. The company maintains in a statement to its stockholders that it "did not know about the incident prior to its occurrence, did not authorize or approve it, and does not condone conduct of that kind." Finally, with regard to the charge of tax evasion, investigation beyond Union literature shows that J. P. Stevens has never been accused of willful intent to avoid the payment of taxes.

Thus, as with most stories of UFO's, phantoms, and creatures of the dismal swamplands of the Carolinas, the ACTWU tales about its new Monster Enemy need to be scrutinized carefully and viewed in their own context, and in consideration of ACTWU's ultimate power-centered goals. Though Williams students are usually held to be liberal-minded, we must not allow ourselves to be regarded as naive and vulnerable to pure propaganda from any side of an argument. The February 15 article calling for help in the boycott of J. P. Stevens products appeals to our naivete. Taking a moment to look at the facts as they actually stand in context, one sees that J. P. Stevens' record is not lily-white but is not out of line with that of the average "Fortune 500" corporation, which can hardly produce anything without opening itself to some sort of criticism.

'Minorities comprised in 1976 23 percent of Stevens work-force as opposed to 11 percent of all employees in manufacturing in general.'

A boycott of J. P. Stevens products, for the advancement of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union—itself out of tune with a "humane, civilized approach" to industrial and employee relations—is not justifiable.

Viewpoint: When will it all end?

Black basketball

by Tony Cornett

Recently, both of Williams College's basketball teams ended their seasons. As has been the case in all but one of the past five seasons, the season ended without there being a black athlete on the varsity basketball team. Why? If I were a white racist I would say that the black athletes here at Williams are not capable of playing, but are still trying to participate in the basketball program. The general consensus of the cross-section of people I have spoken with is that black athletes here at Williams who have tried, unsuccessfully, to play basketball in the program have been good enough and would have played if circumstances were different (e.g. had they not been black).

This feeling is contrary to the belief of the Williams College basketball system. Their belief, as shown through their selection of players and recruiting process, is that black athletes here are not capable of playing, but should be allowed to participate in the program anyway (i.e. pick up warmups at half-time, exist as practice personnel, and cheer for an inferior white player on the floor).

As a concerned black athlete who became tired of participating in the Williams College basketball system, I can say that being black does influence one's status in the system. Being black means that one's mistakes are weighed more heavily than those of white teammates. Two of the most stressed components in the Williams College basketball system are team unity and team contribution. I must say, it is very difficult to contribute when being scolded by a teammate is condoned by the system.

As one can see, there is a mainstream of hypocrisy within the system which originates at the top. It is very difficult for a coach to emphasize unity among team members while allowing a man's color to determine the extent of playing time he receives. It is obvious that this hypocritical practice of the Williams College basketball system must be stopped. If these racist policies are allowed to continue, pressure to change them must be exerted on the system. If the urgings of those concerned are ignored by certain individuals in the system, they should be removed from their positions. Hopefully, the revamped program will allow those with the talent and desire to play varsity basketball a fair chance.

Career discoveries program spends break in Boston

"These trips are an attempt to add a new dimension to our Career Discoveries program," stated Office of Career Counseling Director Mary Margaret Sloane in describing the latest of the job hunting field trips sponsored by her office. For several days during spring break twelve Williams students plied the streets of Boston visiting corporations and agencies involved in urban planning and environmental affairs.

According to Sloane, the Boston trip, and an earlier field trip to Hartford which examined opportunities in business, were made possible largely through the efforts of alumni. She cited Halley Moriyama '70, a senior planner at Environmental Research and Technology (ERT), as being instrumental in organizing the Boston trip.

The corporations and agencies visited by students in Boston included ERT, Harbridge House, Boston Edison, Office of State Planning, Metropolitan Area Planning Council, Boston Redevelopment Authority and Nature Conservancy.

One student remarked that while the trip did not provide a ticket to job opportunities it was highly useful in provoking ideas and in getting advice on how to go about getting a job in planning. Another student stated, "We found out that it's important to

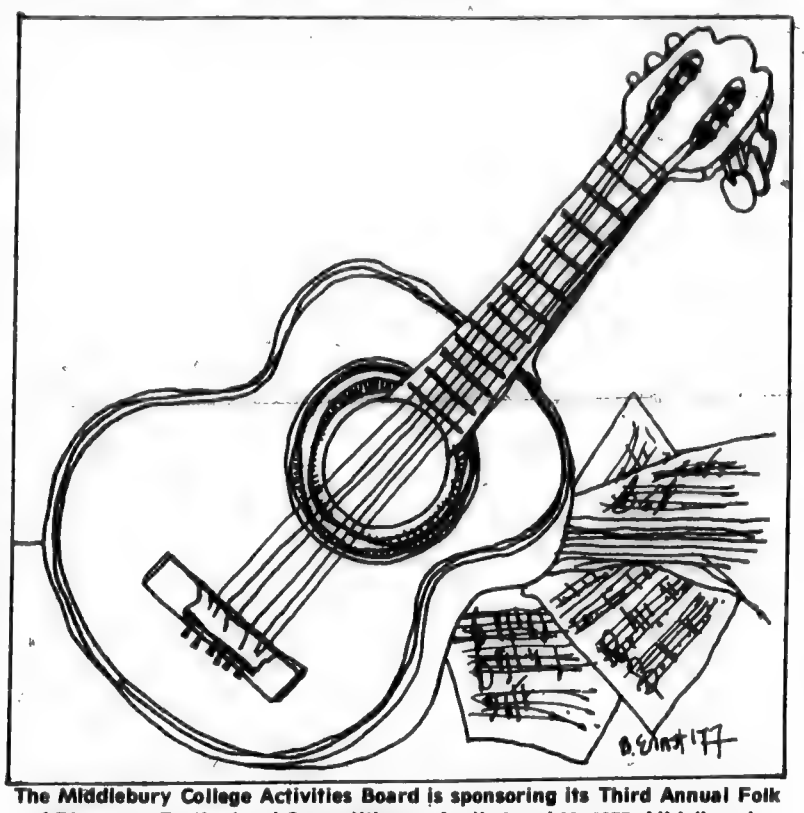
Zen, surreal photos comprise exhibit

An exhibition of the photographs of Ralph Eugene Meatyard opened at the Williams College Museum of Art Monday, April 4. The exhibit will remain on view through April 25.

Spanning the years 1956-68, the 35 photographs chosen for the show figure primarily from Meatyard's work with Surreal and Zen images. The prints in the exhibition were developed by the photographer's son Christopher, from his father's negatives. The Meatyard family was also involved in the selection of the images for the show and the information for the catalogue which accompanies the exhibition.

Meatyard, who died in 1972, was an established member of the contemporary photographic world. His work is represented in many major photographic collections in America, including the International Museum of Photography at George Eastman House, the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, and the Metropolitan Museum of Art. The photographer was a student at Williams in 1943 as a member of the Navy's V-12 program.

The exhibition and catalogue were prepared by Susan D. Peters, a student in the graduate program in the History of Art at Williams College and the Clark Art Institute.



Clark displays exhibit of fruit and flower arrangements

An exhibition of decorative flower and fruit arrangements has just opened at the Clark Art Institute. Consisting of forty-one prints, drawings, and watercolors, the colorful display demonstrates the fascination creative people have felt for fruit and flowers from the seventeenth century to the modern period. Artists of many nationalities are represented: English, French, German, Japanese, Austrian, Dutch, Czechoslovakian, and American. A wide range of flowers is illustrated, including camillias, mums, dahlias, oleander, tulips, and roses, most of which are displayed in bouquets. Of particular interest are an arrangement of South African flowers, a contemporary Japanese engraving of wild flowers, and a pair of hand-colored mezzotints of two of Jan van Huysum's exactingly detailed paintings, one a flower piece, the other a fruit piece.

This exhibition of fruit and flower representations is being circulated by the Hunt Institute for Botanical Documentation of the Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh and will be on view at the Clark Art Institute through April 24.

This watercolor by Pierre Francois Le Grand (French, late 18th century) is on view at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute with the exhibition "Decorative Flower and Fruit Arrangements," circulated by The Hunt Institute for Botanical Documentation, Carnegie-Mellon University, Pittsburgh.

The Middlebury College Activities Board is sponsoring its Third Annual Folk and Bluegrass Festival and Competition on April 29 and 30, 1977. All folk and-or bluegrass musicians are welcome. The contest will be limited to the first 35 performers to apply. There will be $600 in prizes awarded.

Brooke named to head Clark

David S. Brooke, Director of the Currier Gallery of Art in Manchester, New Hampshire, has been appointed Director of the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute. Talcott M. Banks, President of the Institute's Board of Trustees, said the appointment will be effective September 1. Brooke succeeds George Heard Hamilton who will retire June 30.

In commenting on Brooke's appointment, Banks said, "Shortly after Hamilton announced his intention to retire more than a year ago, the Institute's Trustees began a search for his successor that extended throughout the United States and abroad.

"We are delighted with David Brook's appointment," Banks continued, "and we are confident he is the person best qualified to provide the distinguished leadership required for the Institute's continued development."

Brooke was born in Walton-on-Thames, Surrey, England, and attended the Charterhouse School in England from 1944 to 1949. After serving as a lieutenant in the British Army and a member of the Metropolitan Police of London, he attended Harvard University, where he received his A.B. in Fine Arts magna cum laude in 1958. He was awarded an M.A. from Harvard's Graduate School of Arts and Sciences in 1963.

Brooke took the Fogg Museum Course while working on his master's at Harvard and was the Assistant Curator of the University Loan Department of the Fogg for two years. In 1963 he became the Assistant to the Director of the Smith College Museum of Art, and in 1965 the Curator of the Art Gallery of Ontario. He has been the Director of the Currier Gallery of Art since 1968.

Planetarium show continues

"The People," an astronomy program about American Indian concepts of the sky shown at the Milham Planetarium in the Old Hopkins Observatory will be extended through the end of the college semester due to unprecedented popular demand. The program, which originated in the fall and has been extended twice already, will continue showing Fridays at 7:30 p.m.

"The People" tells of myths and poetry from 16 different Indian nations. Its script was authenticated by a team of Native Americans, anthropologists, and astronomers. The show was developed by the Hansen Planetarium of Salt Lake City under a bicentennial grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The show, free and open to the public, is completely booked on Fridays through April 15. To reserve seats for later in the spring, or to arrange for private group or school showings at other times, call 597-2188.

Photos focus on houses

An exhibition of photographs of recent New England houses is currently on display in the Rotunda of the Williams College Museum of Art. The houses, the oldest of which dates back ten years, were built and designed by architects living in the region.

The 17 houses shown were chosen for the variety of locations, building forms and types, and budgets. Included in the exhibition are photographs of a Cape Cod house that evokes the image of a fleet of sails, a house slung from a pair of towers that rises from the edge of a marsh, and examples of high-density housing clusters.

65 file house transfer applications

Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad told the Housing Committee Monday that 65 students filed house transfer applications. "All but 14 of the applicants listed Dodd-Tyler or Row Houses as their first choice," Roosenraad said.

Roosenraad noted that the committee could grant the first choices of the fourteen applications to the Berkshire Quad, Greylock and Mission Park but that the remainder of the applicants would most likely end up in their fourth or fifth choice housing categories.

Roosenraad told the committee that he had informed the CUL of this expected outcome that afternoon. According to the Dean, the CUL would not permit the Housing Committee to use spaces presently reserved for transfers to the College and exchange students for interhouse transfers. This change would have enabled the committee to grant a greater number of first and second choice transfer requests.

The transfers will be run on the computer this week and the committee will meet again next week to review the outcome.

Philip L. Cantelon, Visiting Lecturer in History and Director, Williams College Oral History Project, has won a Fulbright-Hays Senior Lectureship to teach American history for 10 months in Japan. The award was made by the Board of Foreign Scholarships and the Department of State, and announced by the Council for International Exchange of Scholars.

Under the exchange program, Cantelon will spend from April 1978 to January 1979 lecturing on American history and contemporary American civilization at universities in either Tokyo or on the southern island of Kyushu. He will also consult with Japanese faculty on developing an American studies curriculum.

The Fulbright-Hays awards were established by Congress in 1961 to "increase the mutual understanding between people of the United States and people of other countries" through the exchange of students, researchers, educators and creative artists.

Students receive research grants

Fifteen students under the direction of Henry Art have received a research grant of $28,640 in the field of Interdisciplinary Sciences from National Science Foundation's Undergraduate Research Projects Program.

Under the program, students work directly with faculty members in scientific research. According to the foundation, the primary objective of the program is to provide promising students with firsthand experience in the research process.

contact people, not organizations, regarding jobs. The trip gave us names to contact regarding jobs in Boston planning." He added that the places which were visited provided several different perspectives on issues such as the environment. "At Boston Edison we listened to four power systems engineers blame the EPA for high electricity rates so it wasn't as if we just went and talked to a bunch of Granola freaks."

A third student stated that the trip was most helpful in determining whether or not one was interested in going into a particular field. She noted that it was highly useful to be able to go straight from one organization to the next. "We got an excellent opportunity to compare and contrast jobs in the public and private sectors."

Several students provided more critical comments regarding certain aspects of the field trip. "At a a few places we got really hyped presentations", one student remarked. Another stated, "We were mostly interested in what you could do with a BA and some of the presentations, especially Boston Edison's, were just too technical."

Ephs take seventh in NCAA meet; Wild breaks College records

by Dennis O'Shea

College record performances in five events netted the men's swim team a seventh place in the NCAA Division III Championships held at Oberlin College just before spring break. The natators placed swimmers in the top six in six different events but still finished lower than ever before in the meet's three year history.

The Ephs weren't the only ones to swallow a substantial drop. St. Lawrence University slid to sixth place, only three points above Williams, with essentially the same swimmers that won them the team title last year. Bowdoin, fourth in 1976, fell from the top ten this year.

Division III swimming came of age with impressive team performances by team champion Johns Hopkins University, winners of six individual events, Occidental, who earned all three relay titles, and third place Kenyon College.

"As a team our performances were very good, although it may not be reflected in the place we finally got," said Coach Carl Samuelson. "Those who made it into the top six last year often didn't even make top twelve."

Junior Phil Wild once again spearheaded the Williams effort. He notched a pair of College records with a fourth in the 100 freestyle an event he won at New Englands and a sixth in the 50. Wild also uncorked another incredible series of relay performances, posting the Ephs' top splits on the fourth place 400 medley relay and the fifth place 800 free relay, both College standard smashing quartets, as well as the third place 400 free relay foursome.

Don Cameron led off the medley relay and picked up the squad's top individual event place with a third in the 100 backstroke. Stuart Deans nabbed a tenth in the 1650 and lowered the College 500 freestyle mark for the fifth time in his three year career to score a twelfth place.

Deans also joined Wild, freshman Dave Amlicke and senior co-captain Duff Anderson on an 800 relay that averaged two seconds per swimmer faster than the record quartet of just two years ago.

Junior Guy Hoelzer and soph Peter Howd teamed up with Amlicke and Wild in the 400 free relay, while Hoelzer and Chris Clark swam with Wild and Cameron on the medley.

Amlicke's ninth in the 100 backstroke and junior Paul vom Eigen's tenth in the 200 breaststroke rounded out the Williams scoring.

The Eph laxmen open their home season against Springfield College at 2:00 tomorrow on Cole Field.

Stickmen sport 2-2 record in Florida tourney; lose opener

"We did about as we anticipated, and we're where we should be," reported lacrosse coach Renzie Lamb after the stickmen returned from their spring break junket to the Suncoast Lacrosse Tournament in Tampa, Florida sporting a 2-2 record. The varsity ten returns to the hard realities of Williamstown's infamous Indian Winter tomorrow with a 2 p.m. face off against Springfield College at Cole Field.

"Everybody played well, even in the losses, and nobody got injured," and that's Lamb's idea of a profitable southern jaunt. The Ephs put it to Kenyon, 13-2, and RPI, 13-6, but got put to by St. Lawrence, 20-11, and Air Force, 14-6.

Senior captain Jamie Taylor, an All-New England midfield selection last year, dented the nets seven times and collected three assists over the four game stretch to pace the Purple scoring. Sophomore Peter Thomsen and junior Todd Eckerson, Lamb's top two returning attackmen and last spring's assist specialists, picked up nine and eight points respectively. Eckerson poured in five scores against Kenyon in the top single game effort.

Junior Dick Goodbody and senior Dave Moffitt, rotating into the attack slot left vacant by the graduation of All-New England creaseman Phil Hartigan, provided the trip's most pleasant surprise. The pair appeared in the lineup only spottily last year, but made the most of their new opportunity in Florida, combining for nine goals and five assists.

The Ephmen downed tomorrow's opponents, 18-4, last spring, and the Chiefs lost Ambrose Orlando, their top player and an All-New England selection, but a couple of hot freshman recruits make Springfield something of an unknown quantity.

The laxmen surrendered an early 5-2 lead over C. W. Post, dropped to a 9-5 half-time deficit and finally lost Wednesday's regular season road opener, 15-12.

"We played well offensively, but defensive mistakes cost us the game," said Coach Lamb. "We figured seven or eight of their goals were caused by mental or physical mistakes or failure to pick up a ground ball."

Post had previously lost to Yale by only two goals, and to Harvard by only one, and last year out swam the Ephs, 15-7, through a Cole Field downpour. Todd Eckerson led Williams scoring Wednesday with a pair of goals and four assists, while Peter Thomsen poured in four scores and a feed. Frosh Gus Nuzzolese picked up two and two.

Men's crew takes lead in Penn race

by Wit McKay

The Williams Men's crew swept the second annual Provident Mutual Cup race last Saturday in Philadelphia. After only two weeks of training on the Potomac in Washington, Williams soundly thrashed crews from Villanova and Drexel.

The first race, the varsity heavyweight, opened after a false start involving a collision between the Drexel crew and a U.Penn. boat cruising up the course. On the re-start Villanova took half-a-boat length lead. Under-stroking them by about four or five strokes, at a 30, the Eph heavies stayed with them, then pulled even by the thousand meter mark. Williams took a three-quarter length lead and then held off a Villanova sprint to win by a couple of seats, with the slower Drexel boat over a minute behind.

After picking up his first place medal at the line Gavin Watson went off to replace injured lightweight stroke Ramsey Stabler for his second race of the day. John Farmakis sitting in the three seat of the heavies in place of injured sophomore John Huss also took off to join the Frosh eight for his second race ever.

In the next event, the strong Williams lights took the lead from the start at 31 strokes per minute compared to Villanova's 35. The purple paddlers powered their way to a length and a half victory over the Wildcats at the end of the 2,000 meter course, and once again Drexel was out of contention. Low, long stroking is the key to coach Brian Dawe's unorthodox style of rowing. It proved very successful last Fall, gaining Williams two bronze medals in Boston's Head of the Charles.

The Freshmen raced the last event, and won over Drexel this time, with Villanova further back. The Williams Freshmen also under-stroked their competition, rowing the race at a 31. The crew races today against Holy Cross at Worcester, and then takes on Conn. College a week from Saturday at Pittsfield.

Batmen ready for opener

Coming off the best southern trip ever, the Williams baseball team is ready to face RPI in Troy, Wednesday at 3 pm in the Eph's season opener. The Ephmen went 4-5 against some of the top teams in the South in their two weeks pre-season Florida warm-up.

"This is the best southern trip we've ever had," Coach Jim Briggs said. "And that's in terms of not only win-loss record ability. This is just an excellent ball club."

Top returnees from last year's 9-13 RPI team, hard hit by graduation, are second basemen John Gotschall (.244) shortstop Bill Mansell (.300) and third baseman Neal Carney (.303).

Only two Williams players will man the same positions as they did on last year's 11-5-1 squad, for the best team record in 20 years. Catcher and captain Tom Redden, the only senior on the team, batted .390 last season. Junior second baseman Roger McEniry batted only .237 but committed just one error in providing the Ephs with solid defensive play. Other key returnees are speedy junior Scott Harrington who has been shifted to shortstop this season, and junior Bob LaBombard who batted .400 as a pinch hitter last year. Junior Steve Maier heads a young but potentially overpowering pitching staff.

The Ephs 4 Florida wins are more than have ever been scored by a Williams team on a southern trip. The Ephs defeated Embry Riddle University 9-11 in 11 innings; swamped Hillsdale 10-3; won the first game of a double header against tough St. Leo's 7-6 before dropping the second 12-2; and lost a close one to Florida Southern 2-4 and 3-1, and a tight 0-2 loss to third-ranked team in the South, Stetson University.

Good pitching and a very strong defense were the keys to both the southern success and to Coach Briggs enthusiasm for the coming season. The surprise star of the pre-season game was freshman Rick Walter who batted .355; drove in 9 runs in 9 games, including the winning run in 3 out of 4 wins; hit a 450 yard homerun and 2 doubles and scored 4 runs. "Rick was without question, the outstanding hitter on the Southern trip," said Briggs.

Other bright spots, according to Briggs were juniors LaBombard, who drove in 8 runs; pitcher Maier, and John Friborg who was "sensational in center field."

Women's lacrosse readies

Although they did not join the rest of Williams in sunny Florida, the women's lacrosse squad has been hard at work for three weeks in preparation for Wednesday's scrimmage against Springfield.

Eleven upperclassmen return from last year's squad along with veteran coach Linda Wilkins. Wilkins unsure of Wednesday's line-up, will be counting on last year's all New England standouts Maggie O'Brien, Marcie Holmes, Mary Fish and Marty Taft in goal. Brent McKinley, Vivian Patterson, Priscilla Buckley, Dawn Bedrosian, Sarah Baldwin, Cammie McClellan, and Liz Alton are also returning.

The outcome of Springfield scrimmage may not be indicative of the team's potential as the host astroturf surface will sideline Fish and Holmes, guarding sensitive knees.

Following their Wednesday scrimmage the Ephs will have another week to practice for their season opener against Massachusetts, Thursday, April 21.

Basketball team names Brad Wolk next year's captain

Williams hoopster Brad Wolk has been named captain of next year's varsity basketball team. The 6-5 junior with an 8.7 average this year, is the first solo captain of a Williams squad in three years.

Wolk, in his second season of varsity play went for a high 18 rebounds against WPI and also put together a 26 point, 12 rebound performance against Hamilton and a 10 point, 11 rebound effort in the Eph's overtime loss to Wesleyan in the first round of the ECAC Division II-III tournament.

CAP's open forum discusses role of student opinion

"Clear signals about how students perceive a teacher are taken terribly seriously," said Committee on Appointments and Promotions member John Reichert in an open forum held by the CAP last Thursday. The members of the CAP—President John Chandler, Dean of the Faculty Francis Oakley, Provost Neil Grabois, and Professors Stuart Crampton, Fred Greene, and Reichert discussed with students the role of the CAP in the tenure process, the importance of student opinion, and some common misconceptions about the tenure process.

Oakley noted that the belief that "students make no systematic contribution to the decisions on tenure" is unfounded. Although student contribution is diffuse, Oakley explained, student views are sought out in a formal, systematic manner. Oakley mentioned the cumulative data gathered from the student questionnaire, and the interviews of students by department and program chairmen. He pointed out that departments making recommendations on members up for tenure, are required to submit at the same time information on how student opinion was arrived at. Departments are free to choose the mode, but they have to use some means of gathering student opinion, or else the recommendation is sent back.

Tenure deliberations are confidential, but the details of the process itself are not, said Oakley. This confidentiality, he explained, is necessary in order to make properly informed decisions, and to protect those on whom tenure decisions are made. Putting in writing the reasons for negative decisions might hurt faculty members refused tenure in finding new jobs, he said.

Faculty to fill committee vacancies

The faculty will meet Wednesday to nominate new members to vacancies on the Committee on Appointments and Promotions, and the Steering Committee members will also consider the Committee on Educational Policy's revised legislation making the major exercise optional for graduation.

Professors John Reichert and Stuart Crampton, representing Divisions I and III respectively, will end their CAP terms this year. Reichert has been filling the position of Professor Lawrence Graver, on sabbatical for the 1976-77 school year, while Crampton will be on leave next year. The faculty has nominated six people for each of the two positions. On Wednesday, there will be a runoff ballot where faculty members will vote for one nominee for each post. The three receiving the highest number of votes from each division will comprise a panel from which President Chandler will select one nominee for each vacancy.

As a reaction to discrepancies between the policies of different departments, the CEP recommended to the faculty that the major exercise be made optional. Under the present legislation, the exercise is required for graduation. However, some departments offer examinations to fulfill this prerequisite, while others incorporate it into the senior seminar without demanding extra work. After obtaining the faculty's consent, last Wednesday, the CEP is currently in the process of rewording the legislation in order to establish the optional status of the major exercise. The faculty will vote on the revision on Wednesday.

The faculty will elect three new members of the Steering Committee to replace Professors Irwin Shainman and Raymond Chang, whose terms expire this semester, and Roger Bolton, who will be on leave next year.

Visitors evaluate language program

Two review committees will attempt to evaluate the efficiency, cohesion and place of instruction in Russian and the Romance languages at Williams next Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

The committees, which will consist of professors in related fields at other small liberal arts colleges, will make no attempt to evaluate the quality of teaching at Williams. According to George Pistorius, Chairman of the Department of Romanic languages, the committees will merely put into context the College's language instruction and give the departments involved a sense of how they compare to other schools.

"The evaluation was commissioned by the administration and initiated by both the administration and the language departments. The purpose of the study is to help us determine the position of the Romance languages in Division One offerings, and the demand in general for language instruction in similar liberal arts situations," Pistorius said.

Pistorius said that the evaluation was the direct result of a self-study in which all the members of both departments participated.

Committee members will visit various classes in the Romanic language and Russian curricula and discuss student reaction more informally in meetings on Friday.

The faculty Steering Committee will conduct an open forum with students Thursday afternoon at 4 p.m. in Dodd House Living Room. The committee is responsible for channeling the flow of legislation from committees to the faculty, sets faculty meeting agendas, and acts as an appeals board for faculty members denied tenure, according to chairman Irwin Shainman.

Committee seeks student input on tenure

The Student Standing Committee distributed faculty tenure questionnaires to students Tuesday in an effort to "increase direct student input to the tenure decision-making process," said committee chairman Hervey McIver '77.

According to McIver, the questionnaire will be given out every year in order to gather "valuable cumulative information." Students may return signed and completed questionnaires to designated collectors in each house or to a box in the Baxter mail room. The results will be summarized by the committee and given to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions, the faculty member being evaluated, and his department chairman. If necessary, complete responses will be given to the CAP without the student signatures.

McIver described the questionnaire as an effort to "allow every student to voice his ideas about any professor coming up for tenure in a way that will be seriously considered by the CAP. This must be a uniform, responsible and consistent process, going beyond just random and majors-only input."

The committee asks that students sign their responses, he said, "in the hope that by having this done, we can ensure that sincere and responsible replies will be made." He emphasized that only members of the Standing Committee will see the signatures.

Junior Advisers

The JA Selection Committee has chosen 28 men and 23 women to serve as Junior Advisors next year, out of a pool of 95 men and 46 women. The Committee planned for a freshman class of 470-480 students. According to committee chairman Duff Anderson, all candidates who were selected by the committee have accepted, which is "a first in the last decade of JA selection."

The JA Selection Committee is composed mainly of past and present Junior Advisors. There are 28 people on the committee, including 18 seniors, 7 juniors, 2 at-large representatives, and Lauren Stevens, Dean of Freshman.

Gardner discusses writing, teaching

Novelist John Gardner teaches his craft once a week at Williams to a select group of creative writing students. He is the author of Grendel [Beowulf told from the monster's point of view], The Sunlight Dialogues, and the recent October Light. He is 44 years old, was born in Batavia, New York and has taught at Southern Illinois Univ., Oberlin, and Bennington College. The following has been extracted from an interview in his Stetson Hall office.

by Jonathan Sanoff

HOW DO YOU TEACH NOVEL WRITING? Novel writing is really a pretty late stage in the game. It's like being able to write symphonies; you have to write little songs first. The first thing I do is to teach some specifics about technique. Partly through exercises, I show the way a description is a piece of writing that's not just a good description of a particular barn or street; it's also charged with the emotion of the person looking at it. One I used at Williams was: describe a barn as seen by a man whose son has just been killed in a war—don't mention the son, the war or death. Then, you begin to talk about the construction of forms like a tale, fable and short story. You build so that when you come to the short story the writer is fully conscious of what's required of him. Finally you arrive, ready for the novel.

DO YOU LIKE TO TEACH? Basically I like to teach people who are ready for me—for a real professional writer. I hate spending time teaching what is in effect High School English. And I do that all the time. HAVE YOUR STUDENTS HERE BEEN READY FOR YOU? Some of them have, some not. But that's OK, it makes for a good class mix.

WHAT'S YOUR CRITERIA FOR JUDGING A PIECE OF LITERATURE? First thing, is that it has to be technically competent. If a story's just plain incompetent it's annoying and that distracts you. Second, it has to be emotionally honest. Third, I think the writer has to be sane. A really fine piece of fiction tells the truth, it's correct-congruent with reality. If a writer, however brilliant is wrong about the nature of reality—WHAT DO YOU MEAN BY REALITY?—The world, the same thing you mean. Don't play philosophy with me, the way the world is. A lot of American fiction is whining, cynical nihilistic fiction. It says, "The world is a terrible place; America is a shitty country." Those people are mistaken. Samuel Beckett is probably one of the greatest living writers, except that he's mistaken too. Every night he goes home to his wife, with whom he has been living for years. Putting his arms around her, he says, "No meaning again today." Well, that's foolish; the answer is right there in his arms.

WHAT DO YOU THINK OF AMERICAN TASTE? America is such a big country with many wonderful and terrible things happening. Of course, any kind of taste that is based on the capitalist notion of selling things is going to be bad taste. Commercial art is generally crap, and most of America is commercial.

DO YOU WATCH A LOT OF TV? I don't have time for it, but watch it once in a while to know what people are thinking. TV in my opinion is a very minor art, like building sand castles. Like movies, it's not the powerful kind of art that fiction is.

PLEASE DESCRIBE YOUR NEWEST BOOK, "OCTOBER LIGHT". I like the book. It's about two old people who have a fight in Vermont. An older brother who is kind of a reactionary, and his little sister a liberal, although not too liberal. Within the novel there's sort of another novel—a junky metaphysical trash piece about smuggling in San Francisco. The two connect in a literal and symbolic way. The main novel is about models. The old man has Ethan Allan for a model and thinks everybody should be like him. He hasn't got a very good idea of Ethan Allan, because all he hears about him is myths. Everyone models his life on something, and fictional characters do influence lives. In fact the biggest model for civilization is its myths, its fictions. Once you establish the myth of Jesus Christ you've got thousands of people who are trying to live in a certain way because they believe in the myth.

John Gardner

What's my message? That's not what art does. Art is unlike religion in that it has no message; all art does is to keep reexamining the questions and get rid of the lies.

WHO READS YOUR BOOKS? Basically, I think I'm read by the middle class and I think I appeal to the middle class. However complicated the philosophical premises of my novels may be, the stories do hold an ordinary reader. The best of my novels are really the simplest-like Nickel Mountain. It's a mystical type of novel, talking about spiritual and material all the way through, but I think it reads like a good story about country people. The letters that I get about it are mostly from very ordinary people.

WHAT'S THE CURRENT STATE OF LITERATURE IN AMERICA? It's all mediocre, up and down the line. I think Saul Bellow is a very mediocre writer despite the fact that he got the Nobel Prize. John Updike is mistaken in his opinions—I think he's morally perverse, although he doesn't mean to be. I think Salinger who could be the best going is simply not writing. Gore Vidal is nothing and never has been. Nabakov is just playing games

Housing Happiness

With the freshman inclusion and upperclass transfer processes completed and the annual ritual of room draw impending, it is perhaps an appropriate time to sum up some ideas concerning housing at Williams.

We believe that the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) has been unduly strict this year in limiting the amount of choice students have regarding their housing. The CUL, largely ignoring alternative proposals from the Housing Committee, has fashioned a house transfer system which imposes rather a large risk on students who wish to transfer houses.

While recognizing that the principle on which the present campus housing system is built, that there is "educational value" in maintaining diversity with each residential house, has some validity, we believe that the CUL has strayed too far from attempting to keep students happy with their housing. Housing seems to be one of several areas where student-faculty committees have imposed a sort of educational paternalism by assuming they know far better what experiences are educationally valuable than do students themselves. This approach neglects the fact that individual students often do know what is best for themselves and that people frequently learn from making their own decisions and mistakes.

Where one lives, and with what group of people, undoubtedly has much to do with how much one enjoys and participates in the Williams experience. The present system offers a fair amount of choice at the end of the freshman year but little after that. This ignores the fact that upperclass students generally have a much better idea of where they would like to live than do freshmen. We suspect that with a somewhat more flexible transfer system, where students were not encouraged by the system to remain in housing situations which they considered unpleasant, the benefits incurred from increased student happiness would far outweigh any possible losses in house diversity. Furthermore, as the CUL itself noted in its January report, maximizing diversity within each house may tend to cut down on diversity between houses. Thus an artificial conformity exists which actually limits the diversity of social atmospheres on campus and reduces the amount of choice available to the individual students.

Co-op housing is an issue which we believe has received insufficient attention this year. Considering the increasing number of off-campus applications, the apparent availability of buildings which are suitable for co-op housing (Sewall, Woodbridge, Keck, Dewey and Lambert), and the "significant" interest in co-op housing which a CUL survey found, a serious study of the possibilities for co-op housing seems warranted. If economic factors are at the root of present opposition to alternative housing, students should be given these facts and not plied with elaborate arguments about the educational value of certain housing experiences relative to others. If the administration or the CUL wants to rigorously define the on-campus housing experience as the most valuable to us, how can they justify allowing the College's enrollment to exceed the availability of campus housing? Aren't all the people who are allowed to get off-campus cheating themselves out of a true Williams education?

Contrary to the rampant rumor which has been spreading fear among this year's seniors, the Gul will not revert entirely back to the traditional head and shoulders photographs of past generations.

The Senior section is to consist of two parts; a traditional head and shoulder section, while candids and group shots will be spread throughout the book, labeled and indexed.

There is no charge for the Studio shots or Yearbook staff photographers. Also, seniors who wish to take their own pictures will be supplied with film free of charge. Please sign up in the Mail Room. If you have any questions call Debbie at 6104 or S.U. Box 2823.

Letters: honesty, policy, racism

Racism refuted

To the editor:

After four years of allegations about racism in the Williams basketball program, I cannot allow the most recent charge to slip by without a response. Tony Cornett's "Viewpoint" (April 8) bothers me deeply; not because I think there is an ounce of truth in what he says, but because I am afraid that if people hear the same old story too many times, they might actually start to believe it.

The problem with any charge of racism is that it is difficult to refute. People who really want to believe that a person or an institution is racist will perceive racism no matter how mistaken that impression may be. For those who have an open mind, though, there are a few specifics which clearly refute what Tony has to say.

The "Viewpoint" states that the "Coach is allowing a man's color to determine the extent of playing time he receives." However, in Coach Tong's first year here, he started a black center (Les Ellison) over a white center (Mike Rosten) who had been a starter the season before. The choice was based on who added more to the success of the team; obviously not, as Tony claims, on "the man's color." The article also implies that the basketball program does not recruit blacks. This is patently false. One need merely ask Coach Tong in order to ascertain that he is recruiting the best ballplayers he can find, irrespective of race.

It is important to realize that the racism charge may be somewhat of a self-fulfilling prophecy. When black ballplayers are told (as was Tony) that the basketball program is racist, there is a natural tendency for them to see coaching decisions as racially-linked. In turn, that encourages blacks to quit the team; this then becomes a source for further charges of racism.

As a tremendous number of people on this campus can attest, Coach Tong is a warm, open, and sensitive person. The accusations of racism are nothing more than cheap digs against his character.

Sincerely yours,
Tim Hester '77

Honor violations

To the editor:

Within the past month, nearly half of the students in an upper level course were suspected to have violated the Honor Code on a take home exam. It would be safe to say that gray areas in the Honor Code accounted for most of this mess. As a result, academic probation has become a real possibility for some unfortunate students in that class, with compliments from the Honor Code Committee. It is quite easy to blame the criminals, but there are inherent nebulous areas in the honor code that might have made criminals of us all.

With the existing code, it is sometimes difficult to define a violation. Exemplary passages are:

"A student who enrolls at the college thereby agrees to respect and acknowledge the research and ideas of others in his or her work and to abide by those regulations governing work stipulated by the instructor."

"A paraphrase of the work of another must be acknowledged as such by a note stating the source."

Based on these "stipulations", the Honor Code varies from course to course on this campus; some require the signature of Honor Code statements while others allow complete collaboration on a paper topic. In most of my experiences at Williams, most instructors have not "stipulated" regulations at all, so the student is left to decide. Even the most strict "stipulations" will not eliminate a vast gray area. Some take home exams require a common reference and it becomes nearly impossible not to exchange information with your neighbor. Would suggesting a helpful reference to someone for a paper topic be a violation? Suppose I ask my friend to interpret my professor's instructions—would that be an infraction? I am sure Williams would like to foster healthy intellectual interaction among students, but when does this interaction turn into plagiarism as defined above? How do students decide what is common knowledge or what constitutes a roommate's brainstorm?

True, Williams has existed with this honor code for many years and we are all tempted to sweep this mess under the rug. But our nebulous Honor Code will continue to make most of us unsuspecting criminals. Rather than scouring for scapegoats, the Honor Code Committee should recognize (or correct) some basic predicaments in the Honor Code and recognize that certain tests and papers assigned on this campus lead to those predicaments.

The "Record" will publish a news article concerning the alleged honor code violations after all individual cases have been decided. Ed.

Editorial policies

To the editor:

In his letter printed in the March eleventh Record, Mr. Mensah should have addressed questions of editorial policy, not political principle. What gets printed in the student paper of a private college is not a question of "Freedom of Speech." The editorial policies of your publication are hardly "dictatorial" but they are timid.

The Record is read by many in the Williams community and is mailed to over one thousand readers living all around the United States. The paper represents Williams College. It is a means of informing and influencing people who read it. It is "the paper of record" from which the history of the College will, in part, be constructed.

Mr. Mensah and others who criticize the Record may underestimate the challenge of attending to all the mundane details that add up to a decent paper. I am impressed with the layout of the Record, the fact that it is consistently full and regularly issued (unlike the old Record-Advocate). But I do not think the editors should be satisfied with the gains the paper has made.

The Record is distributed free to over half its readership and reader acceptance is therefore hard to gauge. As best I can tell, most people on campus are content with the sports coverage, read the humorous and controversial columns eagerly and ignore the rest of the paper. Readers constantly complain that the Record is bland and uninteresting.

Your paper would be improved if you started to actively solicit and responsibly edit short (six hundred word?) articles of opinion. Any editor half-worthy of the title can eliminate such problems as footnotes (which stymied you in the case of Mr. Mensah's article) with one stroke of a pencil. An editor must trust hisherself enough to confidently excise words, sentences and even whole paragraphs of submitted copy to make it conform to the standards and space considerations of the publication. Your explanations of your reluctance to print Mr. Mensah's provocative analysis of the situation in Uganda (I have read it) are nothing but lame excuses. Your attitudes reflect badly on the state of mind of the entire Williams College community.

Viewpoint

Students should augment power

Since this is the season for resurrection, I propose that we raise another issue from the dead-student government at Williams College. Students have expressed concern for their lack of decision making information and voting power in the Record, through the "No" CC presidential votes, and at the Gladden House and CAP forums. Student government is not just a nostalgic reenactment of the 1960s or a passing fad.

The apparent central issue of the CC elections (disbanding or restructuring CC) clouded the more pressing issue: procurement of student power on campus. The March 4 editorial in the Record justly stated, "The current student unrest concerning College Council is both useful and potentially harmful to student interests ... it seems unlikely that such actions as succession from the council or boycotting the upcoming election will work to replace the current structure with anything more viable." Unfortunately they did not add that this unrest indicates that a) something is rotten in Denmark, b) we are responsible for finding out what it is, and c) student representation and governing structures must be renovated.

At the Gladden House forum, a welcome advancement in campus consciousness, the word input was championed at the expense of the more important concept-output. Continued debate over input and attitude alone merely perpetuate the illusion of student government. Students must reject their backseat roles as advisors and consultants. Real decision making power must be backed by the right to vote.

However, before students can propose a legitimate model for restructuring governing bodies on campus, we must gather comprehensive information from all interests. Student directed action could proceed as follows:

1) evaluate the present system within each department and committee—consider in whose interests decisions are made, by whom, and within whose parameters

2) talk to students, faculty, and administration involved with these decisions and consider their responsibilities and recommendations

3) hold additional forums with the deans, trustees, and department majors

4) model a new governing structure in response to revealed inadequacies

5) publicize all findings and conduct a student referendum

6) present the referendum results to the faculty and administration

7) continue activism until referendum's mandate is met by the college

Specific areas of investigation might include: a) the lack of student representation on the Board of Trustees, Committee on Academic Standing, Committee on Academic Appointments, and the faculty as the major governing body in the Williams College community, b) student minority representation of 8 out of 14 "student faculty committees", and c) electoral and policy making procedures for college academic and nonacademic departments and committees. An understanding of the system is a prerequisite for making it work for us. Policy which students must bring within the limits of their comprehension and control extends far beyond tenure to curriculum, credit and grading systems, major requirements, and alternative forms of education.

Students on the College Council, the remains of the Gladden House Forum, and majors' committees need to organize and address these issues and report their findings to the student body soon. The administration should be held accountable for its statement in the Williams College Bulletin, "It is the aim of Williams College to encourage among undergraduates a sense of personal responsibility and self government." Students must act to make sure that this "sense" of power is derived from fully informed voting power.

Big Band leader Stan Rubin to play

Stan Rubin, a new name in big bands, will present his "swing era" music Friday at the Williams Inn.

by Jeff Mahoney

What is a Princeton pre-med, law school graduate doing leading a Big Band?

The answer to this question is given by Stan Rubin who, with his 13 piece big band, is to perform this Friday night at the Williams Inn. Stan Rubin is one of the only new names in the big band business since the decline of the "swing era" late in the '40's. However, Stan Rubin makes no attempt at presenting a new style of music, nor does he claim to play so-called modern-jazz, or anything even resembling rock music. Rather, he and his orchestra are recreating and preserving the great dance music from America's own swing era (30's and 40's).

For those unfamiliar with the music of the era, parents may be the closest source of information. Anyone over forty surely has many memories of hours of dancing to the exciting clarinet of Benny Goodman, or the romantic trumpet of Harry James. The joy and exhilaration produced by those bands was evidenced by screaming teenagers, unable to keep their feet still, as they were swinging in the arms of their dancing partners.

But how did Stan Rubin get involved in leading such a band in a time where Disco Duck and other equally innovative tunes were being continually pounded into our ears? The answer is 43 years long.

Stan Rubin's birth coincided almost exactly with the birth of the swing era. For this reason, his early childhood was a time when the great big band leaders, like Goodman and James and Glen Miller, Artie Shaw and Tommy Dorsey were idolized by every teenager throughout the country. Rubin was one of their biggest fans; he has been playing in big bands since he was in sixth grade.

In college, he found that his musical activities were taking a great deal of time away from his studies. His band was solidly booked throughout those years. He fondly recalls when his Princeton Dixieland band challenged (and supposedly defeated) Williams' own Spring Street Stompers to a battle of the bands at Carnegie Hall in 1954.

In spite of his tremendous successes, Rubin was rather reluctant to drop his academics in order to become a full-time band leader. He seemed to be thirty years too late. In 1972 however, he made the decision; he finally decided that the preservation of America's greatest music was his "true love."

But what is Stan Rubin doing in Williamstown? As he explains, he began his career as a bandleader in college, playing for strictly college audiences and has recently discovered, to his amazement, that college audiences today are just as receptive to his music as they ever were. He is looking forward to his Friday night performance.

Dodd art gallery benefits both artist and viewer

by Clint Willis

Visiting an art gallery, one often feels compelled to take in as much quantity as possible. The counterproductive practice of seeing all and appreciating none is often the response to this compulsion. It may leave the gallery-goer with another feeling; that he has wasted his time.

The Dodd House Art Gallery, consisting of one small room, adjacent to the Dodd House Living Room, presents no such problem. It was begun three years ago to provide artists in the Williams community with a place to exhibit their work. According to Christ Noey '77, one of the Gallery's directors, this type of space has been lacking for artists in the community who were not studio art majors at the college.

The various forms of art exhibited at the Gallery in the past have included water colors, photographs, prints, macrame, and drawings. Planned for this spring are oil paintings, pottery, and a number of other exhibits.

Kim Greer Verzyl whose exhibit, "Recent Drawings", opened April 5 at the gallery, also talked about the Dodd gallery's purpose. She cited several reasons why an artist might wish to exhibit there.

A gallery also gets one's work off the street, where the unrecognized are often forced to show their art if they want it seen and-or bought. According to Verzyl, street exhibiting, which exposes the artist to the remarks and eyes of the unknowing, and worse the uncaring, often make artists feel that they are prostituting themselves and their work.

Verzyl also spoke on a more elemental level about how galleries can serve the artist. Her art is both a striving for a shared emotion with the viewer, and an attempt at release of some of the energies and emotions within her. It is also an attempt to express feelings, in a form which others may lack the ability to express them in, but which they need to see express. Thus, the relationship between the artist and the viewer can become a symbiotic one. The artist uses his art as a release. Without the viewer the release would go no further than the canvas, the film, or the clay with which the artist works, the viewer gives the artist's release meaning. Thus, the Dodd House gallery, or any gallery, may serve a key role for the artist who wants his release to mean something to himself and others.

WCFM presents interview with composer Middleton

An interview with Alain Middleton, a unique and innovative composer will be broadcasted on WCFM this Tuesday night at 10:00 P.M. The interview was conducted by Williams Resident Composer Stephen Dankner and covered much fascinating ground, both historical and theoretical.

Middleton attempts to create a "new musical dino" He explains that his work "intends to articulate a musical discourse within the internal structure of sound; that is, within the fundamental changes to be heard in the harmonies and frequency modulations of sound. He utilizes electronics in his work.

The 29-year-old artist was born in Paris and received his education there. He is currently composing independently. He has performed in a number of concerts in the past three years throughout Europe and has recently performed in New York City and the Collaborative in Bennington, Vermont.

The interview will be aired along with two of Middleton's complete sound works as well as excerpts from two others.

I know very few magazines in America whose stories are really worth publishing. The "New Yorker" story for example is really just trash . . . just formula stories. But it's one of the best in the country. Gordon Leash is the editor of "Esquire". There are times when he publishes very well. It depends on financial pressures at "Esquire". He publishes a certain kind of writer when the pressure's on. Like he goes for famous names.

COULD YOU LOOK INTO THE FUTURE OF YOUR CAREER? I don't think about career. My friend Ken Marrow in California is a painter. He's got a barn full of paintings and he doesn't even sell them. If someone comes around he sells one; terrific, he sells a painting. He's a good painter, but he just lives painting. Ask Ken Marrow about his career and he says, "What career?, I'm a painter." And I'm a writer, I just write.

The Purple laxmen fired a barrage of 56 shots on the Springfield goal, while the Chief attackmen could manage only 27. The Ephs hope to raise their regular-season record to 2-1 when they take on Yale, ranked 6th in New England, tomorrow afternoon. (photo by Read)

Ephs stick Springfield; face Elis Wednesday

by Nancy Rhein

Within minutes of opening their 1977 home season, the Ephs' scoring attack was already on the board and on their way to an 18-2 trouncing of Springfield Saturday. The downstate visitors' hopes of avoiding a repeat performance of last year's 18-4 loss were quickly squelched by the Ephs' powerful attack, ably manned by Dave Moffitt, Peter Thomsen, Todd Eckerson, and Dick Goodbody. The foursome tallied 13 goals and 11 assists, as they dominated the scoring, with the Eph midfield picking up four goals.

This low percentage of middie goals, according to Williams coach Renzi Lamb, is less than ideal as it may allow the opponent's defense to cut off scoring by tight control of the attack. The Chiefs' defense lacked that control however, and the Williams attack overwhelmed their weaker opponents.

Thomsen opened the scoring for Williams and Springfield responded by hitting a lifeless shot to tie it up. Eckerson, in his first of six game assists set up freshman middie Mike Curran for the go-ahead goal. As Springfield's attack became as cold as the snowy Cole Field breezes, the purple scoring machine went into full gear adding five more goals in the quarter.

Middie Tam Murray started the second period scoring, connecting for one of the team's four man-up goals, out of 12 such advantages. Springfield then made use of one of seven Ephs penalties to put the score at 7-2 at 11:33.

Following the power play goal, the Eph's defense tightened up and executed better clears, holding Springfield to 27 shots on goal, with frosh Bob Cowin picking off eleven for stickmen.

Midway through the game it was clear that Springfield was not going to survive the sting of the Cole winds and Goodbody-Thomsen-Eckerson scoring threat. The punishment continued throughout the half enabling Lamb to evaluate the team's depth.

The Ephs outshot their opponents 56-27 with Thomsen leading the scoring with 5 goals and 2 assists; Goodbody with 5 goals and 1 assist; and Moffitt with 3 and 2. Frosh face-off man Gus Nuzzolese had one goal and one assist while attackman John Glynn grabbed one goal, and Cam McKee and Captain Jamie Taylor assisted once. Senior middie Colie Nelson scored the last for the Ephs with just :55 in the match.

Coming off of Saturday's win the Ephs take on Yale Wednesday. Williams defeated Yale 7-6 two years ago, a win which can be repeated according to coach Lamb provided the team plays well to start and are not intimidated by the Eli's. Yale, although not ranked nationally, is 6th in New England and should present more of a challenge to Eph defensemen Peter Unger, Bob Marquess, and Scott MacLachlan. Hoping to maintain their scoring streak the laxmen will tangle with their Ivy visitors Wednesday at 4 on Cole Field.

UMass, Army overcome purple netmen

by Evan Bash

Florida had it all for the varsity tennis team on their first spring trip ever; sun, warmth and even two wins in three matches.

Unfortunately, the squad's propensity for winning matches has temporarily been lost along with their tans somewhere in Anita Bryant's orange groves. In their first two matches above the Mason-Dixon line, Coach Dave Johnson's team has come up with exactly two less wins than they had on the supposedly difficult sunshine state circuit, falling just short against the University of Massachusetts 5-4 on Wednesday and then being gunned down by Army 6-3 at West Point on Saturday.

The Ephs are confident they can recapture their winning form as soon as they can shake the series of small, nagging injuries and the slow starts of last year's veterans that have so far kept Williams from tasting victory. In fact, the team has been led this year by three newcomers who have scored all seven of the season's points.

The campaign was opened against UMass with those newcomers notching all three of the Eph's singles victories. Sophomores Perry Nelson and Tad Roach served notice they'll have to be contended with for quite awhile as they scored easy 6-4, 6-2 and 6-2, 6-4 wins respectively. No. 4 Evan Bash also managed to start on the right foot with a 6-2, 4-6, 6-3 victory. After leading the team with two wins down south, no. 1 Martin Goldberg met a very strong player and fell 6-2, 6-1 while no. 2 Jim Parsons squandered a second set lead, losing the set 7-6, and giving another match win to UMass. Dean Gianakos, who at no. 5 is waiting to break out of an early season slump, dropped his match 6-2 in the third set.

With the score tied at three, Williams chances for a win looked good as the doubles teams that had won six of nine matches in Florida took the courts. First off was the no. 1 team of Nelson and Gianakos, having taken a 6-3, 6-1 beating from a tough UMass team. Teaming up at no. 3, Roach and Bash each recorded double wins for the day with a 6-4, 6-3 win. That left the team of Goldberg and Pete Friesen, now into their third set, as the deciding match. The UMass duo broke open a tight set with some strong late games to win the set 6-3 and with it the match.

Williams took a slightly different line-up to West Point on Saturday, but the result was not altered. Continuing their strong play were Roach and Bash as they accounted for the Eph's only singles wins, Roach rolling 6-2, 7-5 and Bash scoring a 0-6, 6-2, 7-6 comeback. Goldberg was under too much firepower from his opponent's serve and lost 6-1, 6-2. Once again Parsons' second set comeback bid fell just short 6-1, 6-4, while no. 3 Nelson met stiff resistance and dropped a 6-2, 6-2 match. In his first varsity match, no. 6 Mitch Reiss had a tough time, losing 6-2, 6-0.

Entering the doubles Williams was still alive with the score only 4-2 Army, but the story that followed was all too familiar. Only the duo of Bash and Roach saved the Eph's doubles pride with a 7-5, 6-3 win, each again recording two wins for the day. The team of Nelson and Gianakos got off to a slow start and couldn't quite bounce back, going down 6-2, 6-4. Bill Whelan returned to the line-up after a bout with the flu as he teamed with Goldberg, but the magic wasn't there as they lost a close one 6-4, 6-4.

Baseballers bomb RPI, 14-2

Coach Jim Briggs' varsity baseball squad opened up regular season action on Saturday with a 14-2 stomping of R.P.I. in Troy. The Ephs' batting strength lasted the full game, as the team banged out 15 hits and scored in five different innings, including a six run bulge in the 8th. Briggs was extremely pleased with his group's at-the-plate statistics, and was likewise impressed with the way the defense held together throughout the contest.

The R.P.I. players, however, did not lay down and die from the opening pitch, but instead constructed a 2-1 lead by the end of four innings. Williams bounced right back in the fifth with a Roger McEniry double setting up a three run rally. John Friborg singled to bring McEniry across the plate and gave his teammates a tie score at two apiece.

Friborg was not content to stand around so he blazed a purple path across the infield and arrived at second base with a successful steal to his credit. Meanwhile, Scott Harrington was at the plate looking at pitches and eventually managed to get on base with a walk. Freshman Rick Walter then stepped into the batter's box and proceeded to blast a "two bagger", enabling Friborg and Harrington to score. The Ephmen ended the fifth inning with a 4-2 lead and then put the game out of R.P.I.'s reach with 10 runs in the next three rounds at bat.

Walter had an excellent day at the plate, picking up three hits and driving in two runs, while speedster John Friborg got on base in 5 of 6 attempts and stole three bases. Ken Hollingsworth chalked up two hits and drove in four runs and Bob LaBombard added a pair of hits (including a double) and drove in three.

Junior hurler Steve Maier garnered the win with a full nine inning effort and allowed one earned run in the process. Williams faces Trinity today in Hartford.

Women's crew opens season

The Williams Women's Crew opens its racing season this Saturday with a home contest against Connecticut College. On Sunday, the squad completed the last of its scheduled brushes when it rowed against a Washington College boat which was touring through the Northeast.

The women's squad, consisting this year of both a lightweight and heavyweight 'eight' (eight rowers plus coxswain), started its on-the-water training during its spring trip to Washington, D.C. After one week on the water both boats scrimmaged a heavyweight eight from the University of Virginia, at UVA. With both Williams boats understroking UVA (the fewer strokes per minute for a given speed the stronger the boat is), the heavies easily proved to be the fastest boat, with the lights just off UVA's pace.

On the way north at the end of spring vacation the squad stopped off in Philadelphia: the lights scrimmaged a University of Pennsylvania lightweight boat while the heavies scrimmaged Vesper Boat Club. Although slower than the Vesper boat, which boasted six Olympic veterans from Montreal, the heavies turned in an extremely solid, fast performance. The lights, while staying even with U. Penn on short pieces, were slightly off the pace on longer pieces. The last scrimmage of the season against Washington College was held at Stillwater, New York after a frustrating week of short practices held in wet, cold weather. Due to illness and injury, only the heavyweight boat rowed and again they easily outmatched their opponents.

Coach George Marcus is pleased with the squad's progress up to this point. Both boats are very young; only five of 16 rowers are veterans from last spring and four rowers, Sue Laidlaw, Carol-Ann Smalley, Lisa Capaldini and Mary Lue Ruch plus both coxswains, Mary Anne Sondrini and Dierdre Scher, stepped into a boat for the first time in Washington.

Thomsen named athlete of the week

Peter Thomsen, attackman on the varsity lacrosse team, has been selected as the Record Athlete of the Week following his five goal performance against Springfield on Saturday. The sophomore laxman added two assists in the Ephs' 18-2 romping of the Chiefs, and also poured in four goals and a feed against C. W. Post last Wednesday.

Honorable Mention—Freshman infielder Rick Walter brought back a hot bat from the Florida trip and led the varsity baseball team to a 14-2 trouncing of R.P.I. on Saturday. Walter hit 3 for 5, including a double which drove in two runs.

Faculty abolishes major grade, debates soaring library costs

by Scott Fenn

In seeming reaction to bureaucratic red tape and semantic squabbles, the faculty fundamentally altered the College's position concerning the senior major exercise and major grade in the most significant action at last Wednesday's faculty meeting. Amending almost beyond recognition a motion from the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), the faculty decided that:

1. the College not require a senior major exercise for the degree
2. departments and programs so desiring be permitted to require that their majors pass a senior major exercise, to be specified as part of the major program and to be reviewed by the CEP and approved by the faculty as part of the regular course package
3. the major grade be abolished
4. the above become effective with the class of 1979

In effect, the passage of this motion allows individual departments to require a senior major exercise if they so desire but divorces that exercise from having an impact on a student's transcript or graduation, except in cases where the exercise is failed. Failure of a required senior major exercise can still be used by a department to bar a student from graduation but any passing grade will not be used to compute a major grade or recorded on a student's transcript. Currently, the senior major exercise (or the senior major course grade in departments which don't require a major exercise) constitutes one-fifth of a student's major grade.

Several faculty members expressed concern that the new rule turns the senior major exercise into a joke and will result in increased pressure from students to do away with the major exercise altogether. Others noted that the major exercise grade could still play an important role through faculty recommendations.

In other action at the faculty meeting, the Library Committee reported on and the faculty discussed the allocation of library budget funds. The discussion focused on the spiralling cost of periodicals and the trade-off between purchases of books and periodicals.

According to Nicholas Fersen, chairman of the Library Committee, the cost of periodicals has risen astronomically in the past decade and their purchase has resulted in a decrease in book purchases.

Library Committee member Charles Fuqua stated that the library budget was subject to two major fiscal pressures, the inflation rate and exchange rate fluctuations. He noted that the library spent over twice as much on book and periodical acquisitions in 1976 as it did in 1967 but actually added fewer new titles. Fuqua added that there was no reason to expect the inflation of book and periodical prices to slow and cited 16-18 per cent as their expected inflation rate for next year.

"A critical issue is the mix between book and periodical purchases," Fuqua said. He noted that books are a one-time expenditure whereas periodical subscriptions are a continuing and increasing expense which require significant lead times to stop. According to the Library Committee, an increasing portion of the library acquisition budget is being taken up each year by periodicals, so that for 1976, periodicals accounted for 58.1 per cent of library purchases.

The issue of who benefits from book purchases versus periodicals was also commented on by several faculty members. Lawrence Vankin, Associate Professor of Biology, argued that periodicals were used extensively for student research projects in Division III.

According to Fuqua, the Library Committee, along with College Librarian Lawrence Wikander, is handling the current allocation problem by restricting increases in funding for periodicals to the amount necessary to retain those which are now being subscribed to.

The Library Committee is, in effect, reallocating some funds from periodicals to books in its budget proposal for next year.

Political activist, Mitchell Goodman discussed cultural and political conditions in the sixties in a lecture Wednesday night.

Goodman looks back at 60's; advocates 'survival politics'

by Scott Fenn

"Your roots lie in the '60s whether you know it or not," stated Mitchell Goodman, speaking on "Where Politics and Culture Meet: Learning from the experience of the '60s" last Tuesday. "You're all products of the 1960's and it pains me to see that your generation largely isn't aware of the fact."

According to Goodman, the most important lesson of the 1960s may have been that culture and politics are inseparable. "Real politics is rooted in a culture. In a healthy society, they're not separable. Unfortunately, the politics of this country is mostly a game," Goodman stated.

Goodman described his own most important link with the 1960s as his involvement in political trials. He was tried along with Dr. Benjamin Spock and others on the charge of aiding and abetting draft resistors. Goodman argued that the government used a number of different methods to quiet troublemakers in the '60s.

"The Chicago police force, cooperating with the FBI, came to Fred Hampton's house like Nazis in the night and murdered him," Goodman said. "In my case, he continued, "because I'm white and middle class they didn't use that method. They tried to immobilize me by hanging me up in the courts."

"Aggressive capital and corporate abuses are the major problem with this country today," argued Goodman. "We live under monopoly capitalism and that system is becoming more and more interested in controlling your mind. When you've been processed by a control mechanism, of which the school system is an important part, you're largely a slave," Goodman said.

Goodman ended his lecture-discussion by stating that "the capitalist system is very vulnerable to people who hold certain positions in the economic system." He called upon students to get involved again in "survival politics." According to Goodman, the arms race and nuclear energy are two contemporary problems which are a good deal more dangerous than was the Vietnam War.

Transfers go smoothly

The freshman inclusion and housing transfer processes went "more smoothly this year than ever before," according to Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad. Roosenraad's statement came at last Monday's Housing Committee meeting after the committee approved the results of the housing transfer process.

According to Roosenraad, "very roughly" 70 per cent of the 64 transfer applicants received their first choice, 10 per cent their second, 10 per cent their third and 10 per cent their fourth options. No one was assigned to their fifth choice. Approximately one-half of the applications came from either Mission Park or the Berkshire Quad.

Roosenraad told the committee that this year's transfer process satisfied more requests than expected. He attributed the unexpected success to the coincidence that the houses with the most requests for transfer inclusion also had the highest number of seniors. Without this coincidence the transfer results "could have been a d i s a s t e r , ' ' Roosenraad said. Roosenraad said that transfer requests were run twice: once on a one-in-one-out basis, and then under a system which allowed houses to be filled to capacity. The first method naturally limits movement into a popular housing category, while the second often leaves gaps in the less popular categories. For example, under the second system, the final one used, the only places not filled in a house such as Dodd are those few places reserved for exchange and transfer students from other schools.

The committee, decided to form three subcommittees to evaluate the housing system on campus in preparation for a report to the Committee on Undergraduate Life late in May.

One group will examine freshman inclusion, focusing on how this year's change in housing categories affected that process. This sub-committee will also assess the off-campus housing situation. Roosenraad emphasized that the committee must recognize that off-campus living is an expedient not viewed by the administration as an alternative to residential housing.

Roosenraad indicated that there would be "great receptivity to concrete proposals for co-op housing."

The Housing Committee and the CUL will conduct an Open Discussion on the transfer and freshman inclusion processes, Monday, April 18 at 7:30 p.m. in Griffin 3.

Students are encouraged to voice their opinions on these issues at the meeting.

Council elects Fin Com, funds dance

The College Council allocated $500 to the ACEC Wednesday night for a Spring dance concert scheduled for May 13. Members also considered a CUL plan for an introductory freshman camping excursion, and heard proposals from several students for increasing student input into educational policy.

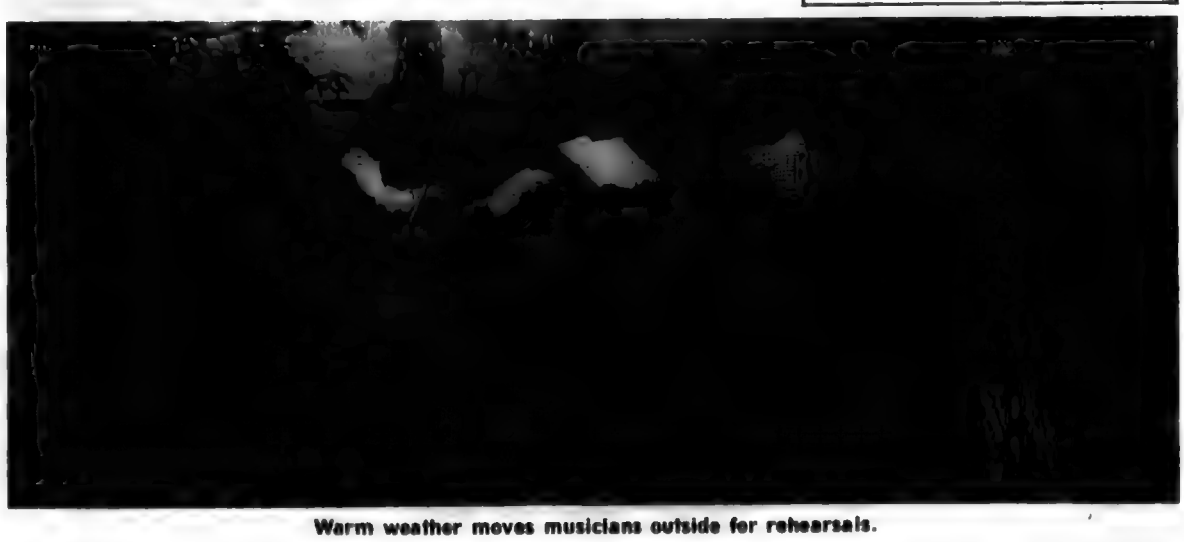
The council's allocation to the ACEC overruled a Finance Committee recommendation to limit the concert allocation to $225. The added grant will support the hiring of a "quality band" at a cost of $800-1000, according to Jeff Verney, who spoke for the ACEC at the meeting. ACEC Chairman Jim Bowe said he expects the total cost of the dance concert to be about $1800. In addition to the council allocation, ticket sales, funds from WHEW and the money remaining in the ACEC budget should cover the cost of the event, according to Bowe.

CUL Representative Paul Goren presented a plan for a pre-Freshman Day camping "experience." According to Goren, the purpose of the proposal is to "further a sense of freshman unity" and offer an alternative to the "rush and hassles" of Freshman Days. The council endorsed the proposal, which will be resubmitted to the CUL next week.

In later discussion Wednesday night, Sarah Thorne asked the council to undertake "a comprehensive study of the power structure at Williams." Thorne cited council committees, faculty committees, and department policies as areas in which "student awareness and input should be increased." "Our main interest is from the point of view of our education," added Victor Bell. Gregory Weber called for the creation of an open committee to evaluate the formation of educational policy. Council members were generally receptive to the plan, and voted to make the issues the first order of business at next week's meeting.

The Council approved the Elections Committee's nominees for the 1977-78 Finance Committee. Elected were John Duffield, Bernard Hutchinson, David Koenigsberg, Mark Lanier, Frank Pergolizzi, Stewart Read and John Simpson. The council also elected Andy Goodell and Sarah Mersereau as temporary representatives to the CUL and Housing Committee, respectively. Regular elections for these two committees are held next fall.

College admits 19.3%



The Admissions Office will mail letters of acceptance to 909 applicants, 19.3 per cent of the total number of applications, according to Director of Admissions Philip Smith. He reported that the applicant pool totalled 4705, 30 less than the total number of applications received last year.

Smith noted that the Admissions office accepted over 100 fewer applicants than last year and that subsequently, the smallest percentage of applicants accepted in college history was recorded.

The Admissions office cut the number of acceptances for men by 100 while reducing these for women by only 16. Last year 670 men and 405 women received acceptances and this year 520 men and 389 women were accepted.

Smith noted, however, that this year's applicant pool had the largest number of women ever with 1910 applications filed by women—an increase in 20 from last year. In contrast, applications from men were down by about 50; 2795 were received. This meant that the ratio of percentage acceptances for the two sexes remained about equal.

The Admissions office aims for a freshman class totalling about 475, according to Smith. The College already accepted 76 men and 83 women under the early decision program. Smith noted that this figure was slightly larger than last year's. Between January and March, 150 "outstanding" students were added to the list of acceptances. The remainder will receive their acceptance letters by Monday.

But can They play?

Charges of racism in athletics have always left a sour taste in my mouth in large part because they often reflect an emotional reaction to a situation rather than an informed analysis of the facts. And that is just the way Tony Corbett's "Viewpoint" in last week's Record struck me—as an emotional reaction by a freshman basketball player which made some extremely serious allegations yet which failed to demonstrate an adequate understanding of several crucial factors concerning the basketball program at Williams.

Actually, racist charges are nothing new for basketball programs today, be they on the high school or collegiate level. Rare is the coach who hasn't had such an allegation directed his way from an upset player or, more recently, has not, been asked to sign statements from black organizations on campus stating that he shall not discriminate against blacks on his team.

I suppose it is inevitable, therefore, that such charges would crop up sooner or later at Williams, where blacks are in an admittedly uncomfortable and disparate position regarding athletic participation to begin with. But I don't think that a careful analysis of the basketball program at Williams verifies such charges and I'm positive that even a passing association with the man that heads that program—Curt Tong—is enough to refute them entirely.

Since the 1960's, when blacks began to replace whites as the controlling figures in collegiate and professional sports, we have lived in a world where being black has been synonomous with being athletic. "Blacks have dominated just two things in this world," Al McGuire once quipped. "Poverty and basketball". The result has been that blacks are not just expected to make basketball teams, but also expected to excel on them.

Unfortunately, many blacks simply don't have the athletic ability to do either and charges of racism and discrimination have cropped up as frequent explanations for failures to make a team or to play. It's tough to watch black athletes from schools such as Hamilton, Yale, Brandeis, and Tufts come to Lasell, put on a show, and then ask after the game where all the brothers were for Williams. And it's even tougher for the SU to answer that there aren't any good enough to play. That's the answer of a "white racist", Tony says.

But the facts speak otherwise. In the past four years, just seven blacks have gone out for the varsity basketball team, with five of them trying out in the same year (1973-74). Of this seven, four made the team. Two started—Les Ellison and Regan Miller—while a third, Sterling Kinsale, received a good deal of prime time playing time. It seems clear to me that those who were qualified not only made the team but played a great deal as well. Evidence of racism completely eludes me.

The fact of the matter is that there simply haven't been that many qualified black basketball players at Williams in the past four years. And given the academic requirements of Williams, its lack of any real basketball reputation, the strict recruiting rules of the NESCAC, and the high-powered basketball programs of the Ivies and Division II and III schools like Hartford and Hamilton, it is unrealistic to expect that there should be that many.

The facts surrounding the basketball program here at Williams in no way support Tony's charges, however, while the actions of Curt Tong for the past four years lend them even less credence. Racism is an ugly word that leaves a nauseous stink behind and has no place being linked to the Williams basketball program.

Spotlight on Williams

The Yale Daily News is updating its college guide, "The Insider's Guide to the Colleges." It has solicited entries from several students, including yours truly. My renown as a writer reaches to New Haven in the South, and up to Waterville in the North. On a clear night they appreciate me in Lauderdale. Anyway, it musn't have been a clear day in Yalie-land, because my description of our institution was rejected. Instead they're printing the views of some transfer from Vassar—which is like Good Housekeeping asking Renee Richards to write on "Growing Up Female." Here is the rejected entry, in its entirety.

WILLIAMS COLLEGE
WILLIAMSTOWN,
MASSACHUSETTS

MORGAN GUARANTY: 220
BANKER'S TRUST: 570
ACME SALES TRAINEES: 800

WILLIAMS COLLEGE, nestled in the Berkshires of North Western Massachusetts, (right in the corner of New York, Massachusetts, and Vermont ... Well, do you know where Pittsfield is? How about Albany? No, it's nowhere near Boston. Forget it) is clearly one of the schools in the Northeast. This tradition, like many others which have been imbedded into the quagmire of a past that Williams has accumulated since its founding in 1593, is old, stubborn, and resistant to change, despite numerous letters to the editor. But progress is not unknown here at Williams, and the decision to go co-ed in 1975 is indicative of this spirit of "loosening-up."

The admission of women into Williams has changed the place noticeably. Instead of all guys in classes, sometimes you have girls. Also, some of the bathrooms in Morgan have been altered for special "female needs." Home Economics has finally found a place in the curriculum (Econ. 212: "The Economics of Women's Work") and the room at the Log which had been set aside for black drinkers had to be converted into a make-shift ladies room. Other than these changes, coeducation has yielded few major social revolutions. And the Board of Trustees are delighted that it worked out exactly as they had planned.

While there is no indication of improvement on the hetero scene, our be-closeted friends have made great gains. The new "Homo-American Studies" major was considered a great victory, although interested students found the registration procedure unnecessarily covert. More gains are expected in the future; and as a sign on one optimist's door reads, "When better men are made, Williams men will make them."

Williams students have a diverse range of interests and backgrounds. And if you believe that one, listen to these: "Emphasis is on the learning, not the working." "Despite its location, Williamstown receives very little inclement weather." And ... "there is surprisingly little emphasis on sports on campus."

The core of the Williams Apple, and to many minds "the pits," is its classes. Classes are small (45-65) and since Williams is an undergraduate institution, there is no threat of classes led by insecure graduate students. Insecure teachers are often buoyed by cocky senior majors whether they are in need of help or not.

The Williams political scene is an indicator of many things. Great numbers of students supported ex-president Ford in the last election, which not only reveals their personal roots, but might also address the root of Williams' entire problem. It certainly signals the close of those crazy, hazy, mace-y, days of the late 60's, which occurred during Williams' perpetual Berkshire slumber. It might be noted here that the five-college area, only 40 miles to our East, refers to Williams as the "Brigadoon of American Colleges."

The social life at Williams is the cause of much undergraduate discussion. On the other hand, too much undergraduate discussion is often blamed as the cause of the miserable social life on campus. It is this kind of dialectic thought that makes Williams what it is; it is what it has been made by what people say.

Now, where do all of these things lead us? My formulation is this: in politics, social interaction, and even sex, Williams students want three things: sensibility, dependability, and something in a nice mild beige. Like a good pair of shoes. Or a subscription to Newsweek. This is how they come in, this is how they leave. And what goes on in the middle is ... pretty much the same.

Not that Yale is much better ...

Knight, Rosenblum and Broad earn fellowships

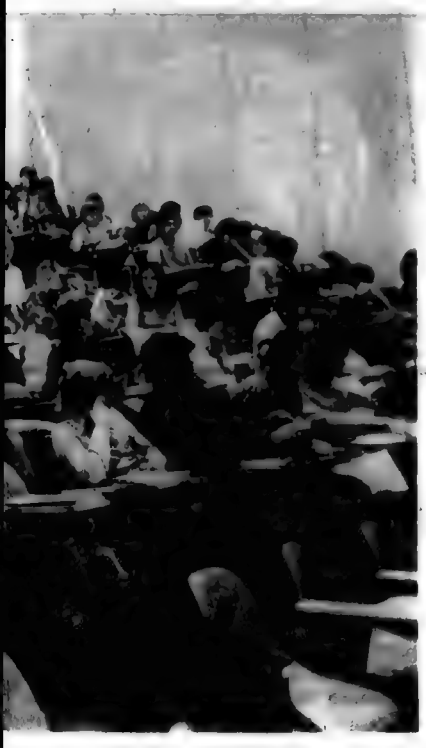
Seniors Michael Knight and Michael Rosenblum have been awarded $7,000 grants from the Thomas J. Watson Foundation for a year of independent study abroad. In addition, senior Robin Broad will travel to Asia as one of fifteen college students selected from a national pool for the Luce Scholars Program.

Knight and Rosenblum were among the 70 Watson Fellows chosen this year from a field of 977 applicants. Knight, an English and history major, will spend next year studying theater and oral tradition in Nigeria and Ghana. He served as secretary of the College Council, and as a member of Gargoyle and the Black Student Union. He has also been a student member of the Afro-American Studies Committee and a representative on several selection committees for administrative and faculty positions. Knight acted in several college theater productions, and he eventually hopes to work in the field of theatrical producing, directing, and acting.

Rosemblum will compile a photographic documentary of the lives of Jewish emigres in Israel, France, Germany, Italy and Eastern Europe. A history major, Rosenblum took time out from his academic career to spend a half year working and living in different parts of the United States, including several farming and mining communities. He has been an active member of the photo club, and has served as a teaching assistant for a photography course. His photograph of history professor Robert G. L. Waite will be used in Waite's forthcoming book on Hitler. Broad will join a group of nine men and six women from colleges in all major geographic regions in the United States in the Luce Scholars Program. The Scholars will begin their year in Asia in the fall of 1977. After a briefing in Princeton, New Jersey and an orientation program at the Chinese University in Hong Kong, the participants will take up assignments in Asia that the Luce Foundation has selected for them on the basis of their preparation and career interests. Broad's intended field of interest is public affairs and energy policy.

The Thomas J. Watson Fellowship is a national competition which sponsors independent study and travel abroad for graduates of among 50 private colleges and universities. Fellows are selected for "their commitment to their particular field of interest and for their potential leadership within it," according to Daniel L. Arnaud, Executive Director of the Foundation.

Since its establishment in 1936, the Henry Luce Foundation has made grants totalling $22 million for philanthropic projects in the fields of higher education, public affairs, scholarly programs in East Asia, and theology. All Asian aspects of the Luce Scholars Program are managed by the Asia Foundation under a cooperative arrangement with the Luce Foundation. The Asia Foundation is a non-profit, non-governmental organization with an extensive staff of field respresentatives based throughout the Far East.



Letter: Geo-biology

To the editor:

As Geology majors concerned with the co-mingling and confluence of the sciences, we would like to applaud and commend the most recent interdisciplinary, cultural exchange perpetrated upon the Williams scientific community. We speak of the inter-display case loan of biology's stuffed toys and the priceless and stimulating geology display effected last Sunday night. This experience has served to broaden our intellectual horizons and made us realize that we had fallen into a narrow and limited educational track. We feel that this presents a challenge to other departments to undertake activities of the nature in order that the lives of more Williams students may be similarly enriched.

A return to the year 1968 will be presented this Monday night starting at 10 p.m. via the WCFM airwaves (91.9 F.M.) as a two hour tape follows the music, mood, and history of that year. Prepared as a Winter Study Project during January by Tom Herwitz, the tape weaves together the major happenings of the year: including the rock music, the Presidential campaign, assassinations, student unrest, theater, television, fashion and fads.

Black committee formed

The committee on the academic and social life of black students at Williams has met regularly to discuss admissions policy, academic counselling, black-white relations, and JA selection, according to committee members Kathey Dread '79 and Dave Libardi '77.

Dean of the College Peter Berek was unsure what decisions the committee might reach, or when they would reach some conclusions. He denied any specific problems to account for the committee's creation in February, saying rather than it was part of the re-accreditation procedure examining major changes at the College since the last re-accreditation ten years ago.

According to Dread, the committee formed because the Committee on Academic Standing reviewed the records of black students in a proportion not consistent with their numbers at Williams. One CAS member concurred, commenting that 10 per cent of the student body provided two-thirds of their cases.

Libardi agreed with Berek's progress report, saying that they "haven't decided what their goals should be" yet and do not know when they will have recommendations ready.

One problem the students observed was admissions policy. Admissions is curtailing inner-city recruiting to reduce its expenses, agreed Dread and Libardi. The committee recognizes that it is more efficient to go to prep and suburban schools to search for students, but complains that "the College has a commitment to black people, and they live in the inner-city." Observed another member, "we just want to get the best students, black or white, and right now we're getting the best white ones."

Academic problems, the students feel, might be solved by increased counseling for black students. This begins with careful selection of "approachable" JA's in the freshman year, and must continue with better academic counselling throughout the upper class years.

Two ask decriminalization of 'world's oldest profession'

Wednesday night a member of the Boston Prostitute's Union and COYOTE (Call Off Your Old Tired Ethics) spoke on the decriminalization of prostitution. The discussion was sponsored by the Republican Club.

Stephen Louis, a member of COYOTE gave a brief history of prostitution, "the oldest profession." He stated that the U.S. is one of a few countries to still consider prostitutes criminals even after a U.S. committee recommended that prostitution no longer be considered a crime in the 60's. The speakers stressed that it is one of a few victimless crimes.

Decriminalization means taking the laws off the books—not legalization, said Louis. Three common assumptions he feels ungrounded are 1. prostitutes contribute to drug abuse, 2. organized crime is deeply involved, and 3. prostitution accounts for much of venereal disease.

Louis and Jane, a call-girl, feel decriminalization would end robbery and assault of both prostitutes and their clientele. As the laws now stand, neither can safely go to police and complain. Decriminalization might end the need of prostitutes to have pimps for protection.

Speaking for her cohorts, Jane said they do not want federal regulations which might force them into reporting their income. Most prostitutes she knows take good care of themselves physically without any enforced regulations. While she entered the profession due to its flexible hours and good pay, she said money was not everyone's motive. While working the streets she turned 5-6 tricks a night at $20-30; now that she has an apartment she has 3-4 customers at $30-50.

The discussion grew volatile in Jesup as students, members of YAF, the Republican Club, Newman Association and Williams Women opened fire on the representatives and each other. Louis summed up his personal feelings by stating that he works for decriminalization to reduce the negative side-effects not because prostitution "is a great thing."

m weather athletic alternative or and afternoon sungods. Its water level should be high this spring, allowing ny for relatively safe jumping and yn sliding.

in Other spring-fed cascades include yn those at Mount Hope Farm, Triple R. er Brooks and the Chapel Hill Slide.

Roaring Brook, along the Roaring Brook Trail off Rte. 7 South is a particularly beautiful spot, but you are apt not to get wet above the waist. You may want to pedal to your swimming local to work up a sweat since spring water temperatures average 60 degrees. Even if the water were a more human temperature you would be limited to quick dips because of the small size of the pools.

If longer distance swimming seems more appealing, and if Muir Pool is too confining (and especially if the Cole Field Pond does not sound too appetizing), then try either the reservoir off Rte. 7 near the Vermont line or the North Adams reservoir. If you're really energetic, stake out the Dorset, Quarry or the Rattlesnake Reservoir (yes, Rattlesnakes are common here), both in Vermont, or Lake Onota in Pittsfield.

Temperatures in those lakes and pools are guaranteed to induce a rosy complexion. At Muir Pool, there is a hot shower waiting for you, but you won't have the warm sun, goosebumps, bubbling water, or, if you're not discreet, a policeman waiting to book you. (Reservoir swimming is illegal folks).

A spot called the Halifax Gorge in Halifax, Vermont was until now one of the best kept swimming secrets. Rumor has it that "bathing suit" is a foreign word here, and its many cliffs, pools and rocky ledges make it well-worth the hour drive. You can dive from a 10 foot waterfall and then graduate to cliffs upwards of 30 feet high. There is a thrilling alternative to cliff-diving, a rope swing over one pool. Bring your date and have her watch you.

If you're planning to play hookey, then, and relive golden school days, the waters are waiting, cold as they may be. As corny as it sounds, swimming provides cerebral as well as epidermal invigoration. After all, everyone is a little bit of a Huckleberry Finn.

Playwright Shange gives colloquium

The author of the Broadway play "For Colored Girls Who Have Considered Suicide-When the Rainbow is Enuf" will be at Williams College Tuesday, April 19th. Ntozake Shange will conduct a colloquium on "Poetry as Theatre" at 4 p.m. in the Driscoll Lounge, and will read from her poems at 8 p.m. in Room 3 of Griffin Hall. The events are open to the public.

Shange is a 28-year-old poet whose "Colored Girls" has rocketed her into prominence as the stage's newest highly acclaimed playwright. The choreopoem, as it is called, is a prose and poetry exploration of the experience of black women that features seven actresses; she was one of the cast until recently.

Shange's play and her poems have a strong feminist tone that is derived, she said in a New York Times interview, from her life experiences. "We have to demand the regularness of being human; just stop saying being black is a drag, it's really tough and dipsadeedah, all of which is true," she said in the interview. "We have always been people. We must be allowed the right to be just regular Joe Blow.

"I think we have been living on so little emotionally for so long that somebody forgot that because you never have it, don't mean you didn't need it," she continued. "All I have to deal with as a woman is the results of the pressure on all of us."

Ntozake Shange, whose name was given to her six years ago by two South African friends and replaced Paulette Williams, will appear at Williams under the sponsorship of the Afro-American Studies Committee, the departments of English and theatre, and Williams Women.

Ntozake Shange, aged 28, wrote the acclaimed Broadway play "For Colored Girls Who Have Considered Suicide - When the Rainbow is Enuf." She will conduct a colloquium and read from her poems Tuesday.

Marcel Ophuls presents film-lecture

Marcel Ophuls, writer and director of "The Sorrow and the Pity," and "A Sense of Loss," will give a film-lecture presentation at Williams College Tuesday, April 19, at 8 p.m. in Jesup Hall Auditorium. Part of the Williams Lecture Committee's series, "Film: Significance and Possibilities," the talk is free and open to the public.

Ophuls will speak on his recently released film, "The Memory of Justice," and will augment his talk with a screening of two reels from his new work. Frank Rich of the New York Post has written: "If a more important documentary than 'The Memory of Justice' has been made during my lifetime, I do not know what it is." Vincent Canby of the New York Times said 'The Memory of Justice' expands the possibilities of the documentary motion picture in such a way that all future films of this sort will be compared to it.

Ophuls uses material from newsreels, archive footage, interviews, scrapbook photos, in his documentaries, and creates an intense and personal statement. Currently a Visiting Senior Fellow in Humanities at Princeton University, Ophuls has lived and worked in the United States for extended periods of time, as well as in France and Germany.

On Exhibit . . .

"Varieties of British Landscape Art" has recently opened at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown. This small exhibition of twenty-seven prints, drawings and watercolors, drawn from the collections of the Williams College Museum of Art and the Clark Art Institute, suggests the range of landscape images by British artists from the late eighteenth to the early twentieth century. Less formal, more intimate, and often more personal than oil paintings, these works display various techniques and subjects explored by British artists over a long period of time. Changes in style are evident, from the freely drawn "Picturesque" watercolor, Landscape with View over Distant Plain by Thomas Gainsborough, through the more grandly conceived watercolors by J. M. W. Turner, to the twentieth-century virtuoso etchings by Seymour Haden and James McBey. Generally small in scale, the works in this exhibition present an opportunity to enjoy a group of images displaying a wide diversity of style and mood. The exhibit was organized by J. Dustin Wees, Photograph and Slide Librarian at the Institute, and will be on view during the open hours of the Institute through April 24.

Passersby on the fifth floor of Stetson Hall will notice from now until May 31, "Art of the Dogon," a collection of pieces from the Dogon Of Mali. The show was prepared by Ben Heintz, '79, with the sponsorship of the Anthropology Dept.

"Georgian Grace: English Silver in the Age of Elegance" is the title of an exhibition which opened Tuesday, April 5, at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown.

Focusing on the eighteenth century, the exhibit includes more than fifty items reflecting the standard of excellence achieved by English silversmiths of this period. Preeminent among these is Paul de Lamerie (1688-1751), long recognized as one of England's most talented and inventive Hugenot artists. Many examples of his work will be on view.

Included in the exhibition are tea and coffee pots, an impressive two-handled cup, candlesticks and other silver articles representative of the flamboyant rococco style. Examples of contemporary porcelain, furniture and prints will offer stylistic comparisons.

The exhibition will be on view through June 19. It has been organized by Beth Susan Carver and Eileen M. Casey, students in the Williams College—Clark Art Institute Program in the History of Art.

A major exhibition of "European Manuscripts: LX to XV Centuries" is currently on display in the Chapin Library. The exhibit includes 27 bound codices from the Library's collection and five which are on loan from the Williams College Museum of Art.

The manuscripts in the exhibition include Carolingian and Greek works, Gothic Theological commentaries, Gothic devotional manuscripts and Humanistic codices. On display will be Books of Hours; Psalters; biblical commentaries and a Vulgate Bible. Also on exhibit are some scholarly texts by such writers as Hugo of St. Victore, Voragine, and St. Augustine as well as three fifteenth century texts of Dante, Ovid and Virgil.

Continuing on Display in a separate area of the Chapin Library gallery is "Miscellany of Nineteenth Century Autograph Letters from American and British authors," from the Julia Ward Howe and Samuel Gridley Howe collection. The collection includes letters from, among others, Henry James, Helen Keller, Goethe, John Brown, James Russell Lowell, William Lloyd Garrison, John Greenleaf Whittier, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and John Quincy Adams.

followed Leinbach were Jon Rathgeber (4:37), Brian Harrison (4:39), Mark Chaffee (4:40) and Steve St. Clair (4:54). Ron White, one of Farley's most consistent winners, added five points to the Williams total with a solid first place in the 120 yard high hurdles. White floated over the barriers for a comfortable win at 15.0 while Tom Selden finished out of the scoring at 16.4.

The Ephmen were shut out in both sprints plus the 440 yard dash and intermediate hurdles, but picked up a much needed five points in the 880. Dave Seeger used his come from behind kick to secure second place with a 1:58.8 clocking, and Vin Zinicola finished one place behind at 2:00.4. Backing up the two scorers were Darrell Wallace (2:03), Lee Jackson (2:03) and Jeff Coombs (2:06).

Frank Carr closed out the scoring on the track as he added the final five points of the day with a 14:48.6 victory in the three mile run. Freshman Mike Behrman followed Carr through the first mile in 4:55 but then faded out of contention and crossed the finish stripe at 15:49. Tomorrow a Williams contingent will head down to the UMass Relays for a taste of the top New England competition. The superb UMass track should give the runners a good shot at qualifying for the various post season championships.

Golf juggernaut primed for spring roll

by Dave Tomaszek

The Williams varsity golf team, a melange of battle-grizzled veterans, returned from a rigorous southern swing with thoughts of the decimation to be loosed on spring opponents.

Blonde-maned co-captain Steve Saunders enhanced his titan image with the best scoring, both on the course and at the Orlando Days' Inn. These feats of dominance were made possible by the absence of fellow captain and college champion Dave Tomaszek, who opted for two weeks with the Polish aristocracy in lieu of the southern insanity. Dan Katz' number three fall position may be in jeopardy: a second rendezvous with Dr. Ellison's orthopedic knife could be in the offing for the smooth sophomore.

Sure to figure prominently are seniors Chris Vogelsang, Charlie Haines, and Barney Ireland. Vogelsang, perennial NESCAC tournament terror, must be counted upon to fulfill his vast potential, while Haines will depend upon legendary physical prowess to overpower the links. Ireland, wielding his Black Beauty graphite shaft with the aplomb of a medieval sorcerer, relies upon his Augusta bred game and acute ingenuity.

The talented crew of underclassmen is led by junior, martini-drinking Florida land excavator Doug Chumbley, and sophomores Bill Upton and Mike Lynch. This trio showed signs of promising play down south; all have a history of fine match accomplishments. Further support should come from a deep and skilled group of freshmen, most notably Ed Bousa and Marcel "Chip" Oudin, who each distinguished themselves with medal winning scores in fall matches. Chris Holm, protege of the aforementioned Sire Vogelsang, is expected to play well if he can avoid the inevitable female distractions that materialize in his path. Dan Chapman, Bill Sprague, and assorted other hopefuls old and new round out the squad.

The varsity plays an ambitious fourteen match schedule that includes seven Division One powers. But coach Rudy Goff, whose linksters have the highest winning percentage of any athletic team since the inception of the sport at Williams in 1903 agrees with intrepid mentor—manager Bill Goodell, "If we play half as well as we look, nobody's going to touch us.

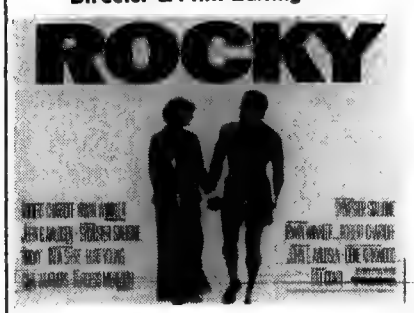
It was like that for the Ephs early in the game: everything worked. Passes found their mark, ground balls came up in Purple sticks, Eli shots caroomed harmlessly off the pipe, and Lamb's defense cleared far more effectively than they have all year.



But when the ceiling fell in it brought the roof with it. Yale coach Bob McHenry adjusted his offense to Williams' sliding defensive style, sticking one middie way out front so the defenders couldn't back up on the driving attackmen. The attackmen weren't looking to score, though, and their feeds to cutting middies on this play produced at least three tallies.

Tomorrow Connecticut, the final visitor in the current homestand, turns up at 2:00 p.m.

Elis overpower laxmen, 17-13

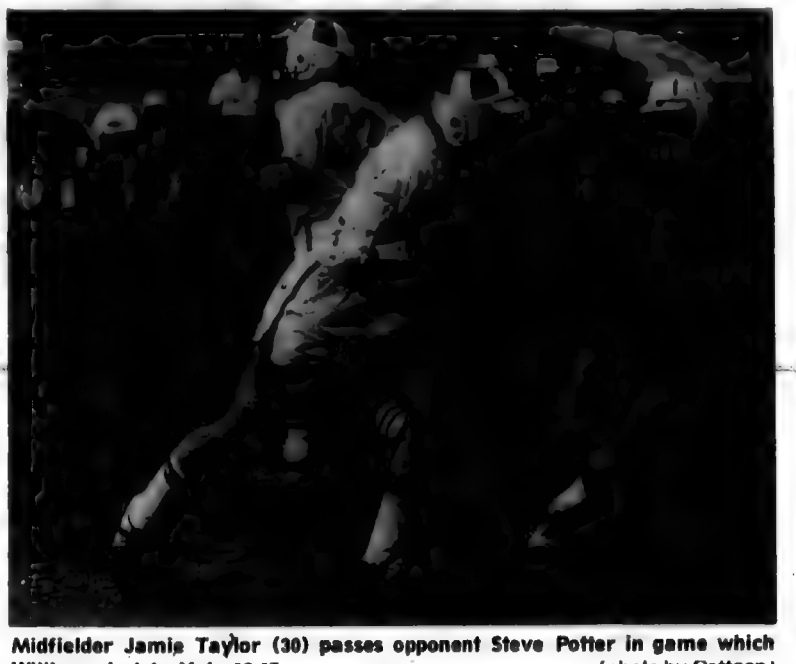
by Dennis O'Shea

For a long, long time, in fact until nearly two minutes into the fourth quarter, it looked like Williams might just pull it off again. Fittingly, though, it was attackman Andy Murr who drove the left corner, and executed a textbook double-jukestep-turn-and-fire, to put Yale on top for good and shatter Eph hopes for a second Cole Field upset of the Elis in three years. Fittingly, because Murr's tally at 1:54 of the final canto capped off a run of five straight third quarter assists that kept the Elis, New England's sixth ranked team, in the ballgame until the ninth rated Purple scoring automaton ran smack into a severe energy shortage. It was the ninth lead change of the afternoon.

After the go-ahead tally midfielder Jim Graham scored twice, assisted by Murr both times, and Yale's other two attackmen got one apiece. Attackman Dave Moffitt snapped an 18 minute Eph scoring drought with ten seconds left. That cut the final deficit to 17-13.

Purple coach Renzie Lamb tabbed midfield defense as the weak link in the Williams effort. All seven Murr feeds went to midfielders (four of them to Graham), and, in all, Yale middies put in 13 tallies.

"Anybody willing to move the ball in the midfield scored," complained Lamb. "We ran out of gas in the third period, stopped being aggressive, stopped talking, stopped moving."



The Eph offense pulled up short at the same time and an offensive unit that for 2½ quarters had put together the best show of crisp, precise passing and aggressive cutting in four years suddenly couldn't pick up the ball or put it in a cutter's stick. For the third time this spring the Ephmen broke into double figures, but for the first time it was the Purple middies who did the bulk of the scoring, leaving attackmen Todd Eckerson and Peter Thomsen free to concentrate on controlling the ball and finding the open man. Each put a pair past tough Yale target Bob Izard, but, even more importantly, they combined for nine assists.

Early in the game, every Eph offensive player knew just where to look for a loose stick, and that stick was almost always there. Rather than shooting, each made that one extra pass to set up a quickstick goal that got by Izard before he could turn to see it.

For instance, Williams' tenth and eleventh goals came off third period fast breaks that left Eckerson with the ball all alone high in the restraining area. The junior attackman, who sports a five assist per game average, turned immediately to the crease where he found Thomsen and hat tricker Collie Nelson.

Early in the contest middie Jamie Taylor had scooped a bouncing ground ball out near the midline, and completed a spectacular blind over the shoulder toss to Thomsen down low. Thomsen dropped a perfect feed to Eckerson on the backside and Izard didn't have a prayer.

Trackmen open with losses to So. Conn, UNH

by Frank Carr

"It's going to be a long spring", said Eph track coach Dick Farley after opening day losses to both Southern Connecticut and the University of New Haven on Tuesday. The Williams trackmen scored in only 7 of 18 events but did manage to avoid a winless record by slipping past the host team Westfield State. The Ephmen garnered individual victories in a mere four events, while Southern Conn. monopolized the winner's stand with ten first places.

Captain Rich Remmer was the leading Williams point-getter with a total of eight in three events. Remmer opened up with a 48 foot put to win the shot and then at the close of the meet he grabbed 3rd in the discus at 137 feet. In the hammer throw, Larry Tanner's 155' 3" second place effort paced the captain who recorded a 4th place toss of 146' 9". There were no purple points chalked up in the jumps, but sophomore Stan Parese gave an excellent performance in the pole vault, springing 12 feet in his first collegiate track meet.

Ken Leinbach started off the running event scoring with a one mile victory in 4:22.7. Leinbach followed a slow early pace but blazed a 59.7 final quarter for a fine opening day clocking. The four purple shirts that

Netmen bomb Union, lose to Green

Some might call it a form of justice. If that's true, the varsity tennis team could have done with a little less justice and a lot more wins on Wednesday as they were dismantled by Dartmouth 9-0 only two days after thrashing Union 8-1.

The split gives the Ephs a 1-3 season mark, a record that would not be sorely missed should it be blown away like so many tennis balls on the windy Williams' courts. Coach Dave Johnson must now rally his team as they head into the middle part of the season and prepare for several traditionally close matches.

Williams was looking for its first win of the year against Union, and the team earned it with strong play down the line. At no. 1 singles, Martin Goldberg surrendered only two games to a player the Union coach before the match had stated would go undefeated this year. Jim Parsons played a close first set and then breezed through the second for a good win, while no. 3 Perry Nelson took the opposite route to get at the same result. Losing his first match of the year was No. 4 Evan Bash, but Tad Roach remained undefeated with a strong showing at no. 5. Mitch Reiss then scored an easy win to clinch a Williams' victory before the doubles teams took to the courts.

These teams had taken a beating in the year's first two matches but they were too sharp for Union as the duos of Dean Gianakos and Nelson and Bill Whelan and Goldberg each recorded their first season wins. Roach and Bash easily scored their third consecutive win of the year.

Dartmouth proved to have too much firepower for the Ephs to respond to. Goldberg dropped a close match and Parsons got off to a slow start and never did find his stride in losing at no. 2. Nelson, too, had an off day and Bash fell in a tight match. The impressive winning streak of Roach was stopped by a strong foe, while Whelan was squeezed out in the closest match of the day in his first singles appearance of the season.

The Ephs failed to salvage anything from the match as the three doubles teams that were so impressive against Union proved unable to come up with any wins.

Crew breezes by Holy Cross

by Tom Klumpp

The Williams oarsmen picked up their fourth, fifth, and sixth straight wins of the season as the heavy, light and freshman boats breezed easily past their Holy Cross opponents in Worcester last Friday.

In the varsity event, the Eph heavies exploded off the start into a commanding six seat lead after only ten strokes. Stroke Gavin Watson then settled the boat down to an almost leisurely 28 stroke per minute pace while the weaker Holy Cross boat, rowing at a 32, struggled unsuccessfully to come back. The Ephs crossed the 2000 meter finish line in 6:36, the best time of the day, winning by 13 seconds.

The lights, facing a strong but inexperienced JV squad, found themselves half a length down after a rough start in very choppy water. They soon regained their form, powering past the opposition for a 2 length lead at the 500 meter mark. The Ephmen continued to pull away steadily, finishing in 6:39, almost 30 seconds up.

The Holy Cross freshman cox, apparently postulating that a crooked path through smooth water is faster than a straight route through the chop, proceeded diagonally off the start toward the shore's lee, leaving the Eph Freshmen somewhat confused as to the whereabouts of their opposition. If their idea was correct, it wasn't nearly enough, as the hosts were quickly left behind. The purple frosh cruised home in just over 7 minutes, posting a devastating 17 length victory margin.

The Ephs return to homes waters next weekend, facing Connecticut College Saturday at Lake Onota in Pittsfield.

Booming bats destroy Trinity

by Frank Pergolizzi

The young Williams baseball team stretched their record to 2-0 Tuesday with a 13-7 victory over Trinity, in Hartford. Coupled with last Saturday's 14-2 victory over RPI, the potent Williams bats have accounted for 27 runs in two games, an outstanding 13.5 runs per game average.

Starring in the Trinity victory was sophomore Ken Hollingsworth who was two for two, with five runs batted in, one run scored, and a grand-slam home run in the top of the ninth, icing the game for Williams. Scott Harrington, Roger McEniry, and Frank Kreutz each knocked in two runs for the Ephmen.

Solid sophomore righthander Tom Albert was the winning pitcher with help from Mike Martineau in the seventh.

Williams got off to an early 8-0 lead, saw it melt to 9-7 in the bottom of the eighth, and then went ahead for good on the giant boost of Hollingsworth's four run blast.

The Ephs face a big weekend of baseball on Weston field hosting Colby Friday at 3:30 and Bowdoin in a big Saturday twin bill, with the teams taking the field at 1 p.m.

VOL. 90, NO. 47 WILLIAMS COLLEGE APRIL 19, 1977

The Trustees are meeting this Friday and Saturday to discuss College finances and building renovations. Can you pick out YOUR house's Trustee in this photo?

Trustees to face full agenda

The Board of Trustees will meet Friday and Saturday to discuss the financial status of the College, the renovation of Chapin Hall and Garfield House, and honorary degrees and faculty changes, according to Francis H. Dewey, 3rd, secretary to the Board of Trustees. In addition, the trustee Committee on Campus Life will meet Friday with the Committee on Undergraduate Life to discuss College issues, said Dewey.

House trustees will have dinner in their respective residential houses on Thursday, when possible, followed by committee meetings on Friday and a meeting of the full Board of Trustees on Saturday.

On Friday, the Budget and Financial Planning Committee of the Board will discuss how to finance the debt incurred by the construction of Mission Park and the renovation of Garfield and Morgan. There will also be a "very preliminary discussion of the idea of supplementing financial aid with loans directly to parents", said Dewey.

The renovation of Garfield House and phase 2 of the Chapin Hall renovation will occupy the Trustee Committee on Buildings and Grounds.

The College investment managers, George Johnson and Paul Miller, will discuss the status of the endowment and current economic conditions with the trustee Committee on Finance Committee, added Dewey.

The Committee on Instruction will approve compensation for faculty, and will discuss new appointments and resignations.

The Committee on Degrees will decide on a theme for next year's convocation, and will approve honorary degrees to be awarded at convocation and at commencement.

The Development Committee and the Society of Alumni will also meet Friday to discuss fund raising the Alumni Fund and the Capital Fund.

Students see Steering Committee

"We do a lot of talking and very little acting," Faculty Steering Committee member Gary Jacobsohn admitted to students at an open forum Thursday.

Four members of the committee, Professors Irwin Shainman, Michael Katz, Roger Bolton, and Jacobsohn met with students to discuss the committee's relations with students, faculty, and the student-faculty committees. Steering Committee members concurred that they exerted little direct influence on students in their role as representatives of the faculty.

Shainman reviewed the purposes of the committee. "We manage faculty meetings by drawing up agendas," he said. The committee also recommends faculty members for student-faculty committees, works with the president on campus crises, and represents the faculty in compensation talks.

"We serve as a forum for faculty members who feel they need a vehicle for complaint," Shainman added. He called the field of appointments and promotions the "most touchy" of the committee's concerns. He explained that although the committee evaluates the procedures used in the hiring and promoting process, they make no value judgments.

Students attending the forum criticized the committee's closed meetings and the absence of student representation. Committee members argued that open meetings and student representation would hinder confidentiality in meetings.

Shainman said, "We're not trying to hide from students; it's just that the things we deal with rarely directly affect students." Members recalled meetings with former College Council President Steve Piltch and various student groups, emphasizing their openness to student input. They did not rule out future open forums to gather student opinion.

Major exercise optional

The faculty voted last Wednesday to make the major exercise optional at the discretion of departments because departments were simply not complying with the old legislation, according to George Geothals, chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy.

The old legislation required that departments have a major exercise either distinct from or incorporated in the major seminar. Several departments, however, interpreted this to mean that the seminar was equivalent to the major exercise. In this case, departments did not administer the major exercise at all.

The optional, pass-fail major exercises won't take effect until 1979, Goethals explained, because those departments which might want to have a major exercise must have it approved by the faculty, a process which requires at least a year. Goethals noted that next year, however "most departments will see that the major exercise is unravelling, and count the seminar as the exercise."

The new legislation will greatly reduce the number of departments which use the major exercise, according to Goethals. "Nobody is taking the major exercise seriously any more," he said. "The faculty doesn't like it. The legislation comes as close as anything could to abolishing it."

The CEP did not recommend that the major grade be abolished, but Professor Thomas McGill proposed an amendment to this aspect, from the floor. Goethals explained that the committee considered it unfair to students to have a grade from a single test recorded on their transcripts. "The major grade gave you a place to put the major exercise grade," said Goethals.

McGill said that the major grade was "not only a useless anachronism but a nuisance as well. It comes so late in a student's career that it is completely meaningless."

Experts evaluate scope of language department

Six experts on language instruction spoke with students Friday to determine their opinions of the scope and effectiveness of the language departments at Williams.

Both majors and students enrolled in lower level courses discussed the variety of classes offered in the French, Spanish, German and Russian departments.

The directors of the discussions, departmental heads from other small liberal arts colleges around the country, also tried to elicit comments on enrollment figures and student motivation for taking language courses at a school like Williams.

One student commented on the limited number of intermediate level course offerings in one department. Others stressed that there was not enough emphasis on language itself within any one department. "Too often the language is viewed only as a tool rather than a subject in itself. There should probably be more advanced offerings in the spoken language so that this aspect is not lost," a language major said.

The meeting with students was part of an overall evaluation of the Committee applications available

The College Council is now accepting self-nominations for various student and student-faculty committees. The Election Committee will make recommendations to the council, who will appoint members next week.

Applications are available at the Dean's office, and the completed forms should be returned there by Friday, April 22. Appointees will take over from present members next fall, except in the case of the already appointed Finance Committee, which will take office this spring.

Listed below are the open committees with a short explanation of their purposes and functions.

Afro-American Studies—Attempts to develop full program: course sequences, exchanges with black schools, etc., which relate to the black experience.

Athletics—Advises and consults with the Director of Athletics on matters involving athletics, physical education and recreation.

By-Laws—Will compile all the council rules and regulations; updates the constitution; evaluates the present structure as to its effectiveness, and makes recommendations for reform.

Calendar and Schedule—Makes recommendations to the faculty concerning the academic calendar and the scheduling of classes.

Education aid bill raises questions

by Peter Rintels

President Carter has introduced a new aid-to-education package to Congress which asks for $1 billion more than former President Ford's recommendation. The allocation plan, however, has alarmed many Congressmen who claim that it will cost many working-class families the chance to pay for their childrens' education, and that allocations are biased toward rural states.

Carter's request asks for $3.3 billion in aid for the fiscal year beginning October 1. It calls for increases in the basic educational opportunity grant program (BEOG), and the college work-study program. It also restores funding to the supplementary educational opportunity grant program (SEOG) which Ford had planned to cut. Finally, Carter has asked for an end to the direct student loan program, for which he has drawn fire from legislators and Massachusetts politicians.

Carter says he believes that the increasing default rate on loans and increases in monies from other sources has ended the need for the program. Representative Carl Perkins of Kentucky, chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, however, said that ending direct student loans would mean that "hundred of thousands of working class families would probably have to terminate the education of their children."

Massachusetts Lieutenant Governor Thomas P. O'Neill, III has estimated that cutting the program would cost Massachusetts students over $16 million a year in loans. Direct Student Loan funds, (along with SEOG and work-study money) are given directly to colleges to be distributed as part of their normal financial aid packages.

According to Director of Financial Aid Henry N. Flynt, loss of the aid money "as much as we're grateful for it, would not put us out of business." Williams receives approximately $26 to $28,000 in student loan funds, barely 1½ per cent of Williams' total financial aid monies of $2 million. Government loans are offered at 3 per cent interest, as opposed to the normal rate of 7 per cent, so they are generally assigned to the hardest pressed families. If the money were lost, Flynt said he expects it could be made up from other sources.

Flynt, however, explained that this is only true of Williams because the College has systematically set aside endowment funds for financial aid. Newer schools, particularly community colleges like North Adams State, often have financial aid programs based entirely on federal money. Any cut in funding to these institutions would be a serious blow.

The work-study funds are also endangered by the Carter proposal. Although the absolute amount of funds

Another letter: Cheating

To the editor:

In the April 12 issue of the Record, a letter to the editor written by Lawrence Wu contained a few inaccuracies. Lawrence states that nearly half the students in an upper level course were suspected to have violated the Honor Code, and as a result academic probation has become a real possibility for some unfortunate students in the class. If Lawrence had checked with any member of the Honor Committee, he would have found that both of his statements are false. In addition, he would have found that not only is the Honor Committee NOT "scouring for scapegoats," but that we do our best to decide every case individually and fairly, in fact giving the accused the benefit of the doubt. When Lawrence wrote that, "Academic probation had become a real possibility for some unfortunate students in the class, with compliments from the Honor Committee," he was undoubtedly expressing a genuine concern.

First of all, academic probation is not one of the responsibilities of the Honor Committee. The Honor Committee only enforces disciplinary penalties, not academic penalties. This distinction is very important.

In addition, the concept of academic honesty does not vary from year to year or from person to person. Either a student is honest or not. Any "unfortunate" student who cheats is responsible for the consequences, not the Honor Committee.

Nevertheless, Lawrence raised some worthwhile questions concerning the workings of the Honor Code. After talking with Lawrence and other concerned faculty and students, it is apparent that there exists an inherent problem with take home exams and there is a lack of uniform guidelines which all faculty may follow. The Honor Committee is aware of those problems and is working towards a solution. We have invited Lawrence to share his ideas with us at our next meeting. Anyone else who wishes to contribute their ideas and concerns is welcome to join the Honor Committee next Monday, April 29 at 4:30 p.m. in room 12, Hopkins.

Letters: Charges of racism

To the editor:

Due to an error in layout, four paragraphs were omitted from my "Focus" column in last Friday's issue. Given the controversial nature of the subject of the column and the large amount of response which I have received, I'd simply like to have the gist of those paragraphs put on the record.

The omitted paragraphs fell in between the final two paragraphs of the column. In the first of those paragraphs, I argued that there simply weren't that many qualified black basketball players at Williams, and that given a number of academic and recruiting considerations, it was unrealistic to expect that there should be that many.

I did not state that there weren't any black ballplayers capable of playing varsity basketball at Williams, however. In the edited section I maintained that even if Williams did land a bunch of kids who could tap dance on the rim and dunk the ball with their big toes, be they black or white they'd still have to dive on the floor after loose balls and not get beat back door before they'd earn a starting berth on a Coach Tong team.

Several blacks have told me that they find this system hard to play under, however, and feel that it discriminates against the type of player who excels in a run and gun system. They also feel that if Williams were to play more of a fastbreak type of game, a great many more blacks would make the varsity basketball team here.

In this edited section I made two points regarding this belief. First, the "discrimination" applies to white and black players alike. The 15 players who comprise the varsity basketball team are not necessarily the 15 best players at Williams. In the judgment of Coach Tong, however, they are the 15 players (of those who tried out) best suited for the type of ball he wants his team to play—a brand of ball, I would point out, very similar to that played by Marquette, Holy Cross, Army, and especially Princeton.

Hence, the criteria for determining who makes the basketball team at Williams revolve around basketball questions, not racial ones. And the basketball philosophy employed by Coach Tong is just that—a basketball philosophy, not a racist strategy aimed at excluding blacks. To label a program that employs a patient, controlled brand of basketball as racist is to mistakenly condemn a school of basketball philosophy utilized by a number of colleges across the country and involving a number of black athletes.

Second, I went on to maintain in the edited section that the issues which have caused three blacks to quit the basketball team in the past four years have, again, been issues of basketball philosophy rather than race. It is my opinion that in trying out for a Coach Tong team, a player not only accepts the system employed by Tong, but also indicates that he will try his best under that system. This means hustling, playing defense, and playing under control on offense. The blacks who quit believe they were doing these things, yet weren't receiving sufficient playing time for their efforts or capabilities. Once again I would point out, however, that these are basketball questions, not racial ones. Furthermore, they are issues shared by white players as well as blacks. The white player who feels he isn't playing as much as he should doesn't have the option of labelling basketball coaching decisions as racial, however.

Whether or not the edited four paragraphs add a different perspective to the column is, like everything else I've said, subject to debate. But before Mrs. Marlowe has to install a switchboard to handle my phone calls, I'd like to have all my cards on the table.

Sincerely,
Andy O'Donnell

To the editor:

With regard to the on-going debate about racism in the Williams basketball program, I am deeply distressed by the shallow approach taken by the two white students in their rebuttal of Tony Cornett's timely article. Both Tim and Andy showed a total lack of understanding of racism's many complexities, and each felt that the entire issue could be swept under the rug by merely attesting to the personality of coaching personnel and by citing the existence of black starters on past Williams basketball teams. It's not that simple fellas! Racism, where it exists, is well-supported by an infrastructure that transcends the individual personalities of coaches or players. In addition, because of racism's chameleon characteristics and the myriad of avenues down which the beast can travel, the mere fact of a black athlete starting or receiving "a good deal of prime time playing time" in no way proves or disproves racism's existence. Jackie Robinson, white baseball's first black player, toiled as a starter, under racist conditions so onerous that few people today could tolerate. More recently, five black basketball players at Notre Dame were booed by their South Bend fans when, in the course of a game, the three who were subs joined the two black starters on the court.

That racism and prejudice are an enigma to many whites comes across poignantly in the narrow FOCUS article. For example, it states that blacks are expected to excell on basketball teams, and the author obviously does not realize that such expectations based on a player's color are racist. It is sad to realize that on June 5 people still so naive about racial matters will be handed diplomas conferring unto them the states of well-educated individuals. Moreoever, it is utterly frightening to me as a Black American to fathom that from this group will be drawn future leaders of this country.

I hope that the Williams community does not dismiss lightly the issue of racism in athletics, and I urge that endeavors be undertaken immediately to assess the dispassionate realities of the situation and expose them to both blacks and whites alike. Ideally, these efforts will proceed under the direction of individuals a bit more objectively responsible than those who have up until now (inclusively) written publicly about the subject. At this point I'd like to caution readers against succumbing to the oft-observed desire to declare the personal views of a BSU member to be the "official" line of the WBSU. I do invite, however, those who feel that my statement closely mirrors concerns that they have to make this fact known to the Record or the Administration.

Ronald C. Long

To the editor:

Andy O'Donnell's April 15th commentary, "But can They play?" was an unfortunate exercise in poor taste. I have no quarrel with Andy's premise that organized sports at Williams, specifically basketball, are not imbued with racism. Since I have little knowledge of this particular situation, I leave the dispute about racism in sports to others. However, the manner and implication of the column shows at the very least gross insensitivity.

The entire argument is infused with snide comments, innuendo and a paternalistic attitude. The title, "But can They play?", when tied to the context of the article evokes whispers of condescension. The categorization of Tony Cornett as being possessed by his emotions and not being capable of understanding "crucial factors" is just a shade away from, "Oh, they just don't understand the way it is." The author also used the epithet "brothers" in contemptuous manner suggesting of ridicule. But for myself, the most galling line was,

> "And given the academic requirements of Williams—(my emphasis) its lack of any real basketball reputation . . . it is unrealistic to expect that there should be that many. (Black players)

Perhaps the author does not understand the implications of his sentence. None the less, that statement is an ill advised proposition that Blacks are not up to the intellectual rigors of Williams. Since they are not able to work physically or mentally, perhaps Andy would like to confine them to the Fort, where HEW agents can be shown "our" groups and Federal money will still flow.

Race is a very sensitive issue and it behooves us to move with a recognition of our own potential for "discreet" bigotry.

Sincerely,
Bruce D. Goerlich '80

Viewpoint

But Can They See And Will They Ever See?

Racism is a nasty word. More importantly, racism is a nasty attitude. That being the case, the majority of the people in the Williams College community are nasty people. The RECORD staff can count itself among that number. Andy O'Donnell asks, "But, can they play?" I ask, "But, can they see?" Jeffrey May, co-captain of the Williams wrestling team, proved he could 'play' when he finished fourth in New England in the 167 pound weight class earlier this year. The RECORD didn't inform us of this accomplishment.

A women's spring track team that boasts eight Black women on a team of thirteen proved it could 'play' when it went down to Westfield April 12 and won the women's competition. The RECORD failed to acknowledge the achievement. I doubt that this omission reflects a bias against women's athletic teams. Other women's teams are covered fairly well.

In reporting on the results of the Winter Track Easterns back in February the RECORD mentioned in one line Vernon Davis' third place finish in the hurdles. A third, by a freshman. That's not an every year occurrence. Lack of space couldn't have been the problem as the same article went on to devote two paragraphs to a fifth place finish by a two-miler.

Notice anything these successful Black athletes have in common, these who can 'play?' They all compete in sports where individual achievement is judged quite objectively. In wrestling and track you either beat someone or they beat you. There is very little room for subjective evaluation by coaches. Where are the Blacks who excel at team sports at Williams? Don't tell me about Reagan Miller or Sterling Kinsale; something motivated both to quit the basketball team. Don't tell me about Les Ellision and Derrick Robinson; both were Most Valuable Player of the basketball and baseball teams, respectively, their senior years. This demonstrated excellence, however, didn't prevent both from sitting on benches the majority of their first three years. Don't tell me about J. C. "Johnny" Chandler; he had quite uncomplimentary things to say about his experience and the experience of other Black athletes during his tenure at Williams. Before they left Les, Reagan, and J.C. made their feelings quite well known. Les wrote an article expressing his sentiments in a Spring 1974 issue of KUJICHAGULIA, then the WBSU newspaper. They were quite negative. To get Reagan's views I quote from an interview by D. C. Long of Reagan in a Spring 1975 issue of KUJICHAGULIA: "Reagan began to talk about the future of the Black athlete. He and I both agreed that for a Black who is a super athlete the road ahead is smooth for the most part. He went on to say that the Black who is not a superstar, but instead just an average athlete will find himself constantly being beaten out for positions by whites who are his equals or less." In the same issue I interviewed J.C. and he felt that "A lot of times a Black athlete's style just doesn't fit a Williams coaches' system." After giving an example of a situation where a Black athlete's style of play, not his attitude or ability, didn't "fit" J. C. went on to say "This is not to say that the only reason why Black players don't start is because they don't fit into a coach's system. I've seen cases where there's been no reason why a coach shouldn't have given a brother more playing time and it's burned me up."

Racism is not limited to the athletic program or the RECORD staff. For four years I've had to struggle in a Williams College community—students, faculty, staff, and administrators—which exudes racism. This racism is not unexpected. I've lived in America long eftough to expect racism any and everywhere. Most members of the Williams community seem to want to view Williams College as a perfect neverneverland, unpenetrated by the evils of the outside world. Racism here is compounded in its affect on Black students by an unwillingness at all levels to admit that it exists. Energies are expended trying to deny racism rather than admitting its existence and trying to do something about it. Anything a Black student gains as a result of being at Williams is gained in spite of the community rather than because of it.

The relevant question is not, "But, can they play?" The question which remains on the mind of this soon-to-be-and-relieved-to-be alumnus is, "But can they see and will they ever see?"

Choral Society presents Mendelssohn's Elijah

The Williams College Choral Society, conducted by Kenneth Roberts, will present Mendelssohn's Elijah on Saturday, at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall. Soloists Betty Allen, Berenice Bramson, William Parker, and Vinson Cole, the chorus of the Emma Willard School in Troy, N.Y., directed by Russell Locke, and an orchestra of 60 musicians will join the Choral Society in the performance of this music-drama.

Elijah is one of the major oratorios of the nineteenth century, and was enormously popular throughout the English empire and Germany. Written in 1845-6, it was the last big work composed by Mendelssohn, who died in 1847 at the age of 38. William Bartholomew translated the Scriptural passages, originally compiled by the German librettist in a skillful selection from fifteen different books of the Bible. Mendelssohn, who hurriedly composed the work in order to fulfill a commission from the city of Birmingham, England, used the opportunity to learn English while working with Bartholomew and the King James version of the Bible.

This oratorio includes six legends: drought and famine; Elijah in exile; Israel under King Ahab and worship of false idols like Baal; the continuing drought, despite Israel's repentance; Elijah's flight and meeting Queen Jezebel; and Elijah's sojourn on Mt. Horeb. Various selections from the work are well known as individual pieces, such as "He Watching over Israel," "Life Thine Eyes," the soprano's "Hear Ye, Israel," the alto's "O Rest in the Lord," the tenor's "If with all Your Hearts," and the bass' "Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, Isreal."

The work is written in the contrapuntal or fugal style often associated with Handel, and as such was a sort of homage to the British and their most famous choral master. Mendelssohn specified certain parts for children's voices, to be sung in this performance by the sixty-five girls in the Emma Willard School Chorus. At times, they also sing with the hundred mixed voices of the Williams Choral Society. The soloists' roles as various Old Testament figures are interwoven with the choral sections, to create a complete Biblical opera-drama.

Betty Allen, mezzo-soprano, has fashioned an international career and reputation out of a superb voice and personality. Born in Ohio, she won a scholarship to Tanglewood in the mid-Fifties and was promptly "discovered" by Leonard Bernstein, who selected her to sing the solo part in his Jeremiah Symphony. Allen will be remembered locally for her appearance with the Williams Choral Society in Brahms' Alto Rhapsody and in scenes from Virgil Thomson's opera about Susan B. Anthony, "Mother of Us All."

The three other soloists are making their first appearance in Williamstown this Spring. Berenice Bramson, electrified the musical world four years ago as an unheralded singer making her debut in Carnegie Recital Hall.

Vinson Cole, tenor, comes from Kansas City and is already singing important roles with the Philadelphia and Santa Fe Opera companies and in Europe, although he is still in his early twenties.

William Parker, baritone, is a native of Butler, Pennsylvania who graduated from Princeton with a degree in German languages. In the remarkably short time since then, he has won many prizes and awards.

cohesion, efficiency and place of language instruction at Williams.

The evaluation came as a result of two reports by the CEP and the Romanic and Russian language departments on the status of language instruction at Williams. Chairman of Romanic Languages, George Pistorius said, "Both the administration and the departments initiated the evaluation in order to give the College an idea of how we stood in terms of other institutions on this subject."

Aid bill raises questions

for the program is likely to increase, the formula for its distribution tends to be biased toward rural states.

The formula is based in part on how many children from a state come from families with incomes of under $3,000. Since public assistance is higher than this in most industrial states, funding is biased toward rural areas. Until now, Massachusetts has overcome the bias through Federal discretionary funds, but the Carter proposal calls for an end to these funds, a plan that would cost the state $9.6 million of its $19.1 million share of the money.

Again, however, the effect on Williams would be minor. The College at present receives $34,000 under this program, and should the proposed cut go into effect, this would be reduced to roughly $17,000. If the funds were not made up from anywhere, it would cost approximately 40 of the 200 students in the program their jobs. Flynt again held the possibility of this kind of cut to be unlikely.

Carter's aid package is presently under review by the House Subcommittee on Appropriations, and chances appear good that the money will be restored.

Smoke bomb obscures Log

The Log may be the favorite campus spot for getting bombed, but this is the first time it's gone this far. A smoke bomb was let off last Saturday night at the Schlitz "Movie Orgy". No damage was caused except a total blackening of the men's room wall and a terrible smell.

At ten o'clock a particularly offensive smell began to drift through the back room by the bar, and one patron said he wondered whether his drinking companion had been particularly uninhibited. Others took a more serious view of the situation, and, with a quick check out the window, saw thick smoke rolling through the parking lot. Sometimes there is "a policeman when you need one"—a cruising Williamstown Police car was flagged down on Spring Street, and they in turn called the Fire Department. Together with Dave Trawick, Log assistant manager, they searched the Log and found a burnt-out military issue smoke grenade resting on the window sill of the men's room.

Purple '9' takes two from Bowdoin, 5-0 and 10-2

by Frank Pergolizzi

"Everything is starting to gel. The team is really playing well together." A happy Jim Briggs spoke those words about his 4-1 baseball team after their sweep of Saturday's twin bill with Bowdoin. The double killing made the weekend quite productive, even with Friday's thrilling 6-5 loss to Colby.

Both wins were a combination of strong hitting and solid pitching. The first game saw Williams get only seven hits, but make most of them count, scoring five runs. Frank Kreutz, with three hits and four runs batted in, and Tom Redden, with two hits, two walks, and three stolen bases, led the offensive output for Williams. Sophomore righthander Tony Stall, scattering five hits while striking out seven, was impressive in shutting out the lackluster Polar-Bears. Stall, complementing a strong fast ball with a tricky curve, stifled the Bowdoin bats all afternoon. Stall, in his first start ever at Williams, was aided by two doubleplays turned over by short stop Scott Harrington. Both killed potential Bowdoin scoring threats.

The second game was again a tale of powerful Williams bats and strong pitching. Frank Kreutz, Scott Harrington, and Bob LaBombard led the hit parade knocking in five, two, and two runs respectively, and accounting for seven of the Ephmen's twelve hits among them. Junior Pete Kastrinelis, was also impressive, scattering four hits and giving up only one earned run.

Sophomore Kreutz was by far the player of the weekend. He drove in nine runs in the double-header, giving him thirteen on the season. Stretching back into his last three at bats against Colby Friday, he has hit safely in his last nine trips to the plate. This streak brings his batting average to a torrid .812, with thirteen hits in sixteen at bats. The left fielder's powerful bat has to have been a pleasant surprise for coach Briggs.

Friday's game saw Williams come back from a 6-0 deficit in the seventh and eighth innings, only to leave the tying run on third base in the bottom of the ninth. The Ephmen showed a lot of poise and enthusiasm, bouncing back from a tough loss with a doubleheader sweep. Junior Steve Maier picked up the loss to Colby.

Today at 3 P.M. Williams opens the Little Three season against the Wesleyan Cardinals. A victory here could get the Ephs on the road to the first undisputed Little Three title in some years.

Williams' Ultimate Frisbee Club, in action this weekend, was crushed by the University of New Hampshire Saturday as the squad went down in defeat 37-1. The team, playing in an earlier match last Wednesday, lost to RPI 51-22. Ultimate Frisbee will play a full schedule of matches this spring with their next competition at Hampshire this weekend for the Little Three title.

Stickers outgun UConn; face Union

by Nancy Rhein

It wasn't their best lacrosse, but then it wasn't Yale either, so just an ordinary effort was good enough to enable the Williams stockmen to defeat UConn 10-6 Saturday. Coming off last Wednesday's 17-13 loss to Yale, the Ephs lacked the crisp passing and hustling play which had kept them in the contest against the Elis until the fourth quarter. UConn, having challenged Yale in a 13-12 loss, was also playing a let-down version of its game as both teams looked sloppy early in the match, with Williams netminder Bob Cowin taking responsibility for keeping the Ephs in the game.

With UConn threatening, according to Williams coach Renzi Lamb, "Todd Eckerson took it upon himself not to let them beat us. His goals turned it around" as Eckerson got the team going. The junior attackman, with two goals and three asists, put the Ephs ahead in the first quarter on an unassisted burn-it past-the goalie shot off a sloppy UConn clear.

Middie captain Jamie Taylor also looked good for the team, tying the score in the first quarter off a feed from Dick Goodbody. The Ephs' midfield played well offensively, going for three goals although the middie defense was less effective, giving up three goals and four assists to the Conn mid-field.

UConn gunner Peter Murphy led the visitors charge on Cowin with three goals and one assist with Cowin picking off 18 strong shots. The Eph defense, with Unger playing rough in man-down situations, cleared effectively and steadily, feeding to the squad's "on again-off again" offense.

Playing well in the second quarter, Eckerson fed Gus Nuzzolese for a super goal from outside before UConn used a middie goal to make it 3-2. Then Eckerson really took off, firing several shots before connecting for an unassisted tally with 5 minutes left. Minutes later he added his second with a somewhat less than picturesque goal. Attackman Peter Thomsen converted the Ephs power play into a goal off of the stick of Dave Moffitt as the team began to play as they had against Yale.

With both teams playing more aggressively in the third quarter, it was up to Cowin to hold off UConn. Murphy in a rare Conn attack play scored early in the quarter, riling up Eckerson for another feed to Nuzzolese to make it 8-3.

Following a UConn penalty in the final minute of the third the Ephs maintained the ball to begin the quarter without a face-off. Failing to score on the man-up advantage, the team came back as Goodbody hit from Eckerson for the third run-up goal for six advantages. Both squads then slacked off, as UConn fired three more past Cowin and Company before Goodbody scored from Thomsen to finish the match.

The Ephs' offense reached double figures for the 4th time in four outings this season despite UConn's nationally recognized goalie (statistically). The team, ninth in the New England rankings last week will try to put together the skills that are there to improve that ranking this week.

The Ephs will need more than hard hitting and a sloppy game this Wednesday at 3:30 as they face an "out for blood" Union squad. Union, in the wake of the Ned Harkness hockey recruiting controversy, may try to overcome its grief over the coach's suspension as they take on the Ephs. Union, playing an uneventful NY schedule, has always looked to beat Williams, with this year no exception.

Provided the stickmen survive the trip to Union's turf, they meet an even better UMass squad Saturday on Cole field.

The stickmen's volatile game with UConn ended with a 10-6 win for the Ephs.

Norton elected ice-captain

Defenseman Jim Norton was elected captain of the 1977-78 Williams College hockey team at the team's annual awards banquet last Tuesday evening.

Norton, a starting defenseman since his freshman year, missed the last eight games of the past season and proved to be sorely missed—Williams lost seven of the eight games.

"He's a good feeder and has a good point shot, and he's excellent at breaking the puck out of the zone," said Williams Coach Bill McCormick. In his abbreviated season, the six-foot, 170-pound junior scored four goals and five assists, and had a plus-seven rating, the best on the team.

In the other awards presentations, senior goaltender Chuck Cremens was named Most Valuable Player, senior winger Brian Norris was chosen the Most Improved Player, and sophomore Seth "Chick" Johnson received the Team Spirit award.

Eph racketeers brain MIT, 8-1

by Evan Bash

The whizzes at MIT had their calculators and slide rules ready Saturday to keep track of what they figured would be one of those win-by-a-tie-breaker matches with the Williams varsity tennis team. What they hadn't figured on was that the Ephs would put it all together on a beautiful afternoon for tennis to short circuit both those calculators and the MIT team. Williams' 8-1 victory was the second of the year against three losses.

For the first time this year the Ephs' singles play was at a level Coach Dave Johnson expects. Martin Goldberg adjusted well to MIT's slow Har-Tru and scored a good 6-2, 6-3 win, while Jim Parsons slugged his way to victory, 6-3, 6-3. Celebrating his birthday before some hometown fans no. 3 Perry Nelson didn't disappoint anyone with a 7-5, 6-2 showing.

The second three Williams players all took it to the limit to score three set wins. Evan Bash came from behind in the third to win 2-6, 6-2, 7-6 and Bill Whelan's play was on a roller coaster trip as he secured a 6-1, 2-6, 6-1 victory. At no. 5 Tad Roach overcame a bad court, a bad day, some fifth story hecklers and his opponent in winning 6-3, 6-7, 6-2.

A revamped doubles line-up provided the Ephs with their last two wins of the day. Goldberg and Whelan, up from the second spot, each made it double wins for the day as they rolled 6-4, 7-6. The duo of Dean Gianakos and Nelson found it tough going as they fell 6-4, 6-3, but Parsons scored his second win of the day as he teamed with hard-charging Pete Friesen in a new doubles combination to record a 6-2, 7-5 victory. Williams faces a tough Harvard team at Cambridge today.

Frank Kreutz named athlete of the week

Frank Kreutz, left fielder on the varsity baseball team, has been chosen as the Record Athlete of the Week after driving in nine runs against Bowdoin on Saturday. The sophomore slugger picked up three hits and four R.B.I.'s in the first game of the twin bill and drove in another five in the second contest. Kreutz has hit safely in his last nine at bats and sports an extraordinary .812 average.

Honorable Mention—Junior Todd Eckerson led the varsity lacrosse team to a 10-6 victory over UConn on Saturday with a total of 2 goals and 3 assists. The Eph attackman also fired in two goals and combined with Peter Thomsen for nine assists in last Wednesday's battle with Yale.

Crews battle wind, Conn

by Wit McKay

Last Saturday the Williams College boat club raced Connecticut College on Lake Onota in Pittsfield. The lake, only recently cleared of ice, was very rough in a heavy direct cross wind, causing trouble for almost all of the crews.

The varsity lightweights handled the wind best, because of their great experience, and trounced the Conn. College crew by over two lengths.

Conn. College was unable to boat a heavyweight eight so the Williams Heavies broke up into two fours, with the middle four taking on Conn.'s heavy four and the bow and stern pairs racing a Freshman four. The boat club doesn't own any fours so they borrowed one from Conn., paddled up to the start and raced. It was a somewhat absurd situation for people who have never rowed together in a four, much less in a stiff crosswind. The heavy four lost by about ten seconds in over eight minutes. The second Williams four beat Conn. by twelve seconds, but were fourteen seconds behind the time of the first Williams four.

The Williams Freshmen were unable to cope with the wind and were beaten by a length and a half. The wind can be a very important factor in a race, as was demonstrated on Saturday. An eight, which is sixty feet long and 1½-2 feet wide can be blown right over by a breeze, and the crew that can row best (not necessarily strongest) will win.

The Williams Women also suffered from the wind, as the heavyweights lost by around a length and a half, while the lightweights (eight women under 130 and averaging 125) lost by about two lengths.

An abbreviated version of the Williams Track Team travelled to University of Massachusetts last Saturday to compete with some of the best runners in New England in the UMass Relays. Although the Ephs were missing many of their top competitors, those who were there managed to hold their own.

Junior weightman Larry Tanner hurled the hammer to a new personal best of 156 feet. Although he didn't pick up any points he did qualify for the NCAA Division III National meet.

Vin Zinacolli, Kenny Leinbach, Terry O'Reilly, and Dave Seeger combined for a sub-eight minute two-mile relay, good for a second place in the college division. Leinbach, O'Reilly, Seeger, and Dan Sullivan then combined for a distance medley team that took the college division title.

CC approves committee to study student power

A proposal by Sarah Thorne to form a committee to investigate student power won the overwhelming approval of the College Council Tuesday night.

According to Thorne, the committee will "look at the structure of the major bodies involved in decision-making, and evaluate them as to the student role in these bodies." She specified individual departments, student-faculty committees, faculty meetings and committees, and the administration as the four structures that the committee will examine.

The committee will consist of investigating one of the four "power structures." Two or three individuals will be elected from the student body to serve as general coordinators for the subcommittees, responsible for providing weekly progress reports to the council. Any student may serve on any of the subcommittees. Membership will be unlimited.

Council President Tom Herwitz saw the investigation of student-faculty committees as the new committees' most important immediate charge, since the faculty steering committee is presently considering a reduction of the number of faculty members serving on these committees.

Mike Lissack reported that the student course guide will not be ready for distribution until Monday, due to delays caused by typing problems. Lissack's report produced dismay from the two faculty members present at the meeting, who were concerned that faculty would not have enough time to view the guide prior to its distribution and prepare comments, an arrangement agreed to by the course guide committee. Assistant Dean Ellen Julien commented that "the faculty appreciates having things done the way they planned it to be done," and George Goethals suggested postponing the guide until next semester, "when you can do it right." Don Toumey apologized for the committee, but added that "the guide is for students, and not faculty," and claimed that after reviewing many of the sections, he did not anticipate "angry letters from faculty members."

Herwitz announced the formation of a committee to "restructure the guidelines" of the ACEC. According to Herwitz, the organization "has shown this year and in the past that it has major problems." He also cited the need for an ACEC business manager. The council voted to form a committee composed of 1 member of last year's ACEC, one member of the present ACEC, members of the past and present Finance Committee, and one member of the College Council.

Andy Goodell reported that the CUL has voted unanimously to accept a proposal for a pilot "Freshman camping experience." The plan calls for a three-day campout and general orientation session to be held on Weston Field. The proposal will go to the Dean's office for final approval.

Admissions Committee member Larry Mitchell charged that the committee has "done nothing all year." He added, "the irresponsibility of student members has been appalling." He cited an evaluation of the applicant pool, an investigation of the College's "image" and an investigation of the 10 per cent program as several intended goals that the committee has failed to fulfill.

Intro. Physics no longer on Keller Plan

Despite its popularity, Physics 131, 132 "An Introduction to Physics," will not be offered in the Keller plan format next year. Physics Department chairman Ballard Pierce explained that due to staff and textbook problems, the self-paced system of instruction would not be feasible for the department to sponsor next year.

Pierce explained that the physics department will be shorthanded, and since the Keller plan takes a fair amount of staff time, they would not be able to afford it. He also noted that the text which is currently being used will be out of print next year and that consequently the Physics department must prepare a new syllabus.

In a Keller plan course, students study the course material unit by unit at their own pace, progressing from one unit to the next by passing quizzes on the material in that unit. Students then take a comprehensive final examination at the end of the course.

This year, students overwhelmingly opted for the Keller plan course of instruction. Pierce noted that only 9 or 10 out of 90 students chose the lecture format instead.

Pierce said that students generally do very well with the Keller plan, noting that last term's median grade was a B+.

Pierce was uncertain as to whether the Keller plan would be reinstituted in the near future. Economics 251 had the Keller plan option last year but it was discontinued, due to lack of interest. The psychology department however, still plans to offer Psychology 101 in the fall on an individualized-instruction basis.

Course guide to appear by Tuesday

Members of the Student Course Guide Committee distributed copies of the Course Guide to faculty yesterday in order to elicit comments which will be printed with the Guide. The Course Guide, in its entirety will be available to students Monday or Tuesday.

According to an agreement reached between committee chairman Sara Baldwin and the administration last year, the faculty retained the privilege of reviewing the content and format of the guide and adding their own comments before the guide was distributed to students. However, the guide will be available to the faculty for only two days. Deadlines make it necessary to return faculty addenda to the printer Saturday in order for the entire guide to come out before registration ends.

"It's somewhat disappointing that the faculty won't have more time to go over the course guide," Chairman of the CEP Al Goethals remarked. He suggested that tighter student organization of the project might have alleviated the present problem.

College Council President Tom Herwitz said that the situation is "unfortunate because the issue of a student course guide is such a touchy one on this campus."

Herwitz continued to say that he was disturbed by the fact that the usefulness of the guide might have been compromised by its tardiness. "However," he said, "this guide is worthwhile in that it represents a starting point for future course guides. A guide is necessary at Williams."

Herwitz explained that he saw three alternatives to not publishing the course guide at all. "The committee had to choose among not publishing, publishing the Guide first and the addenda later, publishing both simultaneously, thus delaying its distribution, and publishing without the addenda at all, which would have violated faculty-student agreement." Herwitz urged Baldwin to hold up distribution until the faculty addenda could be incorporated in the guide.

Housing committee, CUL air views

An open discussion sponsored by the Housing Committee on Monday night was sparsely attended and instead became a discussion between members of the Housing Committee and members of the Committee on Undergraduate Life.

The group talked primarily about this year's housing transfer policies, with two informal proposals offered for consideration. Most members of the Housing Committee said they felt that the transfer policies should be made more liberal and provide opportunities for a greater number of students. The risks involved in transferring this year, one committee member noted, "were just too great."

This year's stricter policy was instituted as a result of a determination by the CUL that there had been too many transfers in the past and that such a situation endangered House unity. However, CUL members agreed Monday night that transfer policies might be modified to some extent.

Housing Committee co-chairman Jamie Barickman suggested that Freshman inclusion and upper class transfers be run simultaneously. Such a move would increase substantially the number of students desiring to transfer by reducing the possible costs of such a decision significantly. It was the general concensus however that this would encourage too many requests for transfers and that the least preferred housing groups would be especially hard hit. Bart Mitchell observed that there was danger that places like the Berkshire Quad and Mission Park would experience too much of a turnover from year to year.

Housing Committee co-chairman Sally Coney proposed that the group consider a proposal whereby the transfer application would be modified. She suggested that upperclassmen be able to list their house preference as opposed to their housing-group preference. Coney noted that a majority of the people who desire to transfer usually have a specific house in mind and that the transfer policies should accommodate this fact.

The CUL members responded that they would indeed consider proposals to reform the existing procedure. Another suggestion was that transfers be processed at another time in the school year and before freshmen inclusion. Finally, there was a suggestion to transform freshman inclusion into a giant room draw.

Falk balances Log finances, secures cable TV

by Ann McCabe

Applications for the job of Log manager are down this year compared to past years; the deadline has been extended until Tuesday, April 26. "People don't usually start senior year thinking of it as a definite possibility," said Gene Falk, manager during the past two years.

Falk, '75 became manager in the Log's third year of existence thinking "it might be fun." As manager, he said knowledge of bookkeeping is initially unimportant as it's easy to learn. He feels the job requires "a lot of patience and a sense of humor."

In the past, sales records were kept only by the business office and not looked at closely by the manager, said Falk. He began keeping his own copies and discovered money could be saved. For example, he found the Log was losing a substantial amount on food; sales were barely covering costs without considering the labor involved. Food was discontinued without causing any real decrease in total sales.

Falk said he hopes the Log Committee will hire someone early enough so that he can train them. "I didn't know what was involved. No one told me or knew enough to explain," he said. Thus last year, the place ran itself with "his" help. This year Falk said he feels he has had enough knowledge to run it as he thinks it should be which is one reason "I stayed around."

Financially, the Log is seeing brighter days. In the past the annual deficit has been $12-15000. So far this year there is a $1000 profit which Falk feels will be whittled away by the year's end due to slow months. He hopes to finish even.

Innovations

Falk instituted class nights, fussball, and live entertainment at the Log. Numbers have dwindled at class night, but the Log still does better than average business on those nights. Falk stated "having anything regular does not work as people get tired of it."

Negotiations for a cable have finally been settled with the town. A big T.V. will be set up in the side room for major sporting events. Falk had been trying for years to obtain a cable on his side of Spring Street.

The sound system also needs improvement and should be done in the next year. Falk has been reticent to spend money as "people only have a fixed amount of money they are going to spend here." Total sales for this year substantiate this belief as they are comparable to last year's despite the fact the Log is open an hour a day less and has discontinued serving food.

The Log's large glass bill can be attributed to more than just breakage. Falk would be glad to have items returned (perhaps as a going-away present), especially the "lovely" wine glasses.

Alumni Approval

The Log was formerly the Alumni house. It is now jointly occupied on big football weekends. The Alumni Association, as Falk understands it, "is content with the operations of the place as it is now." He feels a major victory has been scored as for years alumni have threatened to revert the Log. A sign is to be hung reading "The Log-Alumni House" to welcome alums.

Routine Life

Gene says life at the Log is fairly regular with incidents he expects to occur at a bar. If students get too rowdy, a word to them or their friends usually suffices to quiet them, but occasionally some have to be thrown out.

The aspect of his job Falk most dislikes is "getting rid of people at closing time." The administration turned down his request to ease up at closing. The Log is also strict about not letting in anyone but College people due to an agreement between the College and the town.

Falk plans to tour Europe next September and apply to business schools the following fall. He sums up his feelings saying: "In general I've had a good time ... The Record even gave me the Junior Achivement award last year for running my own business ... which is a chance most graduates don't have. I even laugh at the job myself, but it's a good opportunity."

Race Relations

The Williams Record recognizes that racial relations are an ugly problem in the Williams College community as well as in American society in general. So would any five-year-old kid, of any race, who has ever eaten lunch at Baxter Hall. We would like to think of this newspaper as a useful vehicle for constructive commentary and debate regarding crucial issues like racism.

We earnestly hope that the recent outbreak of racial accusations and rebuttals which have filled the opinion page of the last few issues of the Record will result in increased sensitivity toward and understanding of racial antagonisms at Williams. With this in mind, we welcome opinions concerning racial problems and their solutions. At the same time, however, we condemn uninformed and malicious finger-pointing or name-calling.

In a Viewpoint published in the April 19 issue of the Record Clarence Otis, Jr., stated, ". . . the majority of the people in the Williams College community are nasty people. The Record staff can count itself among that number." Otis goes on to claim that the Record staff conspires to discriminate against reporting the achievements of black athletes at Williams.

We reject Otis' accusation as uninformed and naive. Otis notices a very real problem in Record coverage, that the achievements of some talented and deserving black athletes are not sufficiently covered or praised in the Record. Seeing this, he immediately comes to the conclusion that the Record is a racist rag put out by "nasty people" who conspire to downplay the achievements of blacks.

Anyone who knows anything about the Record knows that its level of disorganization tends to prohibit complicated arrangements like conspiracies. Citing three instances where the Record has blown its coverage of worthy black athletes doesn't exactly show that the Record staff is racist. If it did, Kujichagula and The Nu Awakening would have to be viewed as paragons of racism.

Certainly our sports coverage is spotty and often unfair. It has been for years, although we believe the situation is getting better. Unfortunately for Otis' theory, however, we don't discriminate neatly along racial lines. Rather, we outrage a much larger segment of the Williams community by consistently neglecting the achievements of the crews, the rugby club, the women's ski teams, the women's squash team, the volleyball team, the women's field hockey team and a host of others. (Just read Nancy Rhein's sports Viewpoint on page 6 for a fairly accurate account of how we butcher our sports coverage of small teams.)

The point is that charges of "racism" are sometimes emotional and superficial approaches to more subtle problems. We doubt that "the majority of the people in the Williams College community are nasty people" who spend their time thinking up ways to discriminate against minorities. Yet we sense that the feeling does exist, among both blacks and whites, that race relations at Williams are rotten. Let's try to get at what's wrong and find some answers. Let's approach the problem, however, by getting at the facts and finding out what peoples attitudes really are instead of by taking pot shots in the dark.

Letters; campus racism, relay

Priorities-racism

To the editor:

When large portions of the black and white communities here ignore each other in their daily activity, and when the single greatest black contribution to American culture receives so little attention from students and faculty alike, why are we still debating whether racism exists at Williams?

Steve Robinson '79

Response to Long

To the editor:

In reference to Ronald Long's letter, I think he made a mistake in not being strong enough in contending that racism permeates our society, even at Williams.

The reason it is so hard for whites to understand its subtleties is that we've never been subjected to its visciousness. Only the victims of a bigoted or racist attitude can understand it. Especially today when people are aware of it or at least don't actively espouse it, the fact remains that racism is deeply embedded in our consciousnesses. What is lacking here is a sensitivity to peoples' feelings. Andy did not have one iota of malice when he wrote his letter, but never the less the racist attitude came through. What made this clear to me is when I read his column and letter and I found myself agreeing with him. But when I read the vehement reaction to it I was shocked because those letters spoke to me and it dawned on me how blind I was to understanding myself and how such an attitude can affect others.

The objection to the basketball team isn't valid. Coach Tong is not actively promoting racism, he is a victim of it. Just as I am, Andy is, Clarence is, and Ronald is. The heightened awareness about racial matters we all possess makes it harder for us, as individuals to see if we, personally, are guilty. Clarence is right, we should admit it, bring it out into the open. I look at him and see a black person first, then Clarence. I don't like to do it that way, but it's there and it saddens me to think my behavior affects him. It's not a major aggression but it's the cumulative affect of it upon the active victim that matters.

Further, people are forced to play roles, so that the black tries to emulate Julius Erving or he comes to Williams as a savior of blacks in America rather than as a student out to get an education. Blacks are then grouped together, and like a self-fulfilling prophesy they group themselves together and the whites group themselves together. Everyone is aware of the black table in Baxter Hall. Whites walk in and the first thing they see is the black table. However, I have been told that when a black walks in all he sees are the whites sitting together. The point is not that people hate each other, but subconscious feelings exist for the black or white man in dealing with each other. Both reek of racism. The black is a more obvious victim because he isn't in the majority. It's easier for the white person to hide from it.

People should be aware of their prejudices, confront themselves, think about it. It's not pleasant, it's very ugly, very sad. Granted, blatant racism of the Archie Bunker variety isn't prevalent, but the subtle racism can hurt just as much, if not more because a person isn't even aware he is doing it. Everybody open your eyes. Treat your fellow person as an individual. It's easy to say it, but difficult to understand its implications.

We are victims of our heritage and upbringing. It's a case of the sins of the fathers being visited upon the sons and if we try to realize it perhaps it might change, at least a little.

Think about it.

Sincerely,
David Koenigsberg

Trying

To the editor:

I must admit that I have found the recent letters and viewpoints on "racism" to be interesting and thought provoking (as I hope other students have also.) More than anything, I think they have made it clear that there is a racial problem that has been ignored on campus that needs to be dealt with.

Personally, I do not think the major racial problem is necessarily prejudice.

For the past four years I have noticed time and time again that most blacks and whites on this campus are able to interact with each other on a one to one basis. But, once each is in a group of his or her own race, the interaction becomes tension-packed and superficial at best. I'm not sure why this happens, but I know it needs to be discussed.

Clearly, the racial tension on this campus is not one-sided. Anyone who believes that it is not caused by both blacks and whites is either not being objective or is just plain naive. Although I don't have an answer to the problems, I think it's clear that it's time to do more than admit the problem exists; it's time to deal with it.

In my mind, unless the situation is openly discussed by blacks and whites together we will continue to have charges and countercharges of racism. This could only lead to more tension and resentment and would do nothing to improve anyone's understanding of the situation. Let's try to improve the situation.

Sincerely,
Steve Piltch '77

Marathon thanks

To the editor:

On behalf of the Chapel Board, I would like to thank everyone who helped with and participated in the sixth annual 24-hour relay marathon. Deserving special thanks are Renzi Lamb who took on the thankless tasks of setting up the field house and cleaning it up afterwards, Phil Eagleburger and Nate Bekemeier who donated their time and talent in making posters advertising the marathon, Ross Keller, who helped keep the runners' blood sugar levels up with a generous supply of food, and the Brass Ensemble, Jazz Band and Pipe Band who provided lots of music to run by.

Now that the runners' bodies have had a chance to recover from the grueling festivity of the marathon, most people will readily agree that participating in the marathon is a lot of fun as well as a character-building experience! The marathon is not just an exercise in aerobic masochism, however. The money that was pledged to the various teams that participated will be distributed to several local organizations. The Chapel Board would like to allocate the money as soon as possible—it would be much appreciated if those people who have not turned in their pledges do so as soon as possible.

Thanks again for everyone's help.

Lisa Capaldini, '78.

Children's Day

The Lehman Service Council will sponsor the second annual Children's Day tomorrow from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. at Cole Field. The event will consist of a day of games, prizes, and a picnic for children from the Williamstown area. The Ephlats, Williams Jazz Ensemble, and the Williams Pipe Band will provide entertainment.

The council needs volunteers to help cook and to organize games for the children such as baseball, soccer, and volleyball. Interested persons may call Andy Masetti (2933) or simply appear at Cole Field during the day.

Open committee

Students are being accepted to the new College Council committee investigating student decision making power at Williams College. Areas to be examined are 1) departments, 2) student-faculty committees, 3) faculty committees, and 4) administration. All students willing to contribute their time and knowledge in any of these areas are encouraged to join the committee. If interested, submit your name to S.U. Box 1970 by Tuesday, April 26. The first meeting will be Wednesday April 27 at 7:30 p.m. in Greylock A.

Reserve room to change hours

The reserve room will change the borrowing hours beginning Tuesday, April 26. The hour "grace period" will be eliminated in favor of an extended borrowing time.

Reserve room supervisor Ray Lee gave two reasons for the change. First, abolishing the "grace period" will give students a better indication of when materials are due. Not all students, Lee said, "are aware of the hour of grace and expect the books in when we say they're due, but then they have to wait an hour." This, he asserted, gave students who knew the rule an advantage over those who did not.

Secondly, Lee noted that making the books due an hour later was just an admission of the inefficient way things now worked.

Lee said library administration decided on the change in anticipation of the finals period. During exams, the extra demand confuses both the staff and the borrowers over when things are due.

Ophuls' 'Memory of Justice' explores responsibility

Reviewed by Peter Hopkins

The fourth in a series of lectures sponsored by the Lecture Committee was presented last Tuesday evening in Jesup Auditorium by the eminent filmmaker Marcel Ophuls. Ophuls is best known for his last film, "The Sorrow and The Pity" a documentary of the French resistance released in 1971 which evoked violent public and critical reactions both favorable and unfavorable. Ophuls, due to Paramount's distribution policy, was able to show only two reels of his new film "The Memory of Justice", after which showing he spoke about the film, the critical reaction it has received, and his attitudes and theories about filmmaking.

"The Memory of Justice" is not a film which everyone should see. It is a film which reasonably intelligent individuals should see, those who are willing to be entertained by something which is different from the ordinary mindless garbage which Hollywood produces.

Perhaps the most significant thing about "The Memory of Justice" is that it is entertaining, it is fascinating. It employs typical documentary format—shots of archival footage intercut with interviews of individuals who were involved in the particular subject of the documentary, in this case the Nuremburg Trials. Yet unlike most documentaries it possesses a subtlety of attitude towards its subject matter. The viewer is confronted with the task of asking questions and developing his own attitudes rather than merely reacting to a dominant dogmatic theme.

The subject of the film is the Nuremburg Trials, but the issue of the film is the responsibility of the individual in society. The film portrays individuals, not monsters. It examines attitudes and not documents. Interspersed throughout the first two reels is a long interview with the former commander of the German Navy, Karl Doenitz. It is a telling sequence, where an old man refuses to acknowledge any complicity, guilt, or responsibility for the atrocities committed by the Third Reich. Yet Doenitz was in a position of responsibility, and the hesitations in his answers, the contradictions he finds himself in, and his lack of composure indicate the tension and turmoil which lie below the content of his answers. The intercut footage of the Nuremburg trials unfolds as a counterpoint to the somewhat pathetic but very human Doenitz.

The technique of counterpoint is utilized throughout the film. The score from a Fred Astaire picture, "Bandwagon," is orchestrated with the motion of the windshield wipers of Ophul's car as he travels across Germany tracking down ex-Nazis for interviews. It is not a banal contrast. It incidates not only the tension involved in the decisions which individuals make, but that decisions are made. It is difficult to judge the guilt or innocence of a man, but life is such that judgments must be made. The footage of Nuremburg continues and individuals are found guilty. The lives of these convicts continue and they must judge themselves.

The film has become controversial on at least two counts. The first is a significant issue. Despite the subtleties of the film it does make the statement that individuals are responsible for their actions. This is controversial and is intended to be so. This is the issue with which the viewer is supposed to find himself engaged. The "Memory of Justice" has generated a broad range of criticism, ranging from those who find the idea of free will unacceptable, to critics who find the film's condemnation of evil less than apparent. In view of this spirited criticism the film has succeeded in creating an engagement.

The film's other controversial effect is Ophul's use of stock cinematic techniques to achieve certain effects, even where this violates certain "principles" of documentary filmmaking which supposedly ensure the authenticity of the film. But this is an issue only to those who don't understand filmmaking. Ophuls made his feelings quite clear, on this point. He considers the line between fiction and non-fiction to be very fine. The artist is attempting to convey his impressions of reality. The medium of filmmaking is artistic because it is selective; it compresses time. The entire Nuremburg trials cannot be shown as they lasted nine months. As soon its archival footage is edited, the "truth", the reality of the temporal framework is being altered. Ophul's attempts to convey a feeling about Nuremburg, and in this fashion, to portray the impact of the reality of the trials. He feels justified in using the art of filmmaking, where years of history become months of research which are boiled down into four and one half hours, to evoke this reaction.

Ophuls is an individual who incorporates the rare combination of being a master filmmaker who possesses a sense of history tempered by philosophical insight. He addressed his audience in much the same way as his films. He was witty, humorous, surprising and thoughtful; he evokes reactions. In short he is a rarity in a world of mass produced vanilla people. His films are rarer still, and demand to be seen not because they express the Truth, or make statements of social importance, but because they show how fragile and elusive these qualities are.

Future Shock : getting screwed by a computer

by Rajendra Singh Khadka

We were all sure that we would get the best gal or guy. We had to. It was something like going to fight in a war. We all know that it is not going to be us who are going to die. It is always someone else. Of course, things do not turn out that way.

I was really worried about the whole thing. To sign or not to sign? I mean what if the girl hated me the moment she saw me, or knew who I was? Would she be a learned liberal? Perhaps she might turn out to be a crypto-racist, and if she was a subterranean bigot, would she treat me kindly or cruelly? Both ways? You know, "s-m" scene!! The thought that I might not like my date did not enter my mind because, in the true Hindu ascetic fashion, I am not troubled by the pair of opposite passions. Meaning, I do not dislike anyone. Anyway, that is what I like to think. Thus, as I sat ruminating over this far-out event called Future Shock, I heard some nurd remark that he was definitely going to sign up because he knew for sure that the whole affair was just so cool, and it would just be "dynamite." How he could be so cocksure beats me. Perhaps the whole thing was a big hoax, or maybe a publicity-stunt organized by the WGSO.

Friday night, the night. How should I dress? Since this was a far-out affair, should I dress hippie style (no underclothes, sandals and hairband with a joint sticking out conspicuously). No, that wouldn't quite do, especially if my date turned out to be a real straight woman more at ease clinking cocktail glasses at countryclubs in sheltered suburbia. Preppie style? That would be nice, except I don't really know how a preppie is supposed to dress up, an authentic preppie, I mean. So I dressed in my regular manners—with underclothes—and hoped I looked decent.

Conversation: Should I talk about philosophy or religion? Maybe philosophy of religion. How about books. Yes, literature is always a sure bet to get the ball rolling. But would Memoirs of a Madame be considered literature? That was the last thing I had read on my own. Politics, world problems, women's lib? Oh well .... I'd fake it all with my brilliant bullshit, no matter what we ended up talking about.

The moment I entered Greylock dining hall, the first words I heard were, "My gal stood me up. I wonder what is wrong with me." That sounded very ominous indeed. The guy at the gate told me who my date was and added that it was a threesome. There was a malevolent glint in his eyes as he explained that there would be one girl and two guys. My orthodox Hindu sensibilities were understandably shocked. Was this some kind of a kinky set up? Nevertheless, I ventured into the entrails of uncertainty.

I grabbed a beer and started to prowl around. A guy came up to me and said that he was my date. I had this feeling I was in the wrong place. Would he please explain? Yes, of course, he and I were with the same girl. And where was she? Hasn't arrived, yet, he added hopefully. I split and made for the dance floor.

Lots of new faces, especially women. I walked up to one of them and asked her if she would like to dance. She shrugged. Now what the hell did that mean? Maybe? She walked to the floor and I followed her. We danced. Rather, she danced. She did those funky, sexy twirls and swirls. As she danced, her expressions alternated between contorted, orgiastic facial tensions and beatific smiles. I watched her, quite captivated, and swayed to the rhythm of the music as a branch of a tree sways to the motions of the wind. Maybe she was a ballet dancer, or a belly dancer, perhaps a dance major. So I asked her if she was a dance major.

"Yes."

"You don't go to school here?

"No."

The dance ended. We retreated to a corner. I asked her if she wanted anything to drink. No. Long silence.

"You don't talk much, do you?" from the girl. She sure got me there.

"No, I'm the silent type." from me, modestly, with an air of quiet dignity that I had seen some intellectuals possess.

"But not the strong, silent type. You know, silent types are usually the awesome type. But that doesn't mean that you are not strong. You know, it is something like saying you are not handsome, but that doesn't imply that you are ugly, does it?" from the female sophist. At this point, I would have loved to break her neck if there were no laws saying I couldn't.

"And your name?" I inquired still very politely and in total command of my passions. I also had the right touch of indifference. She looked at me very suspiciously.

"You trying to pick me up? You trying to pick me up? You??!" (hahaha—hysterical laughter).

I suddenly felt as trampled and unimportant as the beer on the floor. I pleaded my innocence as I slowly receded into the cacophonous crowd to become another anonymous face that everyone sees but nobody really cares about. But even as I fell back into the crowd, I offered her my handkerchief so that she could wipe her tears of happiness.

I downed two beers and tried to recover my devastated ego. To restore my confidence fully, I decided to dance, even though the music was pretty corny. I saw a woman leaning against a wall, looking into the crowd of dancers and tapping her foot to the rhythm of the music. Her body language indicated that she wanted to dance.

"How 'bout, uh, a dance?" I said, and flashed my Robert Redfordish smile that I practice so constantly in front of the bathroom mirror. She looked me up and down, weighed my question for a full sixty seconds, looked me straight in my eyes (was she stripping me mentally too), gave me a seductive half-smile that sent my blood pounding and said, "NO." Very emphatically too.

My God! I had actually been rejected. She said no to me. Who in the hell does she think she is anyway? But wait! Did anyone see me actually getting rejected? Jesus! That would be humiliating. I felt naked, exposed and very much expendable. My Redfordish smile dissolved into a mask of outward calm indifference. I turned around, slowly, and bumped into someone . . .

I got screwed.

Wow! Where?

At the Future Shock.

How was it? Dynamite, huh?

As a matter of fact, it was really bad. I never felt so bad.

That's too bad. Did you try any funny stuff or something?

Nothing that I can think of. Except I gave a lot of bullshit in the questionnaire, but then, everybody did the same too.

Well, maybe that was it. Cheer up. Things could be worse.

That is true. Maybe the date got laid in bed with the flu or something. Perhaps he or she is dead.

NEWS BRIEFS

McGill receives renewal grant

Thomas E. McGill, Hales Professor and Chairman of the Psychology Department at Williams, has won a three-year renewal grant of about $120,000 for continuation of a research project entitled "The Genetics and Physiology of Behavioral Differences."

The grant was made by the Institute of General Medical Sciences of the U.S. Public Health Service which has sponsored McGill since 1960.

The project is concerned with genotypic and physiological differences that produce variations in the behavior of animals, particularly laboratory mice. Much of McGill's recent research has involved the effects of hormones administered in infancy and in adulthood on the reproductive patterns of various inbred strains of house mice.

Each year, several dozen Williams undergraduates participate in one or more phases of the project as senior Honors students, juniors in independent study courses, students doing special projects in courses taught by McGill, and summer science trainees.

'Guys and Dolls,' based on short stories by Damon Runyon, opens Thursday the 27th at the Adams Memorial Theatre.

'Guys and Dolls" opens Thursday; full orchestra accompanies show

The American musical comedy classic "Guys and Dolls" will be presented by the Williams College Theatre and Cap and Bells at 8:30 p.m. from April 27 through May 2 at the Adams Memorial Theatre. One of the most memorable and acclaimed milestones of the American musical theatre, "Guys and Dolls" opened originally on Broadway in 1950, and went on to play 1200 performances. The production—based on short stories by the foremost chronicler of New York and Broadway, Damon Runyon—confirmed composer-lyricist Frank Loesser's reputation among the top song-writers in the land. "Guys and Dolls" alone contains such well-known and appealing songs as "I've Never Been in Love Before," "Bushel and a Peck," and "Sit Down, You're Rocking the Boat."

The book of "Guys and Dolls" written by Jo Swerling and Abe Burrows, is based on two stories of Damon Runyon: "The Idylls of Sarah Brown" and "Pick the Winner." A double set of romantic leads, Nathan Detroit and Miss Adelaide, and Sky Masterson and Sarah Brown, confront the comic tribulations of love among the lowlife of Boardway. In the first scene of the musical, Masterson tells Nathan: "Guys like us . . . we got to remember that pleasant as a doll's company may be, she must always take second place to aces back to back." By the end of the show, the women triumph, the gamblers are domesticated, and the crap game loses its two most prominent exponents. On the way the audience is treated to a raffish and picturesque underviews of Broadway life: gamblers, drunks, showgirls, police, and the members of the Save-A-Soul Mission. Newsweek's views of "Guys and Dolls" as one of the "freshest, funniest, and most likeable musicals to appear in New York" has been borne out by its enduring popularity.

The Williams College Theatre Cap and Bells production of "Guys and Dolls" will be directed by Jean-Bernard Bucky, with choreography by Laurie Boyd, under the musical direction of Irwin Shainman. Costume Design is by Martha W. Hally, lighting by Fred Penzel, and Laura Dankner is handling the vocal preparation. The Broadway setting has been designed by Polly Wood, '75 and former president of Cap and Bells.

The production will be supported by a full student orchestra. Featured in the cast of more than thirty actors-singers-dancers are Stephen Wertimer as Nathan Detroit, Dianne Thompson as Miss Adelaide, Robert Gregory as Sky Masterson, and Betty Agostino as Sarah Brown.

Tickets are available at the Adams Memorial Theatre Box Office.

Stuart landscapes sensual

by Christopher Noey

We isolated and selected particular qualities of reality or barely perceived realms of experience. We used them to explore the spirit of the land.

From The Fall, a prose poem by Michell Stuart

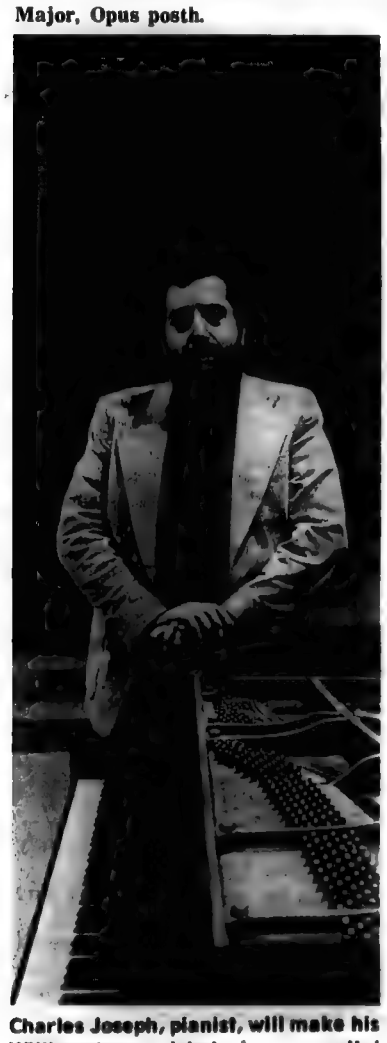
The works by Michell Stuart on exhibit at the Williams College Art Museum until May 8 are landscapes of a sort, derived from the artist's California childhood. Stuart often accompanied her engineer father into the uninhabited deserts of the West, and those vast, arid expanses—not the verdant and uneven terrain of traditional landscape—inspired the works presently being shown at Lawrence Hall as part of the Williams Artist-in-Residence program.

In her role as artist-in-residence this month, Stuart will edition four prints in the Goodrich Hall studio. She may also participate in professor Tom Krens' Modern Methods seminar, as well as be available to students in other studio art courses. Additionally, Stuart is exploring local sites for materials to incorporate into her works, and she is writing a book that is a kind of travelogue of the sites that have played a part in the creation of her works.



It is difficult to describe Stuart's art any more specifically than as "works," for they defy traditional art historical classifications. In making the larger pieces in the Gallery Nine show, materials such as rocks or debris from a given site were spread on muslim-backed paper, oftentimes at the site itself. The stones were pounded against each other on the paper, leaving a fine silt residue that Stuart rubbed into the paper. The finished work has neither any particular focus, nor any abrupt tonal variations—visual effects that require of Stuart great physical and mental concentration. Combined with her poundings, which leave a pitted surface, this element of strain symbolizes geological turmoil at work on the land, and it belies one's more immediate sensation, that of a dispassionate yet sensuous texture.

This characteristic of dual, and often contradictory, qualities being simultaneously operative pervades Stuart's work. For example, the surface of Niagara II (1976) is composed of crushed and polished shale, giving it a dark gray sheen except where interrupted by specks and clusters of white where the paper has been pitted by pounding the stones. Up close, one inspects the particles of ore as if through a jeweler's loupe, while from further back the work resembles a star map. One also finds this concommitance of microcosm and macrocosm in Sayreville Strata (1976), in which each of four pieces of paper (varying in color from beige to orange) convey both the minutia of dirt particles and the vastness of the strata from which these particles came. The sensation of illimitable layers of rock is a consequence of the ample scale of the pieces of paper (five feet by twelve feet), but Sayreville Strata—nor any of the other large works—can be described as overpowering. Stuart avoids awing the viewer on the one hand by rendering the edges of the paper in lighter tones, thereby inviting one's eyes into the serried, all-over texture gradually, not abruptly. Moreover, the works are tacked to the walls without frames or plates of glass that might make than more aloof, and the paper curls at the bottom, often onto the gallery floor. The curl extends into the viewer's space, in Stuart's words "environmentalizing" the work such that the normal art-life boundary is blurred. By trying to environmentalize her works and by avoiding illusionistic effects, the

Pianist Joseph to play Schubert, modern works

Charles Joseph, pianist, will make his Williamstown debut as recitalist this Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The first half of the program is devoted to twentieth century piano works, while the second half is Schubert's Sonata in B-flat Major, Opus posth.

Charles Joseph, pianist, will make his Williamstown debut in a recital Tuesday evening at 8:30 in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The Schubert and 20th century concert is free and open to the public.

Charles Joseph, assistant professor of music, followed his undergraduate work in music at the West Virginia University with a master's degree from the University of Illinois and a doctorate at the University of Cincinnati. In addition, he has earned a certificate in theory and piano from the Ecoles D'Art Americaines in Fontainebleau, France. Some of his teachers have been Nadia Boulanger, Soulima Stravinsky, Paul Cooper, and Jean Casadesus. A contributor to American Music Teacher, Notes, Clavier, and The New Braille Musician, he has been awarded a National Endowment for the Arts and Humanities fellowship for post-doctoral study at Harvard University with the Bach scholar, Christoph Wolff.

The twentieth century works are Arnold Schoenberg's Drei Klavierstucke, Opus 11, Aaron Copland's Piano Variations, Alberto Ginastera's Suite de Danzas Criollas, and Paul Cooper's Cycles. These four pieces, written at intervals of approximately twenty years, emphasize different styles of piano writing in this century, ranging from the early atonal experiments of Schoenberg to the most recent avant-garde technique of aleatoric writing and working inside the piano in Cooper's composition. The Schoenberg and Copland works are now recognized masterpieces of twentieth century piano literature.

Opus II was Schoenberg's first major set of piano pieces, and they retain much of the pianism of Brahms despite their atonality. Many of the compositional techniques used later in the century are foreshadowed in this 1909 work. Paul Cooper's Cycles was written in 1969. The twelve short pieces in the work exploit many new ideas of piano writing, such as muting the strings, strumming the strings inside the instrument, and sounding sympathetic vibrations of depressed keys. Cycles won the 1969 Music Teachers' National Association Distinguished Composition Award for its composer, who is composer-in-residence at the Shepherd School of Music at Rice University.

Aaron Copland's Variations, written in 1930, is still recognized as one of the most significant American piano compositions ever written. A set of twenty variations on a four-note theme, it treats the piano percussively in a highly dissonant, biting manner. Chiefly known as a piano composer for his Sonata, Alberto Ginastera wrote his suite of dances in 1946. Although this set is seldom performed, it is very representative of the Argentinian style associated with Ginastera, with an emphasis on rhythm, vitality, economy of material, and pianistic virtuosity. Ginastera himself considers this work his finest effort for keyboard.

Franz Schubert's Sonata in B-flat Major was his last piano sonata and one of the final works written before the composer's death in 1828. It is one of the largest sonatas of the 19th century and a transcendental work of unique individuality. It is regarded as the best keyboard work of Schubert and a monument of 19th-century keyboard literature.

pieces are perceived at some level as "minimalist" objects that do not refer beyond themselves to another place, time, or state of mind. Again, Stuart unites conflicting intentions on a conceptual continuum (a word she uses often). For each of these works functions both as an object that is meant to share the viewer's space conceptually as well as physically, and as an object that relates outside itself by evoking the desert terrain undergoing geological evolution.

Also included in the Gallery Nine show are several of Stuart's "books", which reiterate the themes found in the large wall pieces, though on a more compact, sculptural scale. Works such as White Sands Strata (1975) are constructed in book form, but the "information" of any of its leaves of hand-made paper is a deposit of white sand (as well as the story one imagines the book would tell if it contained words). This book of sand pages assumes a narrative quality, and it becomes an analogue for those moments when a history of earthquakes, erosion, and glaciers can be seen written across a terrain, when time takes on a physical presence.

Stuart acknowledges elements of Oriental influence on her art, particularly in the way in which Far Eastern artists, as she says, "have respect for the materials, allowing them to speak for themselves." In Stuart's art, she attempts to establish a rapport with her materials that extends into an affinity with the land. And unhierarchical, unintimidating compositions and life itself.

play will start on poker flats where a white line will divide the field (Freshmen are included in upper class houses).

RULES

Each team will be defending their own 55 gallon barrel while trying to locate and move the other team's barrel to the neutral zone. The barrels must be in highly visible spot (you may NOT put it in anyone's room). If the offensive team moves the barrel but does not get it to the neutral zone, the defensive team must defend their barrel where it is left.

Each team will be identified by their colored armbands (to be provided). There will be no jails. Instead if a player's armband is stolen he must return to his home base and get another from his team checker, a referee. Violence is strongly discouraged, it is expected that in group encounters the smaller group will peaceably surrender their armbands.

Referees will be roaming the field to spot violations and generally that all is in keeping with a game spirit. Each house is asked to supply two members to the ranks of the referees. WCC will also be supplying non-partisan referees. Refs will meet at 2 p.m. in WOC Room on Saturday to discuss their role etc.

SCORING

Since it is possible that neither team will capture the other's barrel scoring will also be based on the number of "casualties", or armbands that need to be replaced. If no barrel is Captured a team will be awarded a draw, moral victory, conditional victory, or unconditional victory. If the barrel is captured the victory may be ranked as Phyrrric, less-than-glorious, decisive, or an all-out triumph.

Senior Collie Nelson (pictured) and fellow midfielder Jamie Taylor will face UMass., the ninth ranked squad in the nation and tops in New England, without linemate Cam McKee. Freshman John Glynn replaced McKee, whose injured knee sidelines him for the season, during Wednesday's 12-4 rout of Union.

Another frosh, Gus Nuzzolese, scored three times against the Dutchmen, who, Taylor said, "weren't as good as we thought they'd be." The Ephs scored seven unanswered first half goals, and led 10-1 early in the third period. According to Taylor, the Ephmen will try out some special offensive plays designed for the UMass defense in tomorrow's 2:00 p.m. tiff with the Minutemen at Cole Field. (photo by Oettgen)

Eph nine shuffle Cards, 3-2

by Frank Pergolizzi

Clutch pitching, tight fielding, timely hitting and a little luck spelled the difference Tuesday as the Williams baseball team edged Little Three visitors Wesleyan, 3-2. The game, played on sun soaked Weston Field in a snappy two hours, was very much up for grabs until the final out as the young Ephmen, coming into the game ranked seventh in New England Division Three listings, were put to the test by the visitors from Middletown.

The first three innings saw rival hurlers Steve Maier of Williams; and Pat Kiley of Wesleyan, dispose of their opponent's hitters in a fairly orderly fashion. Wesleyan broke the ice in the top of the fourth, building a run around a walk to catcher Brad Vanacore, a hit and run single by Jim McGarry, sending Vanacore to third, and a ground smash single to right field by co-captain Sean McKeown, scoring Vanacore. Wesleyan then loaded the bases with two out, but Maier induced third baseman Jeff Binswanger to hit a harmless fly ball.

Wesleyan scored their second run in the top of the fifth, as lead off hitter Kevin Rose lined a single to left center, then took second when centerfielder John Friborg bobbled the ball. Rose moved to third on a ground ball to second and scored on a ground ball to shortstop.

The Cardinals threatened to blow the game wide open in the top of the sixth as they built a bases loaded, one out situation around three singles. But Eph hurler Maier bore down, and got the tough Rose to pop to second baseman Roger McEniry. Then second baseman Frank LaMonaca sent a sharp line drive towards left field but shortstop Scott Harrington speared the ball in mid air, getting the Ephs out of serious trouble.

Wesleyan pitcher Pat Kiley had been silently mowing down Williams' batters through the first five innings with the only hit to that point a single by Bill Masse. In the bottom of the sixth the Williams bats awoke long enough to score three runs. McEniry led off with a ground single through the middle. Wesleyan first sacker Jim McGarry then booted John Friborg's hard grounder, putting Eph baserunners at first and third with none out. Things were stalled momentarily as Scott Harrington hit a short fly ball to left field, but freshman Rick Walter drove in Williams' first run with a line single to left field, Bob LaBombard struck out and with Williams still down 2-1, the deciding play of the game occurred. Catcher Tom Redden laced a soft line drive just over the first baseman's head that landed barely inside the right field foul line, Friborg scored from second, and Walter, showing fine speed, scored all the way from first. Redden, however, thinking the ball was foul, had stopped just past first, and made it to second only on the play on Walter at the plate. The Wesleyan coach argued vehemently for a few moments but the damage had been done.

Wesleyan's hopes were briefly ignited in the top of the ninth when they loaded the bases with two out. but Maier's first pitch to Rob Sansone was popped up near the Williams bench. Catcher Redden came over and made the play and Williams was 5-1 on the season.

Women's rugby

With its big debut against Siena scheduled for May 14, the women's rugby team will begin practice May 1. Women's rugby, is identical to the men's game, with shortened halves.

Following a week of observing and executing non-contact men's drills, the women will begin to participate in their own scrimmages.

Interested female ruggers are urged to attend the men's game against Albany Law this Saturday and contact John Greer (2961), Ginny Doherty (2740), or Jim Stewart (2984) for more information.

Viewpoint: Coping with Sports Bias

by Nancy Rhein

After several months of observation and on the job training in the Record sports office, the time has finally come to emerge from the shadow of Tim Layden's ever present cleat to consider some recent criticisms of the sports page.

Breaking into a sports department is no easy task, especially if you suffer from the double handicap of being both a burger and a woman. Lest you rule me out completely, let me say that I have had the best of coaches to acquaint me with the ins and outs of Eph sports trivia. Thanks to the help and advice of old pros Tim Layden, Andy O'Donnell, and Dennis O'Shea, and a little practical experience, I now respect the Odell dynasty, hate the Jeffs, pus on Union, and feel cramped in Lasell gymnasium. There is one flaw in relying on these "been-around journalists" however, as too many Ephs have been blinded by the glamour of football, basketball, ice hockey, (and lacrosse for you Easterners).

Looking beyond these giants to the "lesser sports" and "women's sports" one soon realizes that the alumni and journalistic bias towards the biggies is not an indication of the strength and talent of the remainder of the Eph athletic program.

Unfortunately, one must turn to the fine print of Scoreboard to discover the true nature of Williams sports. For it is in that box that the excellent achievements of the smaller sports are revealed. Last fall, the women's field hockey team, playing a tough schedule, had an excellent season, culminating in fine tournament play. The women's swimming varsity went undefeated in their dual meet season and finished an unprecedented fifth at the New England Championships, the first of the small college teams. The winter months saw matmen Jeff May and Hal Zendle wrestling well, while the team suffered defeat after defeat. Meanwhile women's basketball was doing great, losing a chance at the state tourney by an official foul-up. Volleyball was active and the women's squash team was surprising all at the Nationals at Penn. The ski teams, in their best seasons in recent years had a series of outstanding carnival finishes.

Yes, it was quite a winter for Williams' "other" sports, but our readers and the spectators who never get to those little sporting events, would hardly know it. Despite efforts to regularly cover women's sports and wrestling, the sports page still lacks complete coverage as a result of a deficient number of correspondents. Sadly enough with the spring season getting underway, there still will be no one to cover spring Rugby, much less Williams sailing, women's track, ultimate frisbee and other clubs with unpublished schedules.

Although I have had a few months experience now, I, and many other Williams students, am still without satisfaction when it comes to the Record's coverage of the sports program. The inability of the paper to "get around" is merely a reflection of a new-comer trying to conquer a big sport bias with a small sports staff and a readership oriented to the "spectator" sports. But with your help, and that of spring correspondents Evan Bash, Wit McKay, Frank Pergolizzi, and Tom Klump, not to mention coaches and team members, it will be possible to attain a goal of expanded Record coverage of all sports without discrimination. There is hope, despite the odds. After all if a female burger can break an all male sports reporting tradition and wish woe to Lord Jeffrey this soon, then I guess just about anything is possible.

Nancy Rhein has been a sports editor of the RECORD since January.

Tracksters challenge Panthers

The Williams Men's Track team managed convincing wins over Middlebury and Trinity on the victor's home track Wednesday.

Junior weightman, Larry Tanner, led off the day's event with an 168' toss in the hammerthrow. The heave was Tanner's personal best by 12 feet and easily established a new school record. Captain Rich Remmer backed up Tanner with a second place in the hammer and also came up big with a victory in the shot put. Bob Duffy led a 1-3-4 Eph finish in the javelin with a throw of 179'2".

The sprints, proved to be stronger this week as Glenn Harris grabbed a third in the 100 and Paul Untch combined with Vernon Davis to finish 3-4 in the 220. Earlier, Davis had run a strong race to win the 120 High Hurdles in 15.8 seconds.

The distance events once again provided a good deal of punch for the Ephs as 23 points were racked up in the three longest events. Dave Seegar (158.2) and Vin Zinicola (200.5) gave the team a 1-3 finish in the 880. Senior distance man, Ken Leinbach easily took the mile and was followed across the line by Dan Sullivan and Mark Chaffee in third and fourth, respectively. Leinbach then moved up to the 3 mile and ran easily, tying with freshman, Michael Behrman, for the win.

The Williams women's track team also competed Wednesday against a limited squad from Middlebury. Tricia Beckwith provided a fine performance in winning the 440 in 63.4 and taking a second in the 880 with a clocking of 2:28.2. Renelda Pierce was the other big scorer for the team with seconds in both the 100 and 220.

Netmen fall to Harvard; face Tufts, Trinity next

by Evan Bash

Anyone who calls an 8-1 loss encouraging seems to be a prime candidate for the guys with the white jackets and large butterfly nets. Yet Coach Dave Johnson and his varsity tennis team are looking at Tuesday's loss to Harvard just that way.

Greg Collins '79 placed third in the long jump with a leap of 20 ft., 6" during Wednesday's triangular meet with Trinity and Middlebury. (photo by Oettgen)

The reason for this apparent cockeyed optimism stems from the fact that the Ephs are finally getting their games back in shape, even though the final score against Eastern League power Harvard doesn't reflect the improvement. This resurgence comes at the right time, for Williams faces traditionally close matches with both Tufts (home) and Trinity on Saturday and Tuesday respectively.

Harvard, because of their unusual strength, fielded a modified singles line-up that lacked their two top players. This was just fine with Eph no. 1 Martin Goldberg as he scored Williams' only point of the day with a truly fine performance. Jim Parsons also looked sharp although he lost just enough key points to keep the match from going his way. In the middle of the line-up, Perry Nelson and Evan Bash both played strongly but succumbed to tough opponents. Tad Roach went three sets for the second consecutive match but he could not pull this one out, while Bill Whelan was melted down by a player who was really on fire.

The doubles saw Harvard pull out their top rated team, and Goldberg and Whelan almost gave the Crimson duo more than they wanted, holding a set point in the second set before eventually dropping that set, and the match, in a tie-breaker. The no. 2 team of Nelson and Dean Gianakos featured some outstanding points, although not quite enough from their point of view. Pete Friesen and Parsons were worn down by some hard hitters in a good match.

VOL. 90, NO. 49 WILLIAMS COLLEGE APRIL 26, 1977

Trustees agree to start new music facility in fall

The Board of Trustees approved commencing construction of a new music facility adjacent to Chapin Hall, during the second of their quarterly meetings in Williamstown, this weekend. The trustees also appointed five members to the Clark Art Institute Board of Trustees, announced the expansion of the College's Board of Trustees and renamed the Keck house.

President John W. Chandler told the RECORD Saturday that a bequest of 1.5 million enabled the College to proceed with Phase II of the Chapin project—construction of the music building. The funds were donated to the College by the wife of Belvidere Brooks '10 who was killed in action at Villesavoye, France in 1918, and her brother, Alan Rogers '09. The gift comes short of the full building costs, estimated at 2.1 million and the $800,000 endowment needed for maintaining the facility. "The College decided to start construction now, without the full amount, to get ahead of rising rates of inflation," Chandler said.

Contractors should begin construction early in September with only minor changes in the existing plans. According to the president, the building will not be air conditioned, as originally intended, and the College will consider adding energy saving provisions to the design.

The trustees reappointed four existing trustees of the Clark Art Institute and added one new name to the total list of nine. Lawrence K. Miller, Casimir deRham, John E. Sawyer, and John W. Chandler were renamed to the position. The trustees also appointed Gene S. Briggs, Professor of Art at Harvard and, until last summer, Director of the National Gallery of Canada.

The number of term trustees will increase from three to five following

Studies center on value of languages

by Keron Walker

"It's unrealistic to think that manipulating the language department will increase enrollment significantly," said head of Romance Languages George Pistorius last week. "To change the status of languages here, we would have to change the attitude and goals of Williams.

"I cannot believe that such a change is desirable," he stated emphatically.

Two committees of language experts recently completed an evaluation of the Romance Languages, German and Russian Departments. Pistorius explained that their basis of evaluation was not enrollment figures, but rather, their idea of the aims of language instruction in a small liberal arts environment.

"Of course, the specifics in each department are different, but in general the problems and goals are related. Language at Williams is invaluable in the framework of the liberal arts college. No one language is the perfect medium in which to interpret experience. The aim is not to compare values through systematic evaluations, but to let a second culture enrich an experience through becoming a part of one's self.

"Language appeals to both ideas and sensibilities," Pistorius continued. "It is not only a tool, but it gives insight, through its own structure and its literature, into the perennial values and aspirations of men. As is expected in liberal arts, the purely practical aspects of studying a language are not necessarily those which make them worth studying."

The evaluation by a group of outside experts was the result of an agreement between the administration and the language departments last year. Pistorius explained that the situation today developed as a result of the administration's "strict policy of evaluating staff changes in terms of enrollment."

When a Spanish professor resigned two years ago, there was some question as to whether or not he would be replaced for economic reasons. Pistorius felt that cutting the Spanish staff to two would severely limit the quality of its offerings. He considers the optimum staff size.

"We were never under any pressure at all to reduce the number of our professors, nor did we have to do with two only for any amount of

Williams ranks fourth in admissions selectivity

Williams ranked fourth in selectivity among twelve comparable colleges and universities in a survey printed in the Amherst Student.

Amherst, Harvard and Bowdoin accepted a smaller percentage of applicants than Williams, according to the survey. Amherst accepted 15 per cent, the smallest percentage in the survey, Harvard and Bowdoin each accepted 18 per cent, and Williams accepted 19.3 per cent. Both the Williams and the Amherst percentages are record lows.

Williams' acceptance percentage decreased from 21 per cent to 19.3 per cent, more sharply than any of the other four most selective colleges except that of Amherst, which decreased from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. Harvard accepted 19 per cent of all applicants last year, and Bowdoin accepted 20 per cent.

Amherst admitted 580 out of 3800 applicants, down by 130 acceptances from the previous year, while Williams accepted 909 of 4705 applicants, a drop of 106 acceptances from last year. The number of acceptances by Harvard and Bowdoin did not change appreciably.

Both Amherst and Williams have decreased the target freshman class size, thus allowing the number of acceptances to be reduced. Williams' expected freshman class size fell by 5 students, while Amherst's target figure was reduced by 40 students.

Harrington details socialist alternatives

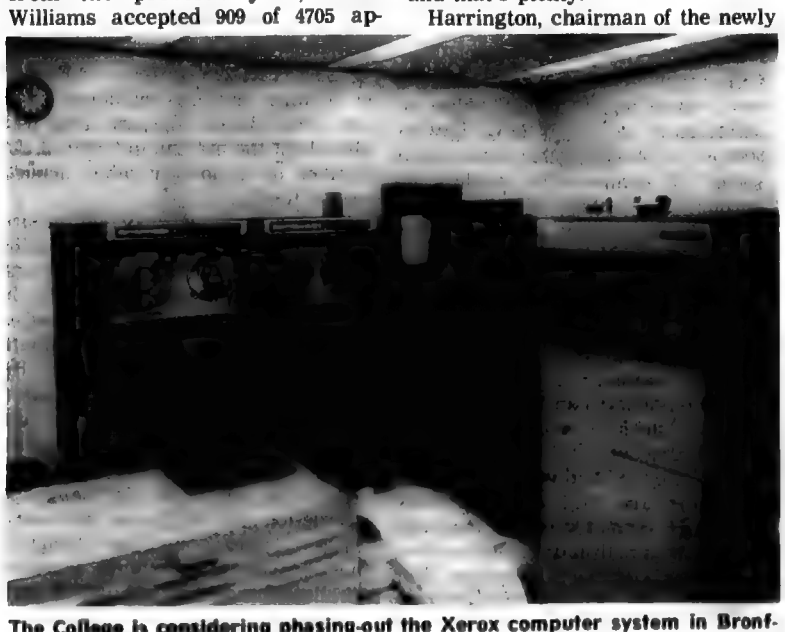
"Socialism is not a cure for the human condition," Michael Harrington admitted to a large audience in Jesup Hall Friday. "Socialism is not a religion," he continued. "There will still be lots of misery. People will still feel unwanted and unloved. But we can end socially and economically based suffering—and that's plenty."

Harrington, chairman of the newly formed Socialist Democratic Party spoke before almost 150 people Friday to outline his party's concerns and expectations.

"Things in this country may be changing for the better." Harrington observed that the election of a Democratic candidate for President "does one good thing—it gives people heightened expectations. It is hope that makes people militant."

Harrington noted however that "we will have to go beyond liberalism to achieve liberal values . . . We need radical means . . . Our problems are systemic structural and functional problems and our solutions must be structural and functional.

"Unemployment is a rational irrationality in a capitalist economy because full employment erodes profits," Harrington observed. He spoke at length about how the government has attempted to "redefine unemployment out of existence."



He attacked the Bureau of Labor Statistics recent decision to consider the value of in-kind services as part of an individual's real income. "If a poor man is lucky enough to have a rare terminal illness," Harrington noted, "if he requires enough medical care, he just might become a member of the upper class, at least in the statistics."

Government officials are correct in their attempts to increase the figures of natural unemployment, Harrington said, but "they are right only if the structure of the American economy is sacred and sacrosanct. They are right if one assumes that it's safe."

"I have a program," Harrington said. "We should pass the Humphreys-Hawkins bill which can put a substantial number of people to work. We should institute a comprehensive health care plan for all Americans. We should effect a redistribution of Americans. We should effect a redistribution of income and get the rich off welfare. Their taxes should be raised." Finally, Harrington proposed that investment be allocated directly by the government; that the government should seek to encourage investment in more socially desirable areas.

"Richard Nixon used to talk about how his mother had to scrub floors.

The College is considering phasing-out the Xerox computer system in Bronfman. The student-faculty computer services committee is discussing possible alternatives.

Computer options explored

The student-faculty Computer Services Committee is currently considering "alternatives" to the Xerox model 530 which presently serves as the main computer for the College, according to Donald Taylor, a student member of the committee.

Xerox recently "went out of the computer business" explained Lawrence E. Wright, director of Computer Services. Honeywell Corporation bought the computer division at Xerox, and now handles the servicing of Xerox computer equipment. Though this situation does not in itself pose any problems at present, the committee is concerned with planning for the future.

The committee is discussing possible alternatives for the College's computer system based on the assumption that the model 530 will be "phased out" within five to ten years, Taylor said. Proposals have included installing "mini-computers" as needed around campus, which is now technically possible because of advances in miniturization of components, he added. Time-sharing, whereby the facilities of computers outside the campus are utilized, is also being considered.

Wright said that the College purchased the Xerox machine two years ago at a cost of about $100,000. Two-thirds of its capacity is owned by the College and the remaining space is leased to outside users, he added.

The Xerox machine handles administrative chores as well as serving several academic departments. Taylor estimated that five to ten professors use it regularly for large scale projects.

Letters: Stevens, computers

re-rebuttal

To the editor:

Rick Lane's April 8 Viewpoint contends that J. P. Stevens is a wronged victim, not a corporate victimizer of its employees. The facts are otherwise:

Stevens Systematically Busts Unions. Stevens has been convicted of firing a total of 289 union supporters for their actions. The company refused to bargain with a duly elected union local at Roanoke Rapids, N.C. It closed a Statesboro, Ga. plant rather than bargain with the union local there. These actions are all illegal.

Federal courts took the unprecedented action of threatening criminal contempt conviction of Stevens executives. The courts have awarded payment of $1.3 million in back wages to workers fired for union activities.

The Federal Fifth Circuit Court in 1969 accused Stevens of "classic, albeit crude, unlawful labor practices." In July, 1976 Reed Johnston, National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) Regional Director in the Southeast, stated:

> Since on or about June 1963, and at all times thereafter, (J. P. Stevens) has engaged in a massive, multi-state campaign to deny its employees their rights under the (National Labor Relations) Act to seek collective bargaining representatives of their own choosing ... (Stevens) has committed unfair labor practices of unprecedented flagrancy and magnitude.

Stevens Discriminates Against Blacks and Women. Only 7 per cent of Stevens skilled blue-collar workers and 3 per cent of white-collar supervisors are black. Ninety-seven per cent of blue-collar females hold unskilled jobs (versus 69 per cent of men); 87 per cent of white-collar women are clerk-typists (versus 27 per cent of men). Federal courts have twice convicted the company of willful discrimination. One wonders if the Stevens donations to the United Negro College Fund Lane mentions were motivated by any concern other than a tax writeoff and good publicity.

Stevens Operates Unsafe, Unhealthy Factories. Lane says textiles are the fifth best industry in terms of health and safety. The latest (1974) Bureau of Labor Statistics data show textiles are the 33rd worst industry out of 48 in total recorded accident and illness cases. Textiles are 17th of 48 in lost work day cases, 36th in nonfatal cases resulting in no lost workdays.

It is also necessary to look behind J. P. Stevens' official statistics. The company keeps injured workers in plants to avoid "lost-time accidents." Medical records for example show 71 worker injuries at Stevens' seven Roanoke Rapids plants from August to December 1974. For all of 1974 Stevens reports only seven lost-time accidents at these factories.

Until the very recent past Stevens, like all textile firms, refused to admit that brown lung disease even existed. This crippler, contracted from cotton dust, may afflict 1 in 3 textile workers during their lives.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) ruled Stevens had no adequate respirator program to protect workers against brown lung. OSHA needed to fine the company to force it to begin the respirator program Lane mentions—and even then Stevens refused to purchase respirators the U.S. Public Health Service recommended. Stevens has on numerous occasions asked both OSHA and the North Carolina Department of Labor for postponement of safety regulations.

Neither we of the Stevens boycott nor Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers (ACTWU) officials have claimed the ACTWU has never made mistakes. It is however unfortunate Mr. Lane has the impression the union systematically mistreats and exploits its members. No union could long survive if it made that its policy. I ask Mr. Lane whether it is J. P. Stevens or the Textile Workers Union which has a fundamental economic incentive to run roughshod over the health, safety, and civil rights of Stevens workers.

computer dating

To the editor,

Having no small measure of responsibility for the Computer Date Dance, I find myself obliged to respond to Rajh's last article, "Future Shock; Getting Screwed by a Computer." (Record, 4-22-77)

1. Hopkins and Pratt House cannot be held responsible for any insults incurred by dancing with a Bennington Girl (the "dance major" of the seventh paragraph).

2. Had I realized that the decision to wear underwear might cause such anxiety, I would have incorporated a question into the questionnaire dealing with that particular topic. I can only wonder what convulsions Mr. Khadka must have suffered while preparing for the Boxer Short Party. Oh, the tortures of the sensitive ...

3. Anyone who bills himself as a "true Hindu ascetic ... I am not troubled by the pair of opposite passions" can hardly complain about getting a male and a female date. It sounds right up his Hindu ascetic alley.

Grads do well in job market

"Williams graduates have fared reasonably well despite the tight job market over the last few years," according to a report by the Office of Career Counseling which surveyed career trends in the classes of '72 through '75.

The survey, with 453 respondents from the four classes, or about a quarter of all contacted, found a high percentage of Williams grads going on to professional post-graduate study. Employment rates were high, and satisfaction with the liberal arts education was widespread.

"Recent grads are employed in a variety of professional categories," the report said. Only four members of the survey group were unemployed, a .9 per cent rate. The report cautioned, however, that "the percentage of graduates underemployed could not be determined from the information."

"There are no measurable distinctions between the types of employment patterns or graduate school pursuits between the male and female respondents," according to the survey information. "This indicates that women are employed at comparable levels throughout the range of professional occupations listed." That range spanned engineering, medicine, journalism, government and accounting.

Almost two-thirds of all Williams graduates entered post-graduate education. Most Williams alumni chose post-graduate programs in law, business, medicine, or the arts and sciences.

"The vast majority ... offered very strong support for their liberal arts education in terms of preparation for graduate school programs and-or employment," the report announced. Many cited training in critical thinking and writing as most important in their Williams educations.

recent state government approval of a request to expand the College's Board of Trustees. Chandler explained that the addition of two term trustees would "provide an opportunity for more diversity on the trustee board" and, more specifically, would allow for appointment of more women.

The College has yet to fill the positions, Chandler said, adding that the appointments would be announced in June or later. "The trustees are under no obligation to fill all five positions," he noted.

The trustees named the recently acquired Keck home Chadbourne House after Paul A. Chadbourne who served as president of the College from 1872-1881, succeeding Mark Hopkins. Chadbourne House which is located in Stetson Court will house 13 affiliates of Perry-Bascom House beginning next fall.

Chandler commented that Chadbourne was the last of the College's former presidents to be recognized in the name of a campus building. Record investigation revealed, however, that one president remains unheralded—Zephaniah S. Moore, who left Williams in 1821 to found Amherst College.

Harrington talks on socialism

She certainly does deserve credit for that." But it is not a virtue to be miserable, Harrington explained, rejecting the protestant ethic's unconscious assumption that "one demonstrates one's worth by suffering."

"My vision is for a society where no one suffers ... We should socialize and collectively pay for the necessities of life. Not even the lazy people should suffer.

"We are a changing civilization," he asserts. "We will get radical movements. But we want them to be working for us, not against us. My plan—that social possibility is, I feel, worth committing my life to."

Study probes languages

time," Pistorius assured the Record. "The situation simply led to a study by a CEP sub-committee on the language programs in general. It was up to the College to decide if it could make the sacrifice—if it was considered as such—to keep minimal staff numbers in underenrolled departments in order to guarantee top quality."

Pistorius explained that the Language departments' desire was to keep the study objective by not involving themselves in it. "The sub-committee consisted of three professors—psychology, religion, and biology teachers—and two students."

The language departments then conducted self-studies to determine the motivation, statistics and aims of language instruction at Williams in order to footnote the results of the CEP report. Pistorius said that the study was a matter-of-fact, objective definition of the role of languages as seen at Williams and that it detailed a series of comparative studies on enrollment figures.

"There was no action taken on the basis of the CEP report; it was never released to the faculty," Pistorius commented. The Language departments suggested that an outside group containing experts in language instruction evaluate the position of the Williams departments, in order to insure both objectivity and familiarity.

According to Pistorius, students at Williams are motivated to take language and foreign literature courses by a multitude of reasons that vary from language to language. "For example, the three major reasons students here take French courses are to improve their language skills, to visit a French-speaking country at some time, and to read French literature in its original form, in that order. Students take Spanish most often because they wish to visit a Spanish-speaking country."

Pistorius said that the average teaching load of each teacher at Williams was expected to be 96 students per five-course year, or 19.5 students per class. "The Romance language departments are below this average," he said.

However, enrollment in the Romance languages overall is not in the least below the average for other departments. "Last year, 294 students took Romance language courses during the fall semester and 265 registered for them in the spring. In the fall, eleven departments had higher enrollment figures. Twelve had lower. In the spring, these statistics were the same.

"Last year, 29 registered as French or Spanish majors, including those who were double majors. This was also about the median in terms of the number of majors in other departments."

Pistorius went on to say that the size of the department was appealing for the increasing number of majors who decided to follow a course of study in Romance Languages. "Smaller departments cater to more intimate intellectual contact," he said. He estimated that half those who were French and Spanish majors had chosen the department because of its size.

Pistorius summed up language instruction at Williams as "far from a crisis." He reasserted that change in the department purely to increase enrollment would be contingent on a change in the policy of Williams itself, and that such a change was unlikely and unnecessary.

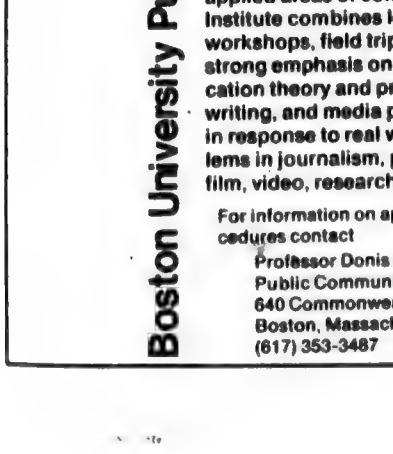
Wood returns to AMT— on set design for 'Guys'



Within the confusion and tumultuous activity on the Adams Memorial Theater stage, the set for Guys and Dolls begins to take form. Piece by piece, and nail by nail, Polly Wood '75 directed the set's construction. After two years working in the New York theater, Wood has returned to Williams as set designer for the production.

Since her graduation two years ago, Wood has worked in New York with a number of top designers. In her own words, she was initially an errand girl," picking up valuable knowledge and techniques on the job. She first worked with Tony Walton on the design for 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue and in five months, she went from running errands to constructing set models. Walton took her to Philadelphia with the show "for my education as well as my usefulness to him." More recently, Wood worked on the sets for Mike Nichols' new play Annie and I Love My Wife.

Wood presently works free-lance as a non-union assistant to set designers, building models. The United Scenic Artists conducts an annual exam for entry into the union. Wood said she hopes to join the union to avoid the limitations imposed upon non-union workers. Until she passes the exam, she cannot become a set designer for a Broadway play, Wood explained. She is not excluded from jobs in non-union dinner theaters and off-off Broadway, however.

While at Williams, Wood worked a great deal on design and scenery as well as doing a little acting. She designed the sets for two Freshman Revues and for several cabarets. Wood also served as president of Cap and Bells.

Wood said she considers the addition of a major great improvement in theatre at Williams. She said she thought the level of professionalism in the faculty had also risen immensely. "Williams won't ever be like going to acting school in New York City, which isn't its function, but its gradually coming up in preparing people for the professional world."

Dogon art exhibit open

Passersby on the fifth floor of Stetson Hall will notice that the display case there, until recently under construction, has now been completed and occupied. Until May 31 a collection of technological and ceremonial artifacts from the Dogon tribe of Mali will be on view in the case. The exhibit, entitled "Art of the Dogon", was prepared by Ben Heintz '79, with the sponsorship of the Anthropology Department.

The collection includes granary doors and locks, ceremonial bowls and trough, and forged iron jewelry and sculpture. For the most part, the carvings and figures adorning the pieces represent mythological motifs which are discussed in the guide which accompanies the exhibit. Herein, Heintz explains that Dogon art "is not made to be hung on walls or placed on shelves to decorate the home. It is expressive of the life they lead, their technology, cosmology and culture as a whole."

The pieces in the collection have been loaned by the Williams College Museum of Art and by Joseph and Margaret Knopfelmacher of New York. This exhibit is the first in a series of exhibits to be organized by the Anthropology Department. Beginning next fall, there will be four per year.

'Klaatu' skyrockets on Beatles rumor

by Steve Case

When Capitol Records released an album by a group called Klaatu last August, the gimmick was anonymity. The album cover lacked any names or a picture, and nobody would say who was in the "mystery group." The album was purchased by Capitol as a completed master recording, and the label agreed to release it because "of the quality and commercial sound of the music." Klaatu's manager, Frank Davies, steadfastly refused to divulge any information about the band, claiming they wanted their music to stand on its own merit. The album was well-received by critics, but flopped commercially, and everybody figured that was the end of it.

It wasn't. Two months ago, Steve Smith, an enterprising editorial assistant for The Providence Journal, wrote a feature called "Could Klaatu Be The Beatles" which analyzed in detail the group's music, name and lyrics and pointed out numerous possible hidden meanings. AM and FM stations in the Providence area began to play cuts from the album. Phonecall response was extraordinary, and local record stores quickly ran out of stock. Soon other stations in the country caught wind of what was happening, added the album to playlists and music was being aired and was selling strongly in major markets across the country, and both the album and a single entered the national best-seller charts. At last count, Klaatu, the album everyone had given up on until the Beatle rumors began, had sold 150,000 copies.

Klaatu's music is strikingly similar, at times, to that of the Beatles circa 1967, the "Sgt. Pepper" period. Songs such as "Sub-Rosa Speedway" and "Doctor Marvello" contain all the hallmarks of the "Beatle sound"—guitar parts played backwards, sitar solos, obscure lyrics delivered in a nasal British accent, and a crisp drum style. As a result, amateur sleuths everywhere have been looking for clues to Klaatu's identity, and have discovered the following: The name Klaatu was taken from the 1951 science-fiction movie "The Day The Earth Stood Still." On Ringo Starr's Goodnight Vienna album, the ex-Beatle is seen on the cover standing next to the spaceship from the movie, and is dressed like the character Klaatu. In the movie, when the creature from space is asked where he's from, he says "Venus and Mars" (the title of one of Paul McCartney's albums). Furthermore, when McCartney left the stage in Boston last summer during the "Wings Over America" tour, he said, "See you when the earth stands still." Beatle fans hoping for a reunion have interpreted these rather abstract findings to mean that Klaatu is the "Fab Four" in a clever disguise.

The mystery continues, much to the delight of the Capitol marketing staff. Could the Beatles have evaded the press and the public, headed for a remote recording studio, cut an album, and released the record under a false name? Would Capitol fail to capitalize on a Beatles re-grouping? The answer to both questions is, of course, no. Klaatu, quite simply, is not the Beatles. That conclusion, though not shared by an increasing number of people, was offered by the one man who knows for sure, Klaatu manager Frank Davies. In a recent interview, Davies explicitly denied that any of the four ex-Beatles contributed directly to the making of the Klaatu album. And that denial, the first Davies has issued with directness, pretty well shoots down the delightful speculation that Klaatu is the Beatles reincarnate.

Orr to read works

Gregory Orr, author of two books of poetry, will read from his work Monday, April 25, at 4 p.m. in Driscoll Lounge. The reading is sponsored by the Williams College English Department.

Even before the publication by Harper & Row in 1973 of his first book of poems, "Burning the Empty Nests," Donald Hall called Orr "the best young poet I know about." John Unterecker wrote of the "tiny ominous dramas" of Orr's poems, that "resolve into something like the significant illogical events that take place in dream. They are full of an undefinable meaning, precise and compelling, compact, powerful."

In 1975, Orr published his second collection of poetry, "Gathering the Bones Together." Orr, who teaches at the University of Virginia, has just received a Guggenheim Grant.

Kauffmann talks on film

Novelist, reviewer, film and drama critic Stanley Kauffmann will lecture on "Film in the Seventies" on Tuesday, April 26, at 8 p.m. in the Jesup Hall auditorium. Kauffmann's talk is sponsored by the Williams Lecture Committee as one of its series on "Film: Significance and Possibilities."

Kauffmann, 70, began his career as an actor and stage-manager with the Washington Square Players. Since 1958, he has been active in criticism at various times; as film and theater critic for "The New Republic," drama critic of "The New York Times," and book reviewer, essayist and critic for other journals.

The author of seven novels and a large number of short and long plays, Kauffmann has also published three collections of film criticism: "A World on Film," "Figures of Light," and "Living Images." He is the editor, with Bruce Henstell, of the anthology "American Film Criticism: From the Beginnings to 'Citizen Kane';" his collected theater criticism, "Persons of the Drama," was published in 1976.

Batmen belt Union, 8-3

by Frank Pergolizzi

Friday afternoon, in a game played under threatening skies that were soon to bless Williamstown with a weekend long rain storm, the Williams baseball team defeated the Union Dutchmen, 8-3. The victory was Williams' sixth on the season, and their 47th over Union in a series that began in 1881.

The game was not exactly a pitcher's duel. The Ephmen smacked thirteen base hits, while the Union hitters accounted for eleven, so the victory cannot be explained as one in which Williams outhit its opponent. The vital statistics were runners left on base; Union stranded thirteen compared to Williams' seven; and errors; the Dutchmen committed five leading to three unearned runs for the Ephmen, while Williams committed just one harmless error.

Williams got on the board in the first inning, scoring an unearned run, as leadoff hitter John Friborg reached first on an error by second baseman David Grotz, stole second, went to third on a fly ball to right, and scored on Tom Redden's sacrifice fly to right.

In the second inning, the Eph's bats exploded for five runs, all earned. The Ephmen rapped eight base hits in a row off Union pitcher, Charlie Flanagan. Friborg, Redden, and Rick Walter each knocked in a run, while Scott Harrington drove in two with a sharply hit line drive double to left.

Williams led 6-0, until the top of the seventh. Each time the Dutchmen threatened, Williams pitcher Tony Stall, simply pitched himself out of trouble. Stall only struck out five batters, but he saved them for the right moments, getting four of them with runners in scoring position. Solid fielding behind him, including a doubleplay started by shortstop Harrington, gave Stall whatever aid he needed. Union had two men on with none out three times, but never got a runner past third.

In the seventh Stall finally faltered and was belted for three runs. They were the first runs he had given up all year, after pitching thirteen consecutive scoreless innings. Union put together a walk and four singles to score three, before Fiery Mike Martineau relieved Stall.

The Ephmen scored an unearned run in the seventh and eighth innings. Martineau ran into a little trouble in the eighth, pitched out of it, and then set Union down with nothing across in the ninth, to record his second save, and preserve Stall's second victory.

The Eph attack was well balanced with every starter but one reaching base on a hit. Redden and Harrington knocked in two runs apiece. Frank Kreutz, even though he got two hits, saw his batting average fall to .652. The team batting average rose to .333, with 77 hits in 231 at bats, an impressive figure.

Tufts drops laxwomen

Opening regular season play last Thursday, the women's lacrosse team now stands 0-2 suffering a 13-3 loss to UMass April 21 while losing to Tufts 8-5 Saturday.

In the Tufts loss veteran offensive stars Mary Fish (2 goals), Sarah Baldwin (1), Brent McKinley (1), and Maggie O'Brien (1) led the scoring for the Ephs with goalie Marty Taft grabbing 13 saves.

Against UMass the Ephs were unable to cope with a confusing zone although Fish, Baldwin, and McKinley each had a goal. The Record will take a closer look at the team in this Friday's issue.

Three tie-breakers

Tennis tips Tufts

by Evan Bash

The tie-breaker. This relatively new innovation in tennis often provides more excitement than any new Farrah Fawcett-Majors poster could. Never has this excitement been more in evidence than last Saturday, when the varsity tennis team swept three tie-breakers, two of which decided the final set of three set matches, in downing a strong Tufts team 6-3.

The win puts Coach Dave Johnson and his Ephs in serving range of a .500 season record for the first time this year with a 3-4 mark. More importantly, the big triumph over the Jumbos indicates just how far Williams has come since the season began; Tufts had recently run over a UMass team that had beaten the young Ephs in their first match of the spring.

Williams and Tufts battled their way to a 3-3 stand-off after the singles, leaving the match as undecided as a young kid trying to choose one piece of candy from the corner candy store. Martin Goldberg thwarted a strong comeback bid to win in one of those third set tie-breakers, while no. 2 Jim Parsons took the other third set tie-breaker and victory by capturing the absolute last point of the match at 4-4 in the tie-breaker. Feeling helpless was Perry Nelson as his decent play was rebuffed by an opponent who has yet to come back to earth, and no. 4 Evan Bash was handled similarly by a player who touched down about ten minutes ago. Tad Roach continued his string of brilliant match performances by scoring a quick two set win. No. 6 Bill Whelan stroked his way through the first set, but then his opponent turned the tide to score an impressive third set win.

Doubles proved to be Williams' savior as three wins secured the match. The first team of Goldberg and Whelan just overpowered the opposition, while the no. 3 duo of Peter Friesen and Parsons had a two set win. This left Dean Gianakos and Nelson to mop things up, with a first set 5-4 tie-breaker to lead the way to a three set win.

The UMass laxmen, ranked eighth nationally, overpowered the Ephs at Cole Field Saturday. Though Williams scored first, the visitors responded twenty-fold, beating the good guys 20-9. (photo by Read)

Larry Tanner named Record athlete of week

Larry Tanner, junior member of the varsity track team, has been selected as the Record Athlete of the Week following his school record breaking performance in the hammer throw last Wednesday. Tanner's toss of 168 feet surpassed Tom Lester's ('72) old mark by a full 24 inches and was 12 feet further than his previous best. The heave also qualifies him for the Easterns and the Division III Nationals.

Honorable Mention—No. 1 singles player Martin Goldberg receives an honorable mention this week, after his winning performances over Harvard and Tufts. Goldberg won the only match in the Tennis team's 8-1 loss to Eastern power Harvard, and on Saturday he grabbed an individual win plus a doubles victory with partner Bill Whelan to give the Ephs a 6-3 triumph over Tufts.

UMass licks lax - Ephs fall 20-9

by Nancy Rhein

The rest of New England thinks they're crazy to go up against a national powerhouse with dreams of an upset year after year, but that never stops the Williams lacrosse team. With the number eight team in the nation storming on to Cole Field Saturday, the Eph's flicker of hope for a win was quickly doused by the University of Massachusetts attack, as the visitors defeated the Ephs 20-9.

Frosh face-off specialist Gus Nuzzolese opened the contest with a tremendous unassisted tally from outside 47 seconds into the game. The Ephs lead lasted but a minute, as Minutemen gunner Kevin Patterson put in his first of 5 goals to tie the score and put the Mass scoring machine into action. Grabbing ground balls and playing an incredible game of give-and-go, the Mass attack went from 3-1 to 7-1 in two minutes. Nuzzolese, interrupted the visitors domination, blasting one past an excellent defense for the team's second goal.

With a man-up advantage moments later, the Redmen took but 7 seconds to put it past Eph netminder Bob Cowin. Cowin remained composed throughout the Mass barrage as UMass added a little variety to its shots with a few blind-over-the-shoulder ones which resulted in four more first quarter goals.

Behind 11-2 with three quarters left it was clear the Ephs, despite their determination were unable to handle the offensive accuracy of the Mass squad. Williams coach Renzie Lamb cited quickness as the key difference between the squads as well as the ability of the visitors to move the ball. Mass went on to add nine more of their national calibre goals to secure the victory.

The stormy afternoon did have its bright spots for the Ephs as Peter Thomsen, Todd Eckerson, and Dick Goodbody joined middie Jamie Taylor for some determined lacrosse. Thomsen converted a sloppy clear attempt for an unassisted tally five minutes into the second half. Following two more Mass goals Taylor fed fellow middie Colie Nelson for the Ephs fourth goal before scoring his own from Max Murray to end the half 13-5.

Grabbing six in the first half, Cowin had some excellent saves for the squad as Mass outshot Williams while picking up almost twice the Ephs's ground balls.

The Minutemen defense was as tough as their attack holding the Ephs scoreless in the third quarter. Williams' defense was less effective, despite its effort, with Mass adding five more before sidelining the shooting stars for the fourth quarter.

The game then turned into a muddy scramble for the ball with the Ephs relying on goalie Bob Harryman to watch the Red attack. Scoring his second goal of the game, Thomsen made it 20-6 with four minutes left. Goodbody then responded with his own from Eckerson, before Thomsen completed his hat trick for the Eph's eighth. Frosh Doug Gill finished the scoring for the team hitting with :18 left.

Meeting another tough opponent Wednesday the Ephs will travel to Hanover to take on Dartmouth.

Eph ruggers had a rough Little Three championship weekend in the mud. The A-team fell to Amherst and Wesleyan 9-0 and 14-4 respectively. The B-side provided the only bright spot beating Wesleyan 6-3 after succumbing to the Lord Jeffs 16-0. (photo by Read)

Vandals burn costumes

A fire in the Adams Memorial Theater dressing room burned the costumes for Guys and Dolls. Insert shows burn marks on the floor. (photos by Kruger)

Vandals broke into the dressing rooms of the Adams Memorial Theatre early Wednesday morning and burned "a substantial number" of costumes for the Williams College Theatre-Cap & Bells production of "Guys & Dolls," according to AMT Director Jean-Bernard Bucky. Other costumes for the production were stolen at the same time, he added.

The Wednesday performance went on as scheduled, using rehearsal costumes, said Bucky. Costume Designer Martha Hally went to New York Wednesday to obtain supplementary costumes for the remaining performances.

The break-in occurred after the building was closed for the night, according to Bucky. A security officer checked the AMT at 12:30 a.m. and found everything in order, said Security Director Walter O'Brien.

Set Designer Polly Wood '75 discovered the break-in at 7:30 a.m. and found both men's and women's costumes in a burned pile on the floor of the dressing room. The Williamstown Fire Department was called, but the fire had burned itself out and was only smoldering, said O'Brien. The fire was not very large and was never a major threat to the building itself, he added.

According to O'Brien, the Williamstown Police are "investigating the possibility" of arson, he added. "The building was definitely locked, and there is no evidence "of forced doors or windows," said O'Brien. Both he and Bucky agreed that since costumes were stolen and others burned in a pile on the floor, "it's clear that what happened was intentional."

As of yesterday, O'Brien had no individuals whom he suspected of committing the break-in.

Bucky added that no other damage was done to the building, and that no one was injured during the fire. He estimated that about half the costumes, or parts of them, were lost. With the arrival of supplementary costumes from New York, "things are slowly coming together again," said Bucky.

He could not estimate the actual cost of the lost costumes, because so much of the work was done by volunteers, but commented that "two and a half months' work by our costumes people has been lost, and you can't put a price on that."

O'Brien did not know how the vandals entered the theatre. According to Bucky, security officers were searching the steam tunnels leading into the AMT basement for evidence that that route was used.

CC approves new ACEC structure

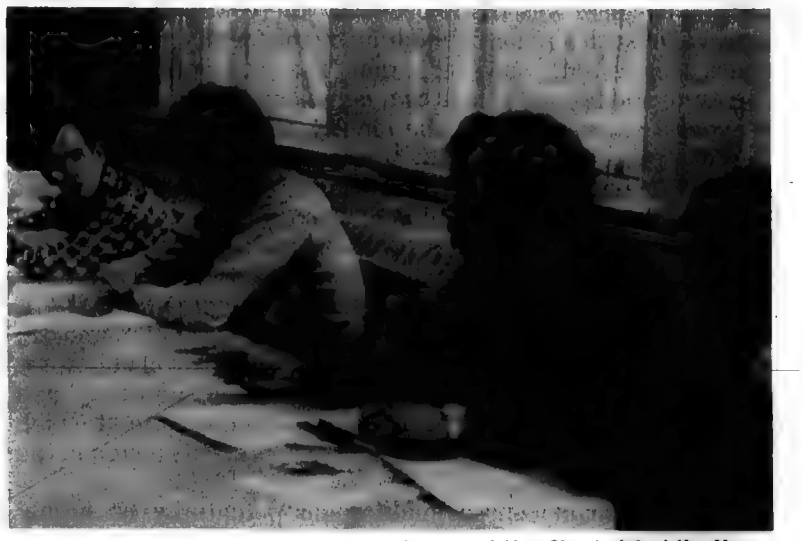
The College Council unanimously adopted the recommendations of their special committee to Restructuring the ACEC on Wednesday night and resolved that the reforms be instituted immediately. The Council also endorsed the recommendations of the Elections Committee regarding the appointment of student members to three student-faculty committees.

Concerning the ACEC, the Council made a number of significant changes, the most important of which was the idea of appointing a paid business manager for the organization. The business manager will be responsible for "publishing a complete and accurate budget for each concert immediately after each concert and . . . coordinating the ticket sales and monitoring all cash flows and receipts and . . . serving as an ex-officio member of the ACEC. The business manager will be subject to reappointment each term and have to report directly to the Council.

All proposed performances will now have to be approved by the College Council, and funding will be on a concert by concert basis. The new procedure was explained as follows: The ACEC would submit a list of performers under consideration, listed in order of preference. The probably cost and the expected drawing power of each group would also be noted. The College Council's approval of the list would be required before any bids could be submitted by the ACEC.

The ACEC will also be required to conduct surveys and open meetings on campus so as to solicit the musical preferences of students at Williams. Finally, the Committee to Restructure the ACEC recommended the creation of two new positions, technical and publicity directors.

Herwitz commented that he was pleased with the thoroughness and speed with which the committee made their recommendations. "The new committee will be much more businesslike and has a greater potential for reflecting the desires of the student body," he said.



Forum suggests altered ACEC

Students attending the open forum on the ACEC recommended opening the committee's meetings to the college community, and favored the hiring of a full-time employee to coordinate college entertainment functions.

Nine students were present at the forum, which was sponsored by the College Council committee charged with restructuring the ACEC. Other issues raised included the possibility of hiring a business manager for the committee, decreasing its membership and giving it a new name "to decrease the stigma attached," according to Jeff Verney, chairman of the restructuring committee.

Verney stressed the need for well-publicized open meetings of the ACEC, to give the committee "some sense of what people are looking for in entertainment." ACEC Chairman Jim Bowe acknowledged that the committee has a reputation as "an elitist organization." He added, "maybe when people get some conception of

Pledges may reaffirm college honor system

Students may be required to sign an honor pledge at the beginning of each year starting this fall, Honor System Committee Chairman Donald MacDonald announced after an open discussion Monday afternoon.

This stipulation was one of three proposals intending to clarify and strengthen the honor system debated by committee members and a handful of students and faculty during the 90 minute forum.

Currently, students sign a statement that they have read and agreed to the Honor Code before freshman year. A similar document would be distributed during registration each September.

Participants in the open meeting suggested two other courses of action: asking instructors to distribute specific guidelines for academic honesty in each course and having a statement of Honor Code regulations accompany each graded exercise.

Professor William Moomaw argued that these recommendations would reduce cheating by "the person who occasionally crosses the line." MacDonald remarked that many students had come to the committee unsure about how the Honor Code applied to specific assignments.

In supporting these measures, committee members Ken Schoetz, Dan Sullivan and John Svoboda stressed the importance of raising student awareness of the Honor Code.

Professor Robert Kozelka said that no matter how many guidelines were spelled out, students will still cheat, citing alleged cheating on his Math 140 tests despite "explicit guidelines." Although Professor Anson Piper agreed with these measures, he warned against too many guidelines. "There are certain things we don't need to state guidelines for." Committee member Craig Shaver maintained that these would produce too much paper work. "We should realize what is expected out of us in the course."

Although the committee and the faculty have not voted on the yearly pledge proposition, MacDonald told the Record "I'm fairly positive this will be enacted by fall." "I don't see any problems with guidelines each semester. There may be problems with pledges on each test or paper."

The graying of the college campus

by John Rindlaub

The stuff of books suddenly became a reality in a history class at Case Western Reserve University. According to The Wall Street Journal, a 74-year-old member of the class began reminiscing about his escape from Nazi Germany in the 1930's.

A woman in her 40's, The Journal added, recently earned her bachelor's degree in sociology from Notre Dame in Cleveland. She is now working on her master of public administration degree at Cleveland State University. Her new academic credentials have won her a handsome promotion with her job at Cleveland Municipal Court.

These are just two examples that are part of a movement that is rapidly changing the face of higher education in America: college courses for adults of 25 and over. The Journal said that in 1975, 3.7 million adults registered for college courses, or 34 per cent of total college enrollments. This was a huge jump from the 1.7 million enrollment in 1970. The Census Bureau estimates that by 1980, adults could form 40 per cent of the total.

The movement has been inspired by the colleges themselves. As the enrollments of many schools drop, they are operating at huge deficits. After 34 straight years of enrollment increases, The Journal said that last fall the total flattened out at 11.3 million students. Colleges are attempting to find alternative student bodies to remain in operation.

This 'graying of campus' is coming at a time when the number of Americans over 25 is fast-increasing. Educators calculate that the 18 to 24-year-old population will drop after 1980, when the number of young adults is expected to peak.

Of these adults who attend colleges, many are going for the first time; others are returning after a number of years away from the campuses. High unemployment is certainly causing some adults to seek new skills. There are also many women seeking entry to the job market through college, as well as middle-aged "retreats" seeking a new career and retired people seeking "enrichment."

If the prospect of having Mom, Dad and maybe even Gran and Grampa attending your 101 classes next semester isn't inviting, don't despair. Although many campuses will only be able to survive by meeting the demands of this "new clientele," Williams has just turned away 81 per cent of its young applicants for next fall.

News boss resigns

Andrea L. Diehl '75 has resigned as College News Director to pursue a career in journalism. Diehl, appointed last July 20, will take an editing job with the Philadelphia Daily News.

Ray Boyer, currently a radio and TV consultant for the College, will take over Diehl's responsibilities through July 1, after which a more permanent arrangement will be made.

As News Director, Diehl was responsible for all press releases for the College, including announcements of lecture series and other events, performing arts, and all sporting events at the College.

Diehl characterized her move as "a very quick thing." The offer to work for the paper, whose readership numbers 250,000, "came out of the blue . . . I had to make a fast personal career decision." With the Daily News, Diehl will be responsible for editing the food section, as well as working on entertainment pieces, reviews and features material.

"The College has been very good about the whole thing," said Diehl. "I hate to leave them in the lurch, but . . ." According to Diehl, over 500 applications have been received from people wishing to fill her spot.

Diehl graduated summa cum laude from Williams with a double major in the history of ideas and art history. She then worked for the New Paper in Philadelphia, serving as a senior editor and feature writer. This venture folded after six months.

Boyer, last year, left his position as News Director of Pittsfield radio station WBEC to set up his own business.

Mostly Praise

Just over three years ago Professor Gordon Winston, then chairman of the Course Evaluation Study Committee, told the RecordAdvocate that his committee had voted not to recommend that students have access to the results of faculty course evaluation questionnaires. A student on that committee stated that the decision was made because "there was no hope" for approval of such a recommendation by the faculty. Winston and others suggested, however, that the students draw up, distribute and tabulate their own questionnaires if they wished to avoid a showdown with the faculty.

Last year, a student initiated course guide was produced but after a few faculty members mumbled something about lawsuits, the College Council consigned the half of the guide containing verbal comments to the nearest paper shredder.

Well, a student run course guide, with verbal comments intact, has finally come to pass and the people who made it happen deserve to be praised. The guide itself is only mediocre. Its biggest drawbacks were the significant number of courses it didn't cover, the often insignificant number of completed questionnaires which were returned and the late date at which it was released. Nevertheless, the guide represents a step in the right direction.

A student run course guide could potentially be highly useful to students in choosing courses and instructors. In addition, the information in a student course guide, indirectly, gives students a powerful voice in faculty promotion and tenure proceedings. By giving students more information about instructors, a comprehensive guide will increase the ability of students to "vote" for the best instructors each semester.

We applaud the efforts of the Student Course Guide Committee and urge the Council to take the necessary actions to insure that next year's guide will be even better.

The Waite is Over

I first heard about The Book four years ago. The syllabus simply said "History 101 Lecture: R.G.L. Waite", but my JA's knew better. "Don't miss it," they warned, and I didn't. When the lecture was over I returned to my room in utter awe. "You haven't seen anything yet," my JA's laughed. "Wait until The Book comes out. That'll really blow people away."

And so I've waited. And I've waited. And I've waited some more. I've watched John Toland on the "Tomorrow" show, hoping to hear a brief plug for one of his alma mater's professors. I've read sections of Toland's book, searching for an elusive footnote offering a sneak preview of a major historical biography presently underway in the Berkshires. And I've read the New York Times Book Review religiously each Sunday, sifting through a jungle of Hitler-related books. And still no Waite.

Until now, that is. Godot has finally arrived. After 20 years of research and revision, The Book is finally out and due in Williamstown early next week. Harper & Row have put together a heavy ad ad campaign and reviewers are busy preparing their comments. "Hitler: The Psychopathic God: A biography is officially ready for public perusal. But if you think that it will provide the definitive solution to the riddle of Hitler, think again, for Waite will be the first to caution otherwise.

"The stress here falls on aspects of Hitler's life and career which have been neglected by previous historians," Waite says in the preface to the book. "My intention has not been to write a complete life and times of Hitler; this book is designed not to replace but to complement several fine biographies."

While the book may complement some biographies, it is likely to set many others on end, for Waite's approach to Hitler involves the use of a relatively new and still very controversial branch of history called "psychohistory".

"I believe that the career of Adolph Hitler raises questions that can be answered neither by psychology nor history working alone," Waite explains in his preface. "It seems to me that Hitler must be seen at the same time as both a mentally deranged human being and a consumately skillful leader of high intelligence. To treat him solely as a rational statesman, as (A.J.P.) Taylor does, or as an ambitious tyrant, as (Alan) Bullock does, is to misjudge the complexity of his personality and to misunderstand a great deal of his historical behavior."

"I believe that the career of Adolph Hitler raises questions that can be answered neither by psychology nor history working alone," Waite explains in his preface.

In an attempt to explain what he deemed irrational and inexplicable acts by Hitler, therefore, Waite consulted several specialists in the field of pathological personalities, among them the noted psychoanalyst Erik Erikson. From these sessions evolved the book's thesis.

"I differ from (other) historians," Waite explained, "because I proceed from a fundamentally different premise; namely, that Hitler was a pathological personality whose career cannot be understood without a careful examination of his personal life. Unaided, the traditional methods of historical analysis and common sense are inadequate to that task."

"Readers will find a good deal of conjecture in this book, particularly in the discussion of the vitally important first years of Hitler's life and in the effort to show how Hitler's psychopathology may have influenced his political actions," Waite is quick to caution. "But in the end any historian's efforts to reconstruct past events and dead personalities will involve guesswork. As an act of imaginative reconstruction, his work will remain fallible, flawed, and incomplete."

As cognizant as Waite is of the limitations and dangers of a psychohistorical approach, and though he cringes at the word "psychohistorian", he defends the use of the two disciplines in biographies of figures such as Hitler against criticisms such as those expressed by Dr. Charles Strozier, editor of the Psychohistory Review, in a recent Newsweek article.

"The basic problem (with psychohistory) is that we're trying to apply a theory developed for clinical purposes to indirect forms of evidence, such as personal diaries and information reported by others," Strozier claims.

"If psychology can be useful in getting at some problems, let us use it," counters Waite. "If other kinds of analysis are more appropriate, let us use them."

"In the search for Hitler, we are not constrained to choose between clinical psychology on the one hand and, say, political history on the other. Our task is rather to join hands in a cooperative effort to find the most satisfying explanation of the man and his times. Thus psychology should be seen as a supplement to other legitimate modes of historical inquiry, not as a substitute for them. Psychology can be helpful to the historian. More claim than that should not be made—nor any less."

One claim that must be made about Waite's book, though, involves the high quality of its prose, for it is both very persuasive and totally engrossing. And as Richard Sewall was wont to say, it doesn't matter so much if you're right or wrong so long as you're interesting.

Letters: racism, the pill, and course guide

Racism I

To the editor:

My alumni subscription to the Record, which has adorned my mailbox since my graduation, has afforded me a ringside view, from my own personal box seat, of the ongoing debates that ravage the quiet intellectual community of the Purple Valley. It truly is fascinating to peek at the issues of the college where one spent four years, now from the vantage point of an outsider. Especially intruiging is the continuing volley of racism allegations, with authors expressing ideas in print which have spanned the spectrum of heartfelt ... to ludicrous.

It isn't my intention to criticize the articles, nor do I intend to infuse my two cents with "snide comments, innuendo, and a paternalistic attitude". Each article, however, brought something to light, that is indeed true on both sides of the fence: we are chronically unable to grasp and to fully understand where the other party is coming from.

Let's examine this "racism" and individually step back from our intellectuality, our preconceptions, and our well-honed Williams wits. Take a look at someone you may know. Do you like him or her, do you not, or are you indifferent? Think of the reasons why ... the personal reasons. Remember, we are not dealing in demographics here, we are dealing emotionally and between people. Do we find ourselves thinking along the following lines: "Well, he's sensitive, humorous, intelligent, and responsive ... but, on the other hand, he is Polish"?

Unfortunately, there are severe undercurrents of fear and intimidation among groups not only in Williamstown, but everywhere. How else could something spark such emotional reaction? Perhaps we can try being totally honest with each other, and deal with these fears, finding the real reasons behind them ... instead of using them as weapons in a warfare of emotions, wits, and intimidation. Perhaps the steam may let out more slowly, instead of boiling over so easily.

It's amazing how we can be so objective and rational about so many serious facets of our lives: hunger, war, poverty, nuclear armageddon, etc.; and then turn around and blow it all over Racism ... (and Basketball?).

I hate to sound trite, but there are reasons why we have heard the same ol' thing over and over. Sometimes, owning the sensitive egos that we do, we have short fuses, and become violently defensive when a comment is worded incorrectly, and an intention is possibly misread. Are we really that unsure of ourselves and our heritages that we are so easily threatened?

Please don't equate this with a lecture. I don't profess to be any different, or any better than anyone else. I certainly do not own a longer fuse, and I am not saying that anyone's feelings in this most ticklish of matters are wrong. All I am saying is that perhaps we should learn to look before we leap into diatribes on the op-ed page ... to take a few moments to attempt to see it through the other guy's eyes ... and not to lose our humanity. Then, perhaps these pages could be devoted to discussion of ideas that may be of some benefit to us all, instead of massaging salt in some very tender places.

Sincerely,

Racism II

To the editor:

Your editorial in the April 22 issue of the Record missed the main point of Mr. Otis' article. The basic point of Mr. Otis' article was that given the assumption that racism is a "nasty attitude", "the majority of the people in the Williams College Community are nasty people." Now if his assumption is accepted as fact, his conclusion is certainly factual. What you could have done was to question his assumption and thereby refute his conclusions. It is pathetic that some of your staff will be getting degrees this year when they have obviously missed the basic elements of logic. How about enrolling your staff in an introductory logic course on campus?

Yours sincerely,
Ahmed Ibn Ben Ali

Pill problems

To the editor:

I would like to share with all Williams people, but especially with those having medical orientations, an interesting thought concerning the use of synthetic estrogens ("the pill") for birth control in light of the recent controversy over the possible ban on saccharin.

From what we can deduce from reports in the media, large doses of saccharin might have a carcinogenic effect on some humans. Because of these conclusions there is a strong possibility that saccharin will be banned or at least restricted from public sale. For years, however, the medical profession has been aware of significant evidence that synthetic estrogens are strong carcinogen candidates. Oral contraceptives have also been linked with strokes, pulmonary embolism, gall bladder diseases and heart attacks. Although some people scoff at the apparent absurdity of some of the experiments involving saccharin (500 soda pops per day, etc.), the case with estrogens doesn't seem so ridiculous: the general action of estrogen is to promote tissue growth, and estrogens are known to effect almost every tissue in the human body.

It appears all too likely to me that the pill is still on the market primarily because the male-dominated medical profession is either consciously or subconsciously willing to take risks with female physiology. Most females are warned by their doctors of various pill side effects, and fewer are probably made aware of the possible carcinogenic effect. Yet how many women at Williams think that their male doctors would allow these same risks to be taken with their own reproductive functioning? Imagine the exact pill counterpart existing for males, and I think you would agree that most men would abstain before taking high doses of a major reproductive hormone whose long and short range side effects are largely unknown.

I am not going to become a doctor (or a woman) some day, but for those women at Williams who will be; Protest! Perhaps science would develop an alternative to the pill almost as "miraculously" fast as it has found alternatives to other substances banned by the government.

Guide thanks

To the editor:

On behalf of the Student Course Guide Committee, I am happy to report that our first, but hopefully not last, issue was out in time for registration. The committee regrets any errors that may have appeared in this issue. As I'm sure the Williams community is aware, the guide was beset with a number of problems this year. Questionnaires were not returned in adequate numbers and our inexperience caught up with us in the final few weeks before registration. We hope that this issue of the guide has shown what potential it could have. If a course guide is to have meaning, it requires the participation of the students. Williams can have a good student course guide. With everyone's help, next year we will. Hopefully this first guide has shown that we really can.

'Unsung hero'

To the editor:

I'm pleased to see that after all these years my brother Bill, "the unsung hero," has finally received the recognition he richly deserves. It's a good thing he didn't go to Dartmouth.

Affluence goes undercover with chic poverty look

by Bruce Doblin

Out of the student movement of the 60's came a genuinely sincere interest in the plight of the nation's poor, underprivileged, and oppressed. Blue jeans and long hair caught on quickly as a sign of the protest, and a symbolic representation of the movement's fidelity with the poor. Numerous new fads arose during the period and one of the most visible on college campuses today is the denim revolution and the chic poverty look. What is interesting to me are the manifestations of this national movement on the Williams campus.

If you really are poor, then being part of the new look is easy. Jeans are all you can afford. But, if you have money a different situation arises. You can't just buy any old pair of blue jeans. Instead, you have to trot on down to the local boutique and buy the $8.99 pair of jeans for $25.88. (Or you could spent up to twelve dollars on a pair of used jeans which were probably broken in by an authentically destitute individual who had to sell more than the shirt off his back). Every one knows that if you don't pay a lot for the clothes that you wear, then they aren't any good. It would be unthinkable to wear a denim skirt or dress which wasn't tailor made or failed to have the impressive European cut and label. Sure, people wear jeans around Williams, but how many of them are ripped or dirty? (Be truthful now).

To complete the chic poverty outfit, you must include the basic work shirt. Even Jimmy Carter is teaching the White House staff how to dress according to the mood of the nation. As at Williams, you learn that it's really not the ordinary work shirt which makes the outfit; it's an L. L. Beaner. If your laundry hasn't come back from the dry cleaners, it is permissable to substitute an alligator for a bean.

What I find most interesting are the little tip-offs which tell you that for some reason you wouldn't believe you were at Berkeley. I found it most informative to note the smaller details. Yes, the clothes can look quite authentic, but observe the Kucci belt with the silver earrings from Tiffanys. Or, look for the Dior scarf and the gold ring from Cartiers. If these details aren't a give away, then smell the perfume. It's not Bonne Bell, but Gevyche, and L'air du temps picked up on the last trip to Paris.

It is reassuring to know that people don't blow everything out of proportion here. It makes perfect sense to substitute something small for a chevy station wagon—something like a Triumph Spitfire, a BMW, a Mercedes coupe, or an Alpha Romeo. It's all in the move to conserve space—or it is gas?

For some reason, the poverty look doesn't go over well in the purple valley. Here, the dream of every red-blooded student is to work in a major New York bank and live on the upper east side. Williams is a well-respected and recognized institution of higher education and one of its sources of recognition is its excellent Economics departments. Do you really believe it is all coincidence?

I would be hypocritical if I preached an all-out campaign against the affluence which abounds in the rural Berkshires. I am enjoying it here at Williams as I sit and type this article in my own jeans. I'm part of the masquerade just as is the next person, but there are a few observations which are disturbing. There is clearly a difference between the appearance and the reality of the situation and I'm afraid some people aren't fully aware of this incongruity. A critical look around every now and then can be very educational. If you look under the rug, you may just find that there is a little dirt that the matron left behind when she vacuumed your room.

Freshman Days 'Goes Wild'

by Eric Laschever

This fall there will be something new added to Freshman Orientation. The incoming class will be offered the opportunity to go camping in small groups composed of six or seven other freshmen, one or two upperclass leaders, and a faculty member (where possible). These trips will be run in the three days prior to Freshman Days, during Freshman Days, and the second weekend of classes. They will be designed to appeal to a broad range of camping abilities and will hopefully foster a highly personal interaction among the participants, and an informed and concerned awareness for the environment.

At the start of the semester a group of students concerned with the quality of Freshman days met with Mr. Eusden and discussed the possibilities of developing an "outdoor orientation" similar to programs offered by Dartmouth, Princeton, and Cornell. Bolstered by his enthusiastic response the group met with Dean Stevens who was also encouraging. The group's initial proposal which would have accommodated seventy-five freshmen in the three days prior to Freshman Days, was unanimously supported by the Freshman Council, who voted fifty dollars to help with expenses. Equipment and assistance in planning routes and soliciting leaders was offered by the Outing Club. This proposal, however, was rejected by the college.

Their reluctance to endorse the project stemmed not only from the logistical problems of providing the experience for such a large group, but from a concern for the effects this program might have on the class as a whole, and the relevance of the experience to the College's educational goals. They also wanted to examine alternatives which would involve fewer technical difficulties and could be offered to the entire class.

In meetings with the CUL these and other problems with the proposal were discussed at length. The committee approved a pilot program for next year's freshmen as a means of testing the concept on a small scale (21 participants prior to freshman days) and in various places in the school calendar. They emphasized the experimental nature of the pilot program and their hope that as a result of their support students with other suggestions will become involved in planning Freshman Days.

This project is being co-sponsored by Dean Stevens and the Center for Environmental Studies, and will be administered by a student volunteer who'll be staying in Williamstown this summer. Any students or faculty who wishes to help in planning or running next year's program, or who has ideas for Freshman Orientation in general may contact Paul Goren, Michael Hill, Jane Golay, Tom Black, Eric Laschever, Malinda Bergamini or Sue Conley.

Disc war hits Spring St.

by Eric Sundin

What do Harry Sheehy, Hal March and Paul Garvey all have in common? All three own and operate record stores in Williamstown, each store being in tiddley-wink distance of the other. They have similar prices, selections and clientele. Two of the stores have opened in the past month, while the third has existed for three years. The Record interviewed the three owners to examine the competitive situation.

Hal March opened his Toonerville Trolley Records about a month ago. A native Vermonter, a former English teacher and musician, March has a love of music and knowledge of the Williamstown area which developed into his record business. Before Toonerville opened, March drove from college to college in a van stuffed with records. Initially successful, his mobile business could not keep up with overhead costs, licensing and parking restrictions.

Williamstown provided a perfect opportunity to channel capitalistic energies, since Harry Sheehy's store, Discoveries, was the only competitor. March's location is at the intersection of Spring and Water Streets. The price of his $6.98 list album is $5.19, which he says is just enough to keep him in business. March sympathizes with students and their limited budgets.. He offers a new series of LP's which list for $7.98 for $5.89. Toonerville also eases such inflation by featuring many new and unknown artists or labels at $1.99.

March did not realize when he opened his shop that a third competitor, the Record Store, was soon to appear and steal some of his business. According to Paul Garvey of Dalton, Massachusetts, the midtown Spring Street location was irresistible.

Garvey believes the record retail business is a fixed proposition. "Inventory, price and location, in that order should solely determine sales," he said. Like March, he sells at about 25 per cent off the list price, or $5.23 for the $6.98 series, and appears to cater to the younger generation in both its inventory and smoking accessories. He also says he believes students are generally immobile, without cars, and will appreciate the short walk.

As to the future of Discoveries across the street, Harry Sheehy of Stockbridge refused to comment. He agreed there isn't room in town for the three of them and that one of them must soon bow out. Meanwhile, it's still the closest store which boasts a large selection of used records at excellent prices.

The prices of Discoveries new records are comparable to those at the other stores. All three owners, however, concede that they are at the mercy of the record companies who know that the new top twenty albums will sell whether or not the price is raised another dollar or two.

Gyula conducts last Berkshire Symphony

The Berkshire Symphony will present the final concert of its current season on Friday, April 29, at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall, Williamstown. Music director Julius Hegyi has invited Hungarian conductor Horvath Gyula to be guest conductor for this program of Liszt's Les Preludes, Kadaly's Hary Janos Suite, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F major.

Horvath is a well-known and widely respected Hungarian musician. He is both a violinist and a conductor. Horvath studied at the Liszt Conservatory where he won high honors in violin performance. Early in his career, he was given responsibility for the music of an entire district in Hungary and has since risen to his present position of conductor of the Sopron Symphony.

Liszt's Les Preludes is the orchestration of one of the Poetic Meditations of Lamartine. It shows the love, storm-and-stress, pastorale and finale of the Lamartine lines which begin, "What is our life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by deat?"

Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F. Major is sometimes considered to be the most representative of Beethoven the man.

Hary Janos Suite is a hymn to Hungary. The initial piano glissand in the work represents a sneeze, which according to Hungarian tradition, is often a signal that what follows may not be stricly true. Hary Janos was a real soldier who fought in the Napoleonic wars, but he did not really defeat the Napoleonic army singlehandedly, as he dreams in the fourth movement.

Griffin Hall Concerts at Williams College closes the current season with an all-Bach program Saturday, April 30, at 8 p.m.

Victor Hill will open the program with three short preludes and fugues for harpsichord. Janet Geroulo will then join him in the Flute Sonata in E-flat. The first half closes with the Capriccio that Bach composed at the age of 19 for a family gathering at Arnstadt, on the occasion of his older brother's departure with the army of King Carl XII of Sweden.

For the second half of the program, Geroulo will play the Flute Sonata in B minor, and Hill will offer the Prelude and Fugue in E major from the second book of the "Well-Tempered Clavier" and the Toccata in D major.

Review

Thompson triumphs as a doll

by Martha A. Williamson

(Note: "Guys and Dolls", directed by Jean-Bernard Bucky, opened Wednesday night at the Adams Memorial Theatre. This reviewer had the opportunity to attend not only opening night but the final dress rehearsal performance the previous night. The following review results from observations drawn from both performances.)

"Guys and Dolls" is a Broadway musical fable and being such creates bigger than life expectations of the show which were met creatively and enthusiastically but not always successfully by the Williams College Theatre production. The musical, based on the tales of Damon Runyon, deals with gambling guys and Broadway dolls and has enough of a plot to justify lots of fun, familiar songs and doesn't try to say much more than "anybody can fall in love." Trouble is, in the case of Sky Masterson (Bob Gregory) and Sister Sarah (Betty Agostino) we never really see much love bloom. Gregory is a nice blend of arrogance and charm but Miss Agostino doesn't seem comfortable exploring her character beyond the limits of dialogue and basic blocking, leaving little for Gregory to play to. Chemistry really clicks, however, between lovable Nathan Detroit (Steve Wertimer) and his 14-year fiancee Miss Adelaide (Dianne Thompson). Their scenes together are priceless. Everything Dianne Thompson touches in this show turns to gold; her timing is always on target and that voice is indescribable. Michael Knight, Kevin O'Rourke, Renzie Lamb, and Betsy Beers added particularly nice individual touches. Most at home on stage was Chuck Hirsch, whose exuberant "Sit Down You're Rocking the Boat" inspired the strong chorus to their most exciting number.

Solo assignments for the most part, while performed adequately, remained rather uninspired. An exception was Daniel O'Connor's touching "More I Cannot Wish You." Musical Moments that lacked Laurie Boyd's choreography or Dianne Thompson's sparkle inevitably suffered from introverted and frequently tedious recitals. The most memorable musical numbers were Boyd's dance sequences, specifically an hysterical "Bushel and a Peck" by the Dolls, a breath-taking Guys ballet in "Luck Be a Lady", and a lively Havana extravaganza which needed more rehearsal but was brilliantly conceived by the director as a counterpoint to the dialogue.

Bucky's direction enjoys some clearly brilliant and imaginative moments, particularly in scenes involving his crew of colorful gambling characters. The men are sexy, sharp, and energetic; Bucky has succeeded in creating a deceptively simple balance between each Guys' clearly defined persona and the ease with which they all work together as an ensemble in difficult stylized blocking. Their hasty midnight exit from the Mission is perfection. Where the Guys are complimentary, however, the Dolls are meant to be competitive; although it is difficult to differentiate occasionally between the times they are in character and when they simply lack polish and concentration. But, as the chauvinist sitting next to me said, "Who cares about concentration when they can look like THAT?!"

Set misses spirit

The set, designed by Polly Wood '75, is a disappointment at first. Her stunning backdrop suggests a Manhattan spirit which remains unrealized in the set which fails to recall Broadway as much as Cat Fish Row relocated to Blue Hawaii—an albeit elaborate and impressive structure—but Cat Fish Row just the same. Overlooking the initial conception, Wood has provided Bucky with an extremely functional stage which the director exploits to its optimum potential with tight, economical acting areas and extraordinary scenes changes which keep the show fast-paced and support Bucky's reputation as a master of transition.

Mention should be made of the orchestra, under the direction of Irwin Shainman. They seem to be having an awful lot of fun down there in that hellhole orchestra pit, and in spite of an occasional faulty entrance, they have added a nice showy sound in a thankless task.

The English department will award two prizes for writing to Williams Students this year. The Wainwright Short Story Award of $50 will go to the best undergraduate short story submitted, and the Conger Prize for Journalism of $100 will be awarded for the best work appearing in an undergraduate publication submitted. Entries should be submitted to the English department in room 2, Stetson, by May 2, 1977.

Golfers add three wins

Varsity gold added three more victims to its growing list last week, downing Springfield, Siena, and Trinity on April 25 at Taconic. The match was a crucial test for coach Rudy Goff's linksters, as Trinity boasted its strongest team in years and Springfield dealt the Ephs one of their rare setbacks last year. But Williams responded with a competent, consistent team tally of 397 and a comfortable victory on the cold, grey, wet day. Co-captains Steve Saunders and Dave Tomaszek and inspired senior Chris Vogelsang were all in the 70's, with Saunders copping the medal at 76 and upholding Williams' pride by keeping up with Trinity's Bunyanesque 6'6", 235 lb. Bill Dodge in a driving contest. Bill Upton and Bill Sprague rounded out the usable scoring (the top five of seven scores count in varsity matches).

Last Saturday the team bumped off Albany State but lost to a superb Colgate squad in the miserable, driving rain of upstate New York.

Williams' opener the day before saw the team fire the lowest score in recent history, a sparkling 383, in obliterating Bates by 64 strokes. Leading the carnage was soph Bill Upton, who broke a personal slump with a superb 72. Upton played so well that the all time varsity single round record was within his grasp until a couple of unfortunate late bogies denied his attempt to make history. Saunders and Vogelsang each contributed 75; Tomaszek, retarded by an uncharacteristically poor putting performance, managed 79. Senior Barney Ireland added the fifth score, an 82.

The golfers travel to the Country Club of Brookline, two time US Open site, to encounter powerhouses Harvard and Holy Cross. The continued fine play of the three top seniors, if bolstered by strong performances from the potentially explosive remainder of the lineup, could repeat last year's upset of these teams and continue the Ephs' momentum into the Little Three tournament on Saturday of Parents' Weekend.

Crew dominates Little 3 on Conn River

The Williams crews won three of four races in a near sweep of the Little Three championship on the Connecticut River near Amherst Saturday.

The freshman eight started things off as they moved out on the Amherst and Wesleyan frosh early and never looked back, amassing a 21 second margin over Amherst while understroking both their rivals to the finish.

Next, the powerful varsity lightweights, rowing as J.V. entries, remained undefeated as they completely outclassed their opponents, crossing the finish line 21 seconds ahead of Wesleyan with Amherst practically out of sight.

The women's heavyweight eight continued Williams' domination of the rain-swept course as they stroked past their Little Three opponents to grab first place while the lightweight women finished fourth in the field of stronger heavyweights.

In the afternoon's final event the varsity heavyweights placed a disappointing second, 2½ seconds behind Wesleyan.

the work load we face, they'll have a little more sympathy for what we're trying to do."

Verney said that a cutback in ACEC membership "will definitely go through." "The committee really needs to be tightened up and made into a viable unit," he claimed. In order to offset the smaller membership, the committee proposes that the ACEC offer free tickets to those willing to help set up for concert events, a policy that the committee has followed in the past.

The restructuring committee will consider hiring an "entertainment manager" to be responsible for coordinating and distributing information concerning college entertainment functions. According to Verney, this full-time employee would fulfill many of the duties now performed by the news office.

Students favored recommending to the College Council that the new gymnasium planned for construction be built so that it could serve as a concert facility. The suggestion came from Jim Bowe, who pointed out that the Chapin Hall renovation will substantially reduce the number of seats available for a concert in that building. The new gymnasium might be built to be an acoustically feasible site for a concert.

Women's lax posts two wins

by Rex Coons

The Women's Lacrosse team began its 8-game schedule with two tough losses, but the skirted stickers rebounded against Seven Sisters opponents from Smith and Holyoke. At home against Smith on Wednesday, Linda Wilkins' team posted a 10-3 win led by Maggi O'Brien's 6 goals and Captain Mary Fish's hat trick. Val Corning added a goal while Soph netminder Marty Taft was turning back 11 shots. The Jayvees also triumphed by a score of 11-2 as Leigh Costikyan exploded for 7 goals. The classy varsity act which features 4 returning all-New England selections travels to Wesleyan on Saturday while the J.V. is home against their new Little Three sisters from Amherst.

The squad nabbed their first victory on Monday against the Lyons from Mount Holyoke College. The wet field at Holyoke was complete with a lake in front of one goal, but that didn't deter a solid team effort in the 12-7 decision. Maggi O'Brien made like a duck hunter over that pond as she picked up 5 tallies. Mary Fish chipped in with 3 and wings, Corning and Baldwin each bagged 1. Defenseman Cammie McClellan also scored on a 40-yard howitzer that started out as a pass and eluded numerous sticks on its way to the net. Marty Taft was her proficient self in goal with 22 saves.

Playing again under wet conditions at home against Tufts, The Lady elephants prevailed by a score of 8-5 as the Williams attack ground to a sluggish halt amidst the well-conditioned and game-tested Tufts squad. Fish had 2 goals, while O'Brien, McKinley, and Baldwin each struck paydirt once. Taft stopped 13 shots.

Against UMass the Lax ladies were befuddled by the Red's zone defense and their razor-sharp passing attack. While falling 13-3, the team displayed an inability to clear the ball from their zone and connect with goals while Marty Taft was outstanding in goal coming up with 18 fine saves.

Perhaps the best performance to date occurred when the team journeyed to scrimmage the Chiefs of Springfield College April 13. On this day, Williams was overwhelming as they toppled the teepee dewellers on their mod sod by a score of 16-5. O'Brien pumped in 6 goals while Bedrosian and Baldwin each copped hat-tricks. McKinley added 2 to the tally while Sneath and McClellan also rippled the nets. Taft hauled in 20 saves and witnessed an overall solid team performance at every position.

Pacing this year's squad are four returning All-New England selections including junior Captain Mary Fish.

Ephs drop a heartbreaker to Amherst in ninth

by Frank Pergolizzi

It's the bottom of the ninth, the score tied 4-4, the bases loaded with two out, and Amherst pitcher Bill Swiacki stepping into the batter's box to face rival hurler Steve Maier. Swiacki hits Maier's second pitch on the ground right at second baseman Roger McEniry. McEniry goes down on one knee to field the ball. It bounces off his chest, he picks the ball up, starts to throw to second, changes his mind and throws to first. The throw is low and in the dirt, and according to the umpire, pulled first baseman Ken Hollingsworth off the base. Swiacki is safe, the winning run scores, and Amherst beats Williams 5-4.

A disappointing ending to a hard fought struggle which saw the young Ephmen come from behind twice to finally tie the score going into the ninth. The story of the game however, can be found in the last column of the box score under the heading "E", Williams, who prior to this game had been relatively flawless in the field, committed seven errors, making things rather difficult for the gutsy Maier. The core of the infield, shortstop Scott Harrington with three, and McEniry with two, accounted for five of the errors.

Amherst opened the scoring in the top of the first when Scott Harrington made a poor throw to first on the back end of a sure double play allowing Bob Sternberg to score from third. Williams came right back, scoring three in the top of the third when Rick Walter lined a bases loaded single to right knocking in two runs. A third run scored as rightfielder Sternberg mishandled the ball. Walter was thrown out trying to take third on the play at home. Williams led 3-1.

Maier was pitching strongly, giving up only one more hit until the sixth inning. Mark DeWaele led off the inning with a line shot to center field. John Friborg came running in trying to make a shoestring catch, but the ball got past him and DeWaele ended up on third with a triple. Two base hits and two throwing errors later, Amherst had three more runs and was ahead 4-3. Maier then took things in to his own hands and retired the next three hitters, striking out one and getting the other two to fly out.

Williams tied the score in the top of the eighth. Rick Walter led off with an infield hit in the shortstop hole. He went to second on a line smash by Tom Redden that pitcher Swiacki was able to knock down and throw Redden out at first. Walter advanced to third on a wild pitch and scored as third baseman Rich Thompson booted Bob LaBombard's grounder.

Then came the bottom of the ninth. Maier got leadoff hitter Dave Jauss to fly to left. Bob Sternberg received Maier's first base on balls of the day but was thrown out stealing, shortstop Harrington taking a fine throw from catcher Redden and slapping the tag on a sliding Sternberg. Maier then walked the next hitter, Frank Forgione. A perfectly executed hit and run play put Amherst runners on first and third. Coach Briggs then elected to intentionally walk Jerry Seppa, loading the bases. That set the stage for the agonizing finish.

The loss puts Williams' record at 6-2 overall and 1-1 in the Little Three. It was a game Williams should have won, but they have to forget it and concentrate on tough weekend foes.

Sports shorts:

frisbee

Foregoing the National Tournament to debut for the Williams parents, the Eph's Ultimate Frisbee Organization, UFO, will tackle Brandeis University Saturday at 1:30, on the elementary school field next to Mission Tennis courts.

UFO comes off a strong showing last weekend at Hampshire in which the Williams squad combined with Amherst for an unprecedented Eph Jeff win over the hosts.

skiing

Senior Chris Welch and junior Jeff Magoon have been elected co-captains of the 1978 Williams ski team. Welsh who was also this year's alpine captain had an impressive year for the Ephs as he qualified for the NCAA Division I Championship in Giant Slalom and was the team's second leading point scorer in the Giant Slalom.

Magoon, a member of the carnival cross-country team as a freshman and sophomore, was the team's leading point getter in cross country this season as he skied to top ten finishes in the Dartmouth and Williams carnivals this past winter. He also competed in the National Championship in January.

sailing

The Williams Freshman sailing duo of George Wilbanks and Anne Flocken will travel to Yale this weekend to compete in the 37th Annual Intercollegiate Sailing Association North Eastern Freshman Championship. Wilbanks and Flocken, veterans of several difficult Regattas this season will represent the A division for the Ephs.

lacrosse

The defending New England champs from Middlebury may not get much sleep this week: they heard yesterday about Williams taking Dartmouth down to the wire, 12-11, on Wednesday. The Panthers, losers to the Big Green in a 20-10 wipeout earlier in the season, take a chance on a swim through the Cole Field Flood Plain this Wednesday at 4:00 p.m. in what should be a topflight tiff.

The Ephs returned from a 4-0 deficit to lead the Green 12-11 late in the final period, but then gave up two tallies including an extra man goal. Four, last ditch scoring thrusts failed, among them a Jamie Taylor pipe shot and a Gus Nuzzolese isolation drive.

Trinity outlasts Ephmen on courts

Tuesday's tennis marathon involving Williams and Trinity has an equivalent in pro-wrestling known as the Battle Royale; stick some bodies in a cage and wait as long as it takes for one to emerge. The so called "gentleman's game" produced remarkably similar circumstances as the two combatants waged a hotly contested battle in the tight quarters of Trinity's gym that lasted thru 6 (that's not a misprint) consecutive hours of play, 5 tie-breakers (two of which were in the final set of three set matches), and 4 three set matches before the Bantams stumbled away with a 6-3 win.

The loss came as a disappointment to Coach Dave Johnson and his squad for it momentarily stalls their second-half of the season comeback after a slow start. However, under the unfamiliar conditions of tight playing quarters, a slick "Tartan" playing surface and marginal lobbying room the Eph performance was admirable at the very least.

The singles matches, which were split 3-3, were for the most part as tight as Elvis ever wore his pants. Martin Goldberg pushed his fine winning streak to four with a solid three set win and no. 2 Jim Parsons put together a strong third set to secure Williams' second point. But Perry Nelson was distracted by the fast surface for a two set loss at no. 3, while Evan Bash also fell in a close two setter. Tad Roach and Bill Whelan each experienced third set tie-breakers, Roach overcoming cramps to take his 5-3, and Whelan hanging on to the end before succumbing 5-3.

By the time the doubles were played the away from home disadvantage and mental fatigue caused by concentrating under the conditions had taken as much of a toll on the Ephs as all the Trinity forehands. The no. 1 team of Goldberg and Whelan came apart at the seams in the second after losing a first set breaker, while the second team of Dean Gianakos and Nelson dropped a see-saw match. Parsons and Peter Friesen lost although they held serve all but twice.

Runners participate in Boston's grueling marathon

by Frank Carr

It is not often that 1,000,000 people view a one-day sporting event in which 3,400 athletes participate. It is not often that an event as big as this starts on a street as small as Hayden Row in Hopkinton, Massachusetts. Not often, just once a year on the third Monday in April or Patriots Day as it is called in Massachusetts. The day, the event and the spirit combine to form a spectacle known as the Boston Marathon.

The 1977 version of the 26.2 mile classic contained a record number of starters including nineteen "decendants" of Colonel Ephraim Williams. It was a rather warm day for a marathon (75 degrees at the start) but 17 of the Ephs did manage to finish. In fact, among the 2900 finishers, one out of every 170.6 was either an Alum, coach or student from Williams.

Peter Farwell '73, the founder of the Williams Road Runners Club, was the first purple-shirted athlete to reach the Prudential Center finish line and was recorded at 2 hours 29 minutes and 56 seconds for 58th place. Mark Sisson '75 ran an excellent race and also cracked the top 100 with a 2:32 clocking for 82nd place.

After traveling in from Cincinatti, Ohio, Bob Clifford '76 tacked on another 26 miles to his journey and arrived in Boston at 2:38 p.m. On the trip in from Ohio, Clifford picked up the 12 noon connection in Hopkinton and got off at the Pru in the 171st slot. Senior Tim Pritchard and sophomore Steve Polasky both tackled Boston for the second time and ran through the cheering lines of spectators for clockings of 2:48 and 2:51 respectively. Scott Lutrey '75 just made it under the 3 hour qualifying barrier with a time of 2:59, and classmate Paul Skudder followed Lutrey with a 3:10 performance.

In the Women's division, Michelle Cutsforth ran a superb race in finishing 21st at 3 hours 9 minutes. Cutsforth chopped ten minutes off her '76 clocking and finished four places higher than a year ago. Mary Hakala challenged Boston for the first time and came away with 44th place in a swift 3:22. Gina Campoli was the third female entrant from Williams but dropped out with stomach problems after 22 miles.

Six additional Boston rookies trotted through the various suburban towns and by 4:00 p.m. all six had safely reached the steps of the Prudential Center. Freshman Peter Winn and senior Chris Flavin were both clocked in 3 hrs. 12 min. and were followed by Ed Bacher and Rusty Anderson at 3:23 and 3:30 respectively. Dan Riley followed with a 3:36 performance. After watching the race for most of his life, Williams track coach Dick Farley made an attempt to conquer the distance and did so with a time of 3 hours 56 minutes.

Topping off the Williams delegation were Mike McGarr '75, who was unable to finish and alumnus Tom Gates who ran 3:20.

Response to faculty tenure probe is poor

Response to the Student Standing Committee's faculty tenure questionnaires this year has been weak, said committee chairman Hervey McIver, though he noted that all questionnaires have not been collated. However, he still claimed that response this year "will be a help" in providing student input to the faculty tenuring process.

After the committee collects the questionnaires, McIver said, they will do "nothing more this year." The College Council will select new students for next year's six-member committee soon, and next fall the new group will compile written summaries of the questionnaires for the 10 to 15 teachers up for tenure, he said. The summaries will be given to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) to give added weight to student opinions on faculty in the tenuring process, according to McIver.

He commented that this year's response will be valuable as the beginning of an ongoing process. The questionnaire will be repeated annually and the results collected in a continuing file of student evaluations. When a faculty comes up for tenure, the file would be summarized and the summary given to the CAP.

"We just want to provide a means for students to express their views to the CAP on faculty that come up for tenure," McIver said. He said he expects that next year's committee will repeat the questionnaire process to provide the progressively larger files on junior faculty. While recognizing that the committee's present work load is heavy, McIver said the committee may expand its functions next year.

Committee names Moore to design gym, art units

by Lisa Hartigan

Charles W. Moore of the firms of Moore, Graver, and Harper was selected last week to be the architect for both the new athletic facilities adjacent to Lasell gymnasium and the addition to Lawrence Hall. Moore was chosen by both the athletic and the art Building Committees from a group of nine competitors.

Since the new structures are to be so closely situated, the committees felt it practical from economic and aesthetic standpoints to hire the same architect for both projects, according to Whitney S. Stoddard, Chairman of the Art Department. Both committees independently came out in favor of Moore anyway, Stoddard added.

Working out of Essex, Conn., Moore is internationally known and has won various awards for his work in this country. The representatives from Williams toured his low-cost housing in New Haven and Middletown, Conn., housing for the elderly in New Haven, and an armory partially heated by solar energy in Norwich, Conn.

It is Moore's "commitment to the careful research of the nature of the problem, his willingness to listen to our needs, and his extraordinary imagination" that make him particularly suited to the project, Stoddard said.

The first of a series of consultation sessions with Moore is to be held next week and he will meet with the joint Art and Athletic Committees on May 13. The firm has already picked up all available plans and elevations of the site, which, according to Winthrop M. Wassenar, Assistant Director of the Physical Plant, may present some difficulties due to its clay and rock topographical composition. Wassenar will act as the college representative in dealing with the firm and will eventually oversee construction procedures.

Several prelimary solutions should be available early next fall from which a final plan will be formed pending input from involved students and faculty. The gymnasium facility is to include a new basketball court and swimming pool and there is a possibility that the heating will be partially supplied by solar energy. Moore and some of his associates will be in Williamstown during June and July working on the project.

Students here will be given a chance to participate in the design process through Art 413, Architectural Design, a course for which Moore served as outside critic in the late forties. "The designing of his building will be an educational experience involving give and take between the firm and the people the project affects," explained Stoddard.

CEP notes grade differentials

The Committee on Educational Policy has prepared a report on grading differentials between divisions, courses and sections.

The report noted "significant, and sometimes striking, differences among divisions, departments, and individual instructors within departments. In multi-section courses, the average grades for individual sections sometimes varied widely."

The grading sub-committee of the CEP cautioned against jumping to unwarranted conclusions. Many differences, including the level of difficulty, the amount of assigned work, student motivation and the instructor's grading policy all affect grades. Even such factors as the class hour and room might change students' performances.

Although the committee "sees no virtue in uniformity or homogeneity in grading" it wishes to provoke intra-departmental discussion to help determine what policies affect grades.

Only department and program chairmen received the report.

To illustrate its point the committee picked two course packages that a freshman "might reasonably have taken last fall."

Student A	Student B
English 101	English 101
German 101	Hist. Ideas 101
Music 101	Math 107
Psychology 101	Chemistry 101

If two students earned the average (mean) grades in each course, Student A would have a GPA of 8.70, and Student B would have a 7.25, a difference of 33 percentiles of class rank.

The report includes a second example in which two freshmen take the same four courses, but one ends up in the highest grades section, and the other in the lowest. For Art 101, English 101, Math 107 and Political Science 101 the high average is 8.54 and the lower, 6.67, approximately a 38 percentile difference.

It is of course, the report continues, "extremely unlikely that a student would be in the highest (or lowest) graded sections of all his courses" every year while at Williams. The differences probably cancel each other over four years, but "it is disturbing" that a grade might be affected by factors beyond the student's control.

MCAT's test pre-med brains, endurance, sanity

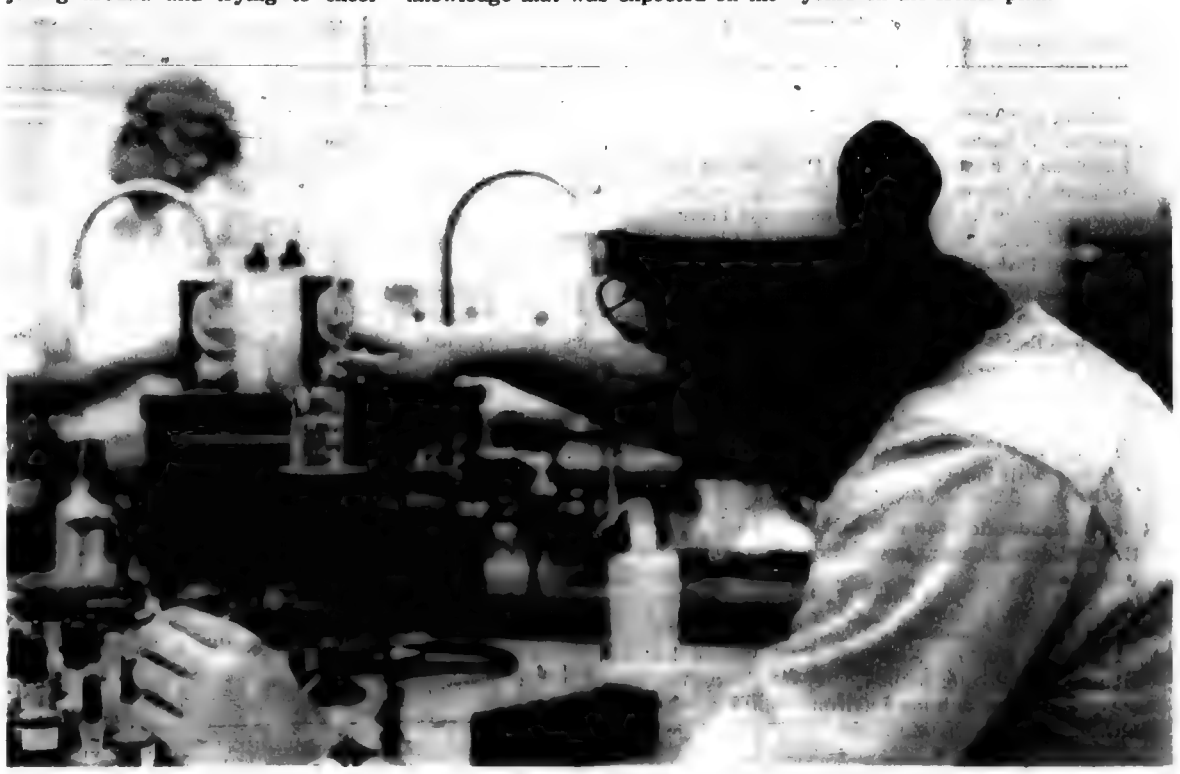
by Peter Rintels and Kerin Walker

"I felt like a decapitated laboratory guinea pig," said junior Jim Cohen after emerging from a grueling eight hours of taking the Medical College Admissions Test (MCAT's) last Saturday. The test is a major milepost in the pre-meds' four year trek to medical school. Results should be back in about a month, and will be used to supplement medical applications that junior pre-meds will spend most of the summer preparing.

About eighty Williams students took the new eight-hour edition of the Medical College Admission Test. The 1977 M-CAT included four basic parts, which accounted for six and a third hours of actual testing. The 135 minute section dealing with science knowledge consisted of basic problems in physics, biology and chemistry, followed by a section on more abstract science problems involving all three disciplines. Reading Skills included questions on science-oriented passages and the last part, Quantitative Skills, tested the student's ability to interpret charts, tables and graphs.

Last year's M-CAT involved three and a half hours of actual testing in five areas. The verbal section tested vocabulary, and the science, math and general information portions of the test were followed by another section of experimental science questions.

Jeffrey Boscamp, '77, indicated that the new test appears to be an effort to weight science knowledge more heavily than previous tests. Boscamp, an economics major, has been studying the medical profession and, at one point, influx of medical school applicants and the number of positions available to them. "There were 42,624 applicants to med school in 1974-1975," Boscamp said, "and 15,066 positions in the colleges. That's 35 per cent of the total number of applicants. My guess is that the new test is designed to discriminate more clearly in terms of science aptitude," among those who apply. A lot of questions on the test dealt with topics not covered in the courses and the Keller plan was not an effective way of making students master the concepts that were covered, they said. "Not one person I know thought he did well on the physics," said Joe Cerbone '78, a pre-med who took Saturday's test.



Most medical schools require two semesters of introductory biology, physics and English in addition to four semesters of chemistry for admission. A science major is not required, but upper level division III courses are definitely helpful in preparing for the test. "The more science courses you take, the better off you are," said Cerbone.

But more than one's science knowledge, it was one's endurance that the eight hour exam tested. By the afternoon, fatigue overtook a lot of students. Patty Lerwick described her experience. "I know I wasn't thinking as clearly in the afternoon as I was in the morning. I know that there are a number of questions on the quantitative part (given last) that I would have answered differently if I hadn't been so tired and thinking more clearly." Emerging after five p.m., she said she was "kind of a basket case."

The test, though high pressured, apparently caused no breakdowns. According to Hal Kramer, '78, "We all kept our sense of humor throughout. During the ten minute breaks we were joking around and trying to cheer each other up. No one really cracked up." Afterwards, however, business at pubs and liquor stores picked up considerably.

Students taking the test generally felt that Williams had prepared them well for it, especially in chemistry. Introductory biology courses apparently left some gaps in the knowledge that was expected on the test, but these could be filled by taking certain upper level courses, especially Physiology (Biology 202), Embryology (Biology 302), and Genetics (Biology 203).

By contrast, students criticized Physics introductory-pre-med physics (Physics 131-132), taught in recent years on the Keller plan.

Bob Pollini '80 still has the infamous M-Cat ordeal ahead of him assuming he choses the pre-med route.

Omission cited

To the editor:

I understand that space limitations and unyielding deadlines often force you and your printer to make quick editing decisions; such was the case with my review in the RECORD of "Guys and Dolls" Friday, April 29. The particular paragraph you chose to omit, however, was a crucial one. I was fortunate enough to see the dress rehearsal, and I wrote the following review prior to the tragic vandalism in which Martha Hally's costumes were destroyed and stolen. Oftentimes, when we look back upon things that are lost, they seem more beautiful and desirable than they actually were. I would like the college community to know that this is not the case here.

". . . but, as the chauvinist sitting next to me said, 'Who cares about concentration when they (the Dolls) can look like THAT?!'

'THAT' is due for the most part to the costume coup pulled off by designer Martha Hally, who orchestrated a collection of creations such as we haven't seen since the legendary "Anything Goes." Miss Adelaide's wardrobe alone is worth the price of admission. Hally's designs cleverly capture the period as well as Bucky's stylized motif . . ."

Thank you very much,

Sincerely,
Martha Anne Williamson

Ali's logic

To the editor:

Mr. Ben Ali's refutation of your editorial in the April 22 issue of the Record is ludicrous in its misuse of logic and cries out for correction. The statement "If racism is a nasty attitude then the majority of the people in the Williams College Community are nasty people" requires a second hypothesis "and the majority of the people in the Williams College Community are racist" which must be adjoined to the first to make the statement analytic and the conclusion follow naturally. Therefore, if the assumption (of the original statement) is accepted as fact, the conclusion is not "certainly factual" as Mr. Ben Ali states.

Mr. Ben Ali then goes on to claim that questioning the assumption will "refute" the conclusion. This shows a pitiful ignorance of one of the most rudimentary rules of logic. Mathematically, if a hypothesis is false, the conclusion is automatically true. Therefore, proving the assumption untrue merely renders the factuality of the conclusion unknowable.

It is pathetic that one who calls the academic preparation of the Record staff pathetic is unable to himself understand the basic tenets of logic. How about Mr. Ben Ali's consulting the truth table before he next proclaims his logical prowess?

Very truly yours,
The first table by the door Brooks House

Racism - a perspective

by Ahmed Ibn Ben Ali

Racism at Williams College is only a manifestation of a general problem which expresses itself on the national as well as the international scene. In analyzing racism one should bear Malcolm X's words in mind: "the servant sees the Master but the Master sees not the servant." In this context, the nigger sees the existence of the problem, but whitey does not see or pretends not to see it.

First, a look at racism on the local scene. One does not have to cite a thousand examples in order to substantiate the fact that the problem exists. Neither does the discrimination which accompany racism have to be along "neat" lines. The discrimination has no clear, concise and discrete form, it comes in all sizes, shapes and forms and that is the total embodiment of the vicious aspect of racism.

What is also "nasty" about racism is that its instigators and adherents do not see, consciously or unconsciously, the existence, the forms and magnitude of the problem. That the Record did not see the problem and that it continues to reject those aspects of it which it deems unacceptable to it is noteworthy. The blindness of the newspaper coupled with its attempts to cover up or tolerate the issue goes a long way in showing the existence and "nasty" form of the problem—for those who have eyes to see. As Jesus said, "seeing you will not see," and the curse seems to have fallen on the newspaper.

On the local scene one also has to distinguish clearly between the roles of a college or community newspaper and that of a racial or minority newspaper or magazine. A college or community newspaper has a duty to the community at large whereas a self-defined black newspaper unquestionably has a different role, that being a responsbility to a totally black readership. If the community newspaper wants to respond to the needs of a particular segment of the community, it ought to define itself in these terms and dispell any doubts as to its responsibility to the different ethnic groups in the community. As clear as this may seem the "master" will not see.

On the other hand "servants" can and do see. What makes racism vicious for its victims is that the victim does not and cannot draw the line between when an attack is personally or racially directed. For the victim, racism embodies a total way of life with no guidelines to distinguish between night and day. To him it is racist: when an article is titled "But Can They Play", as though referring to some pigs; when his teacher comments "no need to worry" for his 64 per cent on an exam for which the class average is 84 per cent or when the teacher emphatically congratulates him for a 94 per cent as though that achievement was unexpected; when the majority of white students fail to touch the black newspapers and magazines which accept and print articles from the community at large.

He calls it cultural racism when he is told to tone down his stereo while another nearby is blasting pop music. The examples are numerous and albeit subtle they are certainly racist. Not only does the victim see them but he feels them too; his blood boils with rage and vengeance to the point that he could kill. Many a time though, he feels helpless against racism.

The question now comes to play as to whether or not Williams creates these problems. No, certainly not. Williams is only a victim of a deadly cancer which takes its roots from American society and manifests itself on campus. Hence the need to look at racism on the national scene.

Racism abounds beyond question on the national front in cultural, economic and social forms. It affects different sections of the society such as Jews, Italians, and Poles in different forms and at different times. In the special case it exists as capitalism—racism of the poor by the rich. Yet in all its forms and at all times it affects one group in the society the greatest—the blacks. To give one major example; the bulk of whites in America emigrated here after World War I and yet they jumped the queue which niggers have been forming for more than 400 years. Henry Kissinger is one of them—name one such prominent black man. It is self-evident that this problem takes its roots from the American society and it is to this society that one can hope to attack the problem at its core. (The roots of this problem are not in Williams, but in American society.) Change the nature of American society and the racial problems at Williams will most certainly disappear. This is the responsibility of the future leaders of America.

Racism does not however, stop at the American borders. It exhibits itself on the international scene as well. Cultural racism abounds on the international scene with the biased ethnocentric reporting usually found in the Western press. White mercenaries in search of money create terror and havoc for millions in the Third World, but when they are executed as justice demands by the victims of their actions there is an uproar in the white world. The case of the American mercenaries in Angola is there for all who care to see. When the life of one white bigot is endangered in some part of Africa a Western power sends its Foreign Minister to negotiate for his release. The white world seemed ready to go to war for the life of one white man and yet many non-white women and children are 'killed' every day in Southern Africa, the United States, and Europe and the white world stays aloof. They would not stay aloof for a second if the tables were to be turned over the whites in Southern Africa or Australia. Henry Kissinger promised billions of dollars to resettle whites from Southern Africa but British Asians booted out of Uganda were left high and dry. Had the Asians been white, they would no doubt have found easy resettlement in the West. When a white country experiences economic difficulties the white world goes to its aid with billions of dollars, as was the case with Italy and Britain. What happens when some non-white nation gets into a similar problem. It is made to suffer unless it places its people and resources at the disposal of the capitalistic world.

These examples are but a few of the forms which racism assumes on the international scene and thus it is not endemic to American society in particular. As a matter of fact, it has been known to man since creation. It has been known in some societies as tribalism, Anti-Semitism, or by some other name, but it was not a threat to humanity because of its then small dimensions. What gave racism its "great leap forward" was imperialism's big thrust into the Third World. Racism suddenly assumed new and international proportions and it bred well on imperialism's insatiable desires.

The upsurge in racism was not capitalism's only contribution to the cause of racism. High technology, a by-product of capitalism, heightened the deadly nature of racism. The case of the Jews will best illustrate the point. Anti-Semitism and massacres of Jews was a fact of life in Europe but it did not assume a genocidal form until high technology helped Nazi Germany to perfect her war against the Jews. Such is the precise nature of racism today. The world is in a period time when one race has a monopoly over high technology (nuclear power, genetic engineering and the like) with which it can use to cause devastation amongst or the elimination of the other races if it loses its conscience. This is no myth or fantasy, it is a real possibility; Nazi Germany is one such unfortunate example. Hence the need to eliminate racism completely from 20th century society; such is the duty of the future leaders of our time.

Pianist Joseph's debut displays skill

by Valerie Sarantos

Last fall, a brand new Steinway concert grand piano was donated to Williams College, and performed on by an outside visiting artist. Last Tuesday evening in Thompson Chapel at 8:30, Williams music professor Charles Joseph sat down at this same piano for his debut performance, and proceeded to captivate, charm, and thrill all those present with his unswerving confidence and pianistic professionalism.

A very interesting program, the first half of which was devoted to 20th century works, was headed by Arnold Schoenberg's Drei Klavierstucke Opus 11, a hauntingly enigmatic composition. Stroking the keys, Joseph coaxed the smoothest, fullest tone out of the instrument. Despite a minor incident with the pedals, the piece was clear and interesting with some sparkling moments.

The next composition, Cycles (1969) by Paul Cooper, was introduced by Joseph himself, describing it as a "compendium of new techniques". Later he added, "do not be alarmed if I reach inside and pluck a string". Holding up the score, the pianist explained that it was composed in such a fashion that the performer may combine its sections spontaneously. At one point with one hand in the piano and the other on the keyboard, Joseph diligently exhibited the contrast between a muted plucking sound, which is made by placing the hand on a string and playing its corresponding key, and surrounding watery pedalled notes also played on the keyboard.

Aaron Copeland's Piano Variations (1930) were also well-executed, with many instances where Joseph used two fingers on a single key, drawing the fullest possible tone from the instrument.

The highlight and conclusion of the first half was Alberto Ginastera's Suite de Danzas Criollas (1946). A bright, humorous piece, Joseph smiled his way through the driving rhythms and intermittent teasing tonal moments.

The second half of the program was devoted totally to Romantic composer Franz Schubert's Sonata in B-flat Major, Opus posthumous. Truly magical moments were in the quietly intense Andante sostenuto movement, and particularly in the playful concluding Allegro, ma non troppo movement.

Recently the father of twin girls, Joseph dedicated his encore to them. He appropriately played one of Robert Schumann's most famous and charming character pieces, "Dreaming", from his Scenes of Childhood, (1838).

"An Evening of Dance and Video", choreographed and directed by Joy Anne Dewey comes to the Studio Theater of the AMT this Friday evening starting at 8:30 p.m.

The evening will see the premiere of a dance "Quartet" choreographed by Dewey with a taped score composed by Stephen Dankner of the Music department. Dancers will be Jacqueline Wilson, Judith Dayton, Julie Bermant and Meg Herrman. Alison Morgan will also dance a solo which she choreographed to music by Stravinsky.

There will be a showing of another version of "Quartet" choreographed for video and filmed in the Robert Morris sculpture which was exhibited at the Clark Art Institute earlier this year. The video version was also choreographed and directed by Dewey and was filmed by Jon Stoltzberg. The evening will conclude with an informal question and answer period about the works.

Guest conductor Gyula gives symphony dynamic character

by John Libertine

One of the oldest rules in the entertainment field is to end a performance with a big bang. Friday night's Berkshire Symphony concert in Chapin Hall certainly proved the merit of that rule. Under the direction of guest conductor Horvath Gyula, the symphony gave a brilliant and inspired performance.

Starting the program with Lizt's Les Preludes, Gyula exhibited his fine control over the orchestra, never once allowing the music or the orchestra to run away with themselves. In this way, all three—conductor, orchestra, and music—were one integrated and perfect unit. With his broad and expansive gestures, Gyula created the impression that the music came from within him, that the orchestra was a perfect extension of himself. He handled the musical contrasts beautifully, the transitions from harsh to sweet, loud to soft, peaceful to stormy all gracefully and naturally executed, smoothly controlled.

The Hary Janos Suite by Kodaly followed. Here, too the orchestra revealed its integrated and almost regimented character, each set of instruments blending in an easy and natural manner. With a dynamic and lively finish, Gyula brought the first half of the concert to a close.

After intermission, Gyula returned to lead the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, by far the high point of the evening. Gyula kept his tight rein on the orchestra, the music crisp and vibrant. Gyual took full advantage of Beethoven's music, with its enticing and gripping emotional character. He riveted the audience's attention to the piece, leading them to a rousing and exciting finish, ending the concert with a smash and the tumultuous applause of an appreciative audience.

There could be no complaints over such a flawless evening. Gyula and the entire symphony are to be congratulated for a magnificent and inspiring performance.

Dada/Surrealist exhibit at Clark

by Mimi David

Is there a popular association with "group style words" like Abstract Expressionism, Figurative Art, New Realism, Pop Art, Conceptual Art, and Photo-Realism? Are artists David Smith, Jackson Pollock, Andy Warhol, Robert Raushenberg, Jim Dine, Robert Morris, and Christo more familiar? Does the real smile of recognition at "Modern Art" come only upon viewing the pieces of art themselves?

An exhibition of such huge canvases, photograph-like blow-ups, and various constructions make up "The Dada-Surrealist Heritage" which opened today at the Clark Art Institute. Professor Sam Hunter of Princeton University delivered a lecture on the subject.

The idea for the exhibition originated in a graduate seminar in art history taught by Professor Hunter last spring. The exhibit deals with "patterns of change and continuity in the art of the last three decades which reflect in various degrees the influence of Dada and Surrealism." Thirty-six artists are included in the show. All the works have been lent to the exhibition.

Some major works on view are Claus Oldenberg's Soft Paytelephone and Francis Bacon's Two Figures with a Monkey. Representative of Jasper Johns is a canvas dedicated to the word "The," typical of Louise Nevelson is a black construction entitled Rain Forest, and a feature by Tom Wesselman is a huge shaped canvas of a smoker.

Dada and Surrealist films will be screened in conjunction with the exhibit on May 10 and May 31 at 7:30.

The Clark Art Institute will present Gordon Bok, Ed Trickett and Ann Mayo Muir in an evening of their unique folk music at the Institute Friday evening at 8 p.m. The performers will also be available for an informal discussion of their work the next morning at the Institute from 11 a.m. to 12 noon. Admission is $2.00 for students.

My dog Humphrey (alias Mugsy, Son of Yoyo, Barney, Young Dog with Old Face, Moe, Fish) needs a new home. I'm leaving in September for graduate school, and can't take him with me—he'd have to be locked up indoors all day, and he'd be miserable.

Known and loved by everyone at Williams, Humphrey spends his days on campus, coming home at night (and on rainy days) to eat dinner and sleep. He's quiet and good natured, good with kids (and cats), mostly beagle, and about three years old. I want him to be able to stay here in Williamstown, so I'm looking for a new owner who will both love and care for him, yet let him remain "king" of the Williams campus.

The ideal home would be with a Williamstown resident, faculty or staff member; but the only important criterion is that you love him.

If you can help please call me.

TrackJeffs spike Ephs, Cards

by Frank Carr

A Parents' Day crowd watched as the Little Three outdoor track title was removed from its three year respite in the Purple Valley and brought back over the mountains to Amherst. The Lord Jeffs grabbed 11 first places in the Saturday afternoon contest to score 88 points, with the hosting Ephs following at 63 and the Wesleyan Cardinals bringing up the rear with 41. Coach Dick Farley's tracksters were without the services of captain Rich Remmer and top hurdler Ron White and could only manage a trio of individual victories.

Williams jumped out into the lead after the first event with a Larry Tanner first place in the hammer throw. Tanner broke his own two-week-old school record, launching the ball and chain a distance of 170' 10". Freshman Jim DeSimone added a fourth in the event and then followed with a 3rd place, 42'2" performance in the shot put. Bob Duffy kept the Ephmen within a single point of the Jeffs through the next two events, as he notched the runnerup slot in both the discus and the javelin. Duffy was backed up in the javelin by John Dell'Erario whose spear touched down in third place after a 164'4" journey.

The purple fieldmen tallied 14 more points in the jumping events but failed to pick up any individudual wins. Stan Parese and Jim Holmes vaulted to 3rd and 4th behind an Amherst duo, while Greg McAleenan and Greg Collins followed another Jeff with 2nd and 3rd in the long jump. Collins also cleared 5' 10" for the no. 4 spot in the high jump and freshman Jamie Rouse jumped to second in the triple while finishing one place ahead of Collins in the high jump.

The Ephs opened up the running events with a second place performance in the 440 yard relay and then shocked the crowd with a 1-2-3 sweep of the one mile run. Senior Ken Leinbach travelled unchallenged to a 4:23.5 victory and was followed in by Brian Harrison at 4:34.4 and Mark Chaffee with a 4:35.0 clocking. In the 440 yard dash, Terry O'Reilly broke up an Amherst sweep with a 52.3 third place conclusion while Vernon Davis topped the barriers in 15.6 for second in the 120 yd. high hurdles.

Glenn Harris' fourth in the 100 accounted for the only purple point in the short sprints, as the Ephs were shut out in the 220. Harris added two more points, touring the 440 yard hurdle route in 58.0 for third place. In a close half-mile contest, Dave Seeger used a home stretch kick to glide into second at 2:01.9, while Vin Zinicola halted the watches at 2:02.1 for the no. 4 slot.

A trio of three milers capped off the Williams scoring total with an 8 point, 1-3-4 effort. Junior Frank Carr led from start to finish in the event and broke the tape with a 90 yard lead and a new Little Three meet record of 14:49.8. Leinbach returned to the track after his comfortable mile win and cruised into third at 15:24, while freshman Mike Behrman nailed down fourth place with a 15:32 clocking.

Batters drop two to No. Adams

by Frank Pergolizzi

While bright skies returned to Williamstown this weekend, the situation of the Williams baseball team still remains cloudy. They have now lost three games in a row starting with Tuesday's loss to Amherst and ending, hopefully with Thursday's and Friday's losses to North Adams State, 10-1, and 11-8. In both the first and last loss, poor Williams fielding was directly responsible for the loss.

Thursday's game, played at North Adams was a rout from the bottom of the first inning. The North Adams Mohawks scored three runs in the first, one in the second, and three more in the third to take a commanding 7-0 lead. Freshman John Carey, in his first starting role, was belted for all seven runs including two homerun blasts by Dan Carity and Paul Wright. The sole bright spots for Williams were shortstop Rick Walter, who hit two for four with a run batted in and was solid in the field; and relief pitcher Mike Martineau, who was effective in relief, silencing the powerful Mohawk bats.

Friday's game was a much more disappointing defeat. Williams saw a 6-1 lead evaporate into an 8-6 deficit, then came back to tie the game in the bottom of the ninth only to leave the winning run on third base with one out. North Adams scored three in the top of the eleventh to win on the strength of Carity's second homer of the weekend, which sailed over the newly installed fence in left field.

Williams scored five runs in the third on only two hits, but were aided by three North Adams errors. Scott Harrington knocked in two runs for Williams. North Adams scored one in the top of the sixth but Williams matched it in the bottom of the inning with Harrington knocking in his third run. The seventh inning, however, was the turning point of the game. North Adams scored six runs to take the lead on four hits, while Williams committed three errors in the inning.

North Adams scored again in the top of the ninth to lead 8-6. Williams tied the score in the bottom of the ninth as Kreutz recorded his second and third runs batted in of the contest with a line drive double to left field.

The game went into the eleventh with Mike Martineau pitching in relief of starter Tom Albert. Martineau retired the first two batters of the inning but then three batters later Dan Carity fired a three-run-homer to give the Mohawks an 11-8 decision.

Crews race Ivies, cadets

by C. Scott Stevenson and Nick Lefferts

On Sunday, May 1, the Williams varsity lightweight crew journeyed to southern Connecticut to face lightweights from Yale, Dartmouth, and Rutgers on Yale's home course. For the first time in its history, Williams had an entry in an Ivy League boat race. The crew, in a time of 6:26.8, finished a close third to front runners Rutgers (6:20.4) and Dartmouth over the 2000 meter course. Yale finished 5 seconds back of Williams.

Conditions were almost perfect when the crews broke from the starting line. At the start, senior stroke Ramsay Stabler had Williams at 40 strokes per minute, but the other crews were even higher. By the time they had settled into the race, the Ephs found themselves about a length behind the field, as Yale pulled out to an early lead, but faded to the rear by the 1000 meter mark. During the first thousand, Williams hung tough and pulled even with Dartmouth and Rutgers, and a three boat race emerged. Rutgers began an early sprint with 700 meters to go, and left Williams and Dartmouth behind. The New Jersey eight finished a boat length ahead of Dartmouth, while the Williams sprint fell six seats short of catching the Big Green rowers.

Williams' varsity heavyweight and freshman crews met U.Mass and perennial power Coast Guard on Quaboag Pond in Ware, Mass. Saturday. Both Williams crews lost their betting shirts to Coast Guard but the afternoon was not all disappointment as the freshmen turned in an impressive performance over the slightly less than 2000 meter course, coming .6 seconds away from upsetting the powerful Cadets.

The varsity heavyweights met disappointment as they couldn't quite catch the U.Mass. eight at the finish and placed third. The Ephs crossed the line 3.4 seconds behind the Minutemen and 16.5 seconds behind the extremely tough Coast Guard.

Both A and B teams of the Williams Rugby Club defeated their Harvard counterparts. A side won 12-9 with two field goals by Dave Levy and 1 try by Tom Kondel. B side won 11-9; Jamie Barickman had (2) tries. (photo by Doherty)

Purple laxmen split two

by Dennis O'Shea

The final full week of regular season lacrosse play marks the Ephmen's last opportunity to kick the win-some, lose-some habit and assure themselves of a better than .500 season. The Eph ten tangles with two-time defending New England Small College Champion Middlebury Wednesday at 4:00 p.m. on Cole Field, then returns to Cole Saturday at 2:00 p.m. for a Little Three title shoot-out with Amherst.

The laxmen close out the year at Harvard next Wednesday.

The Eph stickers salvaged a split of last week's contests, as they had in each of the previous three weeks, after coming up just a goal short of an upset of Dartmouth in Hanover Wednesday. The Big Green, listed fifth to Williams' eighth in last week's New England poll, finessed their way by the Ephs 12-11 fourth quarter lead and stymied four last minute Purple threats to nab the 13-12 squeaker.

Wesleyan provided last Saturday's 13-10 addition to the win column, but not without damping Eph expectations of an easy afternoon. The Ephmen rolled to a 10-1 bulge, then collapsed amidst a Cardinal offensive rebound and a slew of 20 servable penalties.

Todd Eckerson, far away the Ephs' assist leader and top point man, poured in three goals and three assists, against the Cards but Peter Thomsen, the laxmen's top scorer was on the sidelines nursing a sore shoulder.

Wednesday's contest shapes up as potentially one of the finest of the year. Middlebury's Panthers have been rated tops among the region's college division squads all year long, and dusted Wesleyan, 15-6, early in the season, but fell to Dartmouth, 20-10.

The Ephs' midfield defense was a sore point with mentor Renzie Lamb early in the season, and the Panthers boast a couple of top middie hotshots in Tom Callanan and Roy Heffernan. Reports also indicate that Middlebury has a talented attackman in A. J. Fitzpatrick.

Women's Lacrosse

Linda Wilkins' lacrosse team demolished Wesleyan on Saturday to pick up their third straight win. Wesleyan's zone defense looked helpless against the pinpoint passing of the Ephs as they outshot the Cardinelles 36 to 13. Maggi O'Brien again led the scoring parade as she waltzed past defenders all day and ended up with 7 goals. Capt. Mary Fish plunked in 4 as Val Corning and Dawn Bedrosian added single tallies. First Hone Brent McKinley scored two quick goals, then took over in the nets for goalie Marty Taft who had an ailing stomach. McKinley didn't take long to readjust to the position and came up with 6 saves. The J.V. team put on a home show for the parents as they trounced the Lady Jeffs of Amherst 13-2. Leigh Costikyan got her customary 7 goals; goalie Ingersoll stopped 10 shots.

Golf

The Williams' golfers ended Amherst's two year domination of the Little Three golf championship Saturday, returning the title to its historic home in the Purple Valley. The inspired performance of senior Barney Ireland, medalist with 77, paced the Ephs to an easy 392-418-429 blasting of Amherst and Wesleyan. The balanced scoring followed with Charlie Haines and Ed Bousa at 78, Chris Vogelsang at 79, and co-captain Steve Saunders stumbling to 80.

The junior varsity continued unbeaten, with a decisive victory over Amherst. Prior to this, the JV recorded easy decisions over Dean Junior College and Hotchkiss. Prospects for an outstanding, even unbeaten season from the youngsters seem secure.

ACEC, Lecture and Log

Council selects '77-'78 committees

The College Council approved new members for the 1977-78 All College Entertainment Committee, Lecture and Log Committees Tuesday night, and discussed charges of racism that have recently provoked controversy in the college community.

Representatives unanimously accepted the Elections Committee's nomination of freshman Steve Case as the new ACEC chairman. Elections Committee Chairman Pete Friesen pointed out that Case has experience as an assistant concert promoter and a rock critic, and has established contacts with such popular artists as Aerosmith, Fleetwood Mac, and Peter Frampton. The council also appointed Lew Mills technical director, and John Barker, Jim Parsons, John Svoboda and Mark Tercek the remaining members of the committee.

The discussion that dominated the greater part of Tuesday night's meeting centered largely around the role of the Black Student Union. Some members said that the BSU is a source of division between blacks and whites, including Larry Mitchell, who stated, "the BSU may not tend to promote racism, but it does promote separation." Marcellus Blount countered that the organization "fills a void" for black students who do not enjoy "traditional" college activities. He mentioned specifically all-college "beer blasts" which he claimed "do not fit a black's conception of what a party should be like." Marlies Carruth added that the BSU helps to overcome the "insecurity periods" faced by black freshmen.

Several council members made a distinction between racism and separatism at Williams. Don Toumey pointed out an apparent "lack of socialization" between black and white students. One example of alleged separatism cited was the tendency of many black students to sit at a single large table in Baxter Hall. Brian McDermott pointed out, "As long as we're separated, we're not going to be able to decide anything."

In other activity Tuesday night, treasurer Harry Kelly discussed alternatives for the use of Park Hall, currently the home of the Center for Environmental Studies. The building will open up next year when the Center moves to Kellogg House, presently occupied by Chaplain John A. Eusden. Kelly reported that the College has proposed converting the building into a crafts center, but he claimed that the treasury would not be able to support such a venture. He suggested that the Finance Committee might float a loan to meet the costs of installing crafts equipment in the building and hiring a student monitor to supervise the shop. Another alternative, according to Kelly, would be to expand the Free University program over both semesters and allow it to operate in Park Hall.

Sarah Mersereau reported on a proposal currently on the floor of the Housing Committee to create three co-op houses in the future. Students participating in a co-op program would perform their own cooking and minor maintenance. The committee is currently considering Dewey House and two of the satellite Dodd House buildings for future conversion to the co-op program.

Elected to the Lecture committee were Hugh Calkins, Laurie Robbins, Charlie Sanders and Don Toumey. Serving on the Log Committee will be Chip Buckner, Dan Bruns, Joe Hurley, Ann McCabe, and Nancy Schimmel.

Regulations aid handicapped

The new regulations issued by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare regarding handicapped people will affect the College according to Business Manager Shane Riorden, although the extent and cost of any changes is not yet known.

"No one here has seen a copy of the actual regulations," said Riorden. "I've only gotten watered down media versions."

The regulations, implementing a bill passed two years ago by Congress, require that any educational institution receiving federal funds make all programs accessible to handicapped persons within 60 days of June 1, and submit six months, a plan outlining all necessary physical changes on existing structures to make them accessible to the handicapped. Such changes are to be made within three years, and all new buildings and renovations must allow access to the handicapped.

Last fall, Riorden estimated that the bill would cost the College about two million dollars in physical changes. "Any true cost estimate will have to wait until after a major campus survey, which will probably take place this summer. They will see exactly what sort of changes we need to make."

According to Riorden, the College could accommodate a few handicapped students by rescheduling classes to accessible rooms and counting on help from others for the handicapped student. Large numbers of handicapped students would be more difficult to accommodate, he said. There are presently no handicapped students at Williams who have been unable to manage their situations, said Riorden.

The Department of HEW defines a handicapped person as "any person who has a physical or mental impairment which substantially limits one or more major life activities" and defines a qualified handicapped person as one who "meets the academic or technical standards requisite to admission or participation in the (federal aid) recipient's education program or activity."

"We have to see that a handicapped person has every opportunity that anyone else does," said Riorden. "Here at Williams, problems, if any, can be worked out on a person-to-person basis."

Update on Costume Vandalism

Following the destruction of costumes, Guys and Dolls opened in rehearsal dress Friday. This came as a result of a unanimous vote of the cast to continue with the show. Subsequent performances used costumes rented in New York. Director Jean-Bernard Bucky praised the cast, saying they "rallied extraordinarily well" following the incident. The audience, too, reacted positively. Their response was "very, very fine", he said.

Security Officer Walter O'Brien confirmed that the occurrence was an "intentional burning." Security has questioned one-half of the cast for leads, and will try to reach the remainder in the near future.

Pharaoh-Faucet Major Proposal

Registrar George C. Howard recommended that the Committee on Educational Policy investigate the possibilities of a new major, dealing with ancient Egyptian artifacts and monuments, along with their applications to modern household plumbing. He suggested the Pharaoh-Faucet Major.

CEP Chairman George R. Goethals expressed interest and asked if the committee could examine the major more carefully.

Exum leaves Williams for Northwestern; College looks at ability to hold minorities

Assistant Professor William H. Exum, acting chairman of the Sociology Department and Program Director of Afro-American Studies at Williams, has accepted an offer to teach at Northwestern University in Illinois next year.

Exum will become an Associate Professor of Sociology and Afro-American Studies there next September.

"The offer was too good to turn down," Exum commented. He said that the contract was long term, with various options for both Northwestern and himself.

Exum is the third black teacher in three years to leave Williams before undergoing the tenure process. According to Dean of the Faculty Francis Oakley, the trend can be attributed to the increasing competition among colleges for top flight faculty.

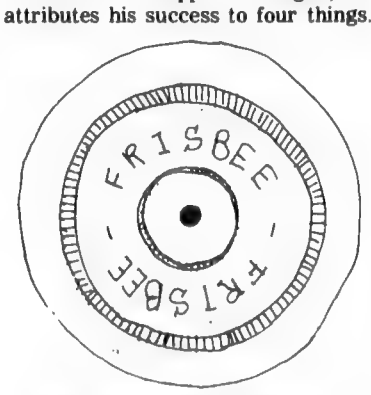
Williams has a "firm and real commitment" to building up the number of minority professors at this institution, Oakley said. "Williams has appointed strong individuals recently who are heavily competed for," he continued. "We are moderately successful in recruiting minority faculty members. The competition is strong nationwide."

"Our recent losses reflect the strength of our appointments and the teachers involved," Oakley said.

Oakley went on to state that although there is an "active attempt to recruit minority talent," there is definitely no compromising Williams' standards of education. However, the fact that Williams is situated in an overwhelmingly white community does have some effect on the College's success. "In this sense, Williams is in a poorer comparative position to compete with other schools." However, this is the only major area in which Williams suffers, according to Oakley.

Oakley went on to point out that the rate at which minority students are entering careers in academics is increasing, but not at the same speed as that at which such students enter other professions. Apparently, this serves to increase competition among schools for minority appointments.

Pool empties



The Muir swimming pool in Lasell Gymnasium will be drained Friday, May 13 for maintenance. The Physical Education Department warns anyone intending to dive in the pool after hours that the pool will be empty Friday.

Evolution of the frisbee: the dynamic disc

by Michael Golden

Although its use in panning for gold in California declined after the mid 1800's, the frisbee became popular. Ingrid Bergman wore a cloth frisbee for a hat in Casablanca, the Phantom of the Opera wore a frisbee as a mask, and Quasimodo's hump was a frisbee in The Hunchback of Notre Dame.

The most acclaim, of course, has come to frisbees in the area of amusement and sport. In 1968, Whammo came out with a plastic frisbee, making the pie tins of yesteryear obsolete. It so happened that there, on the scene in southern California, was our own Jay Shelton, Assistant Professor of Physics. When he purchased his first frisbee, he became a member of the International Frisbee Association and also received notification of the first frisbee competition to be held in the Rose Bowl in the summer of 1968. He and his partner, Steve Sewall, son of English Professor Richard Sewall of Yale, placed first and second at that competition. Champion for three consecutive years at a national tournament in upper Michigan, he attributes his success to four things.

"I was an earlybird in the field, was a pretty good athlete, took the whole thing seriously, and worked and practiced very hard," Shelton said.

Although each frisbee contest is different, most of them have a number of similar events. There are events for distance, accuracy, style, golf, M.T.A., T.R.C., ultimate frisbee, and guts. While the first three are self-explanatory, golf is like traditional golf using a frisbee. M.T.A. stands for maximum time aloft and is similar to a boomerang shot. The throw is made into a headwind, the frisbee must be caught by it, and the winner is the one whose throw stays in the air the longest. T.R.C. is throw-run-catch, and it is similar to M.T.A. but instead of maximum time in the air, the object is maximum distance, still with the stipulation that each contestant catches his own throw.

Ultimate frisbee is a field game which is similar to soccer or lacrosse in that it is continuously moving. The difficulty lies in the fact that it is illegal to run with the frisbee. Finally, guts frisbee puts two five-man teams fifteen yards apart and has them throw the frisbee as hard as possible in order to make the other team miss it. It must be a catchable throw and must be caught with one hand in free air. Shelton said, "Boy, those things are tough to catch."

The latest development in the history of the frisbee is the commencement of a frisbee club here at Williams. Led by Byrne Kelly, a senior, the frisbee enthusiasts conscientiously practice the field game of ultimate frisbee. In addition, anyone who walks anywhere on campus is almost bound to be hit, or nearly missed, by a flying round instrument, sainted by enduring everything.

No one knows what the future has in store for frisbees. Although their function today is a far cry from their original purpose, they are still an integral part of society. Perhaps in a few years, people will be riding frisbees to the moon, or using them strategically to fight the Backfire bomber. Whatever develops in the future, one thing cannot be denied: frisbees are ubiquitous.

Honor. A Word.

The Honor Committee will soon be voting on whether or not to endorse three proposals designed to clarify and increase student awareness of the College honor code. The proposals are that:

1. Students be required to sign an honor pledge at the beginning of each college year.
2. Instructors be asked to distribute specific guidelines concerning academic honesty for each course.
3. A statement of honor code regulations accompany every graded exercise and students be required to sign an honor pledge on each exercise.

Currently, students are asked (though not required) to sign a statement before the beginning of freshman year which says that they have read and will abide by the honor code.

We believe that the second proposal is crucial, while the first is marginally beneficial and the third is redundant and insulting.

We suggest that there are two types of honor code violations at this college—unintentional and intentional. Increasing student awareness of honor code regulations and making take-home test and paper guidelines explicit for each course could probably insure that unintentional violations do not occur. On the other hand, no amount of honor pledges, guidelines or other paperwork is likely to deter the intentional cheating which occurs.

Having students sign an honor pledge each year could, we think, serve to significantly increase student awareness of the fact that an honor code does exist without imposing severe paperwork costs. Some students probably sign the honor pledge hastily before coming to Williams and have forgotten what they signed after several years at the College. A once-a-year reminder probably couldn't hurt.

The need for explicit guidelines is essential to the workings of any honor system. Currently, some instructors encourage group discussion on take-home exams and papers, others forbid it and still others don't mention the subject. Such a communication problem appears to have been at least partially to blame for the recent charges of honor code violations concerning a Chemistry 302 take-home exam. Instructors have a responsibility to inform students at some point what the guidelines are for written exercises in their course.

Printing honor code regulations on and having students sign an honor pledge on all graded exercises is both insulting to students and an unwanted addition to the already considerable bureaucratic paperwork at the College. What is the point of signing a statement at the beginning of each year if one must also sign every graded exercise? It seems to us that proposals 1 and 2 can do quite an adequate job of reminding students about the honor code. Proposal 3 is just honor code overkill and implies that someone doesn't believe the statement that a student signed at the beginning of the year. We can do without an honor code based on a lack of trust and a paternalistic attitude toward students.

Weekend Update

Good evening! Feature bout of tomorrow's sports smorgasbord has to be the varsity baseball team's doubleheader date with Amherst on Weston Field starting at 1:00. As usual, the Jeffs are enjoying another banner year on the diamond despite the fact that they lost their top pitcher, Don Judd, two weeks ago due to bursitis in his shoulder.

Currently ranked ninth in the New England Division III polls, Amherst brings an eight game win streak and an 11-3 record, to Williamstown. Much of their success is due to Bill Swiacki, a starter on the football and basketball teams, the top pitcher and one of the leading hitters for the baseball team.

Swiacki hurtled a 4-0 whitewash of AIC on Tuesday and will probably pitch the first game tomorrow. Williams needs at least a split in order to stay in serious contention for a piece of the Little Three crown.

An up and down Amherst lacrosse team also comes to town tomorrow hoping to repeat the scare they gave Renzi Lamb's laxmen last spring. The Jeffs already own a 9-8 win over Wesleyan and lost to Middlebury by a close 14-10 score.

Sharing the Spring Weekend spotlight with the Williams-Amherst contests is the women's lacrosse team, which hosts the New England College Lacrosse Tournament Saturday and Sunday at Cole Field.

Things are in a state of limbo at Union College, where the meeting of the trustees three weekends ago did little to resolve the debate over whether or not to leave NESCAC and enter Division I.

Faced with a 2-1 vote by the 23 member All-College Senate, comprised of faculty and students, not to withdraw from the conference following lengthy consideration of the findings of a 79-page Task Force Report on Athletics and also faced with support for a Division I move by Union President Thomas N. Bonner, the officers of the board of trustees, the Union Alumni Council, and the athletic department coaches, the trustees simply tabled a motion to take Union out of the conference until further study is made of the matter.

On the same afternoon that the trustees announced their decision to postpone final action on the Division I question, however, they also announced that Bonner had subsequently offered his resignation and that they had rejected it. Bonner then announced that he would continue at least temporarily until the matter is finally decided.

A week before the trustees meeting Bonner had labelled a charge from a faculty member of the Union admissions committee stating that Bonner applied pressure on the committee to accept certain hockey players with inferior board scores as nothing but "baloney".

A graduate of Middlebury (whose president cancelled all future hockey games with Union this past season because "Union has chosen to re-enter college hockey with a style and aggressiveness which we find unacceptable"), Bonner has also been quoted as saying that Ned Harkness was hired first and foremost to run Achilles Rink, not build a hockey program.

"We hired Ned Harkness to run our skating rink. We were looking for a man who could make it work. Get it going. The hockey success came as a surprise. A kind of a side benefit, you might say."

Williams Athletic Director Robert Peck has withdrawn his name from consideration for the position of Athletic Director at Harvard. Peck was named the search committee's first choice for the post after over 200 candidates had been evaluated, but then withdrew before he was formally offered the position when a good deal of politicking by branches of the Harvard administration took the decision out of the hands of the search committee and transferred it to other departments intent on appointing their own candidate. Peck, who is on the first year of a five year contract, said his chances of leaving Williams were less than 50 per cent throughout the process, and stated that he simply wanted to explore the Harvard option and see what developed.

In related affairs, Middlebury appointed head basketball coach Thomas Lawson as its new Athletic Director succeeding the retiring Dick Colman.

And Amherst also got into the act, naming Peter J. Gooding as its new Athletic Director and Bill Hixon as its new basketball coach. Gooding succeeds Ben McCabe while Hixon follows the legendary Rick Wilson.

Ralph Renzi reports that Robert G. L. Waite's new book on Hitler is selling like hotcakes. Renzi said that he's already sold 42 books at $13.50 a shot, with over half of the purchases coming from students. The most interesting review of the book may shape up to be Alan Bullock's piece for the New York Review of Books. Waite calls Bullock's earlier biography of Hitler "superb" but also states that he disagrees "completely" with Bullock's contention that Hitler's personal life sheds little if any light on his place in history.

Director of Financial Aid Henry Flynt said recently that Williams is investigating a novel financial aid program developed by Harvard.

Described in an article in Sunday's New York Times, the program is aimed specifically at families with incomes of $15,000 to $60,000. Under the terms of these "parent loan programs", colleges will allow parents to pay their children's term bills in monthly installments spread over six to eight years. Interest rates vary from 8 to 8¾ per cent.

Financing for the programs will come from endowment or general operating funds of the colleges themselves and will hopefully become self-sustaining. Harvard has already put the program into practice, while Amherst, Yale, Cornell, and Stanford plan programs next year.

Letters: responses to racism disagreement

To the editor:

Mr. Ben Ali and I disagree on so many specific issues that any attempt to refute point by point his statement in the May 3 issue of the Record would be much too long to print. Moreover, to begin disputing particulars would very quickly lead us all to lose sight of the essence of the problem being discussed.

That essence, in the case of Mr. Ben Ali's article, is his charge that various groups and institutions are racist. Here is the principal clash; this is the crucial overview on which we disagree. I am not convinced that white mercenaries, Western journalism, high technology, American society, or even capitalism are responsible for racism. His arguments, and those in other recent diatribes on racism, do not move me. This is not because I do not see, or pretend not to see. I do recognize and acknowledge the extensive problem of racism—but the evidence which compels me to do so is the evidence that I find in myself, my own fears and prejudices. Racism is not rooted in any particular group or institution, but in individuals. When I look for racism at Williams College, I have to look not at the Record or the Nu Awakening, but rather into my own heart—and I think that Mr. Ben Ali will concede that he, and everyone else here, must do the same. Each individual one of us is a source of this disease, no matter how much we would like to shift the responsibility to some abstract "them" like "American society."

Individuals produce racism. Therefore, racism can only be fought meaningfully by individuals at its source. This is nothing which we can afford to leave for "the future leaders of America" to solve; each of us has a responsibility to examine and try to understand and control the unreasoning hatreds which lurk in the depths of our own hearts.

To a certain extent, members of the majority have an added responsibility in that they often have more opportunity to translate their prejudices into action. However, as a member of that majority I also have the right to question the reasons for existence of a Black Student Union or a "self-defined black newspaper." We tend to accept these things because our "liberal" ideology dwells on the past guilt of the majority. But I, for one, refuse to accept responsibility for the "sins of the fathers;" I am responsible for my feelings and my actions, here and now, and I think that I have the right to demand that others exercise the same kind of responsibility. Racism, though it may have been "known to men since creation," is a problem of the present, so let's deal with it in terms of the present. That should be challenge enough.

Indeed, it may seem too much of a challenge. To give up the illusion that racism can be removed by defeating some "enemy" or by implementing some clever program, to recognize that the fight against prejudice and hatred has to be waged on four billion separate battlefields every day, means that hopes for an easy solution must be abandoned. In fact, there may never be a final victory—but I for one am too damn proud to concede that. I consider myself to be stronger than my prejudices and I have the same faith in other people. We may all be racists, but the bonds which join us as men are stronger—the source may be ourselves, but so is the answer.

distortion

To the editor:

Ben Ali's Viewpoint of May 3 is certainly a perspective. It is a perverted and distorted one, ignorant of the situation, and one that aggravates the problem. Let us make some attempt to separate hateful dogma from fact: "capitalism—racism of the poor by the rich." Regardless of the author's moral view of capitalism, it is not racism. The poor are not a race: this scourge transcends all boundaries of race, afflicting men of all colors. This is a beautiful illustration of what makes racism so hard to combat: in some instances, rhetorical ideology confuses the real evil, distorting men's thoughts and destroying their power to understand and ultimately appreciate their fellow men.

logic part II

To the editor:

First table Brooks dining hall is highly embarrassed and very anxious to apologize for a misquotation of that rudimentary rule of logic it claimed that Mr. Ali had ignored. We had meant to say that if the hypothesis is false the "statement" (rather than "conclusion") p implies q is necessarily true. With this correction, our rebuke of Mr. Ali stands. Our thanks go out to Hank Korth and fans of rigor everywhere.

Very truly yours.

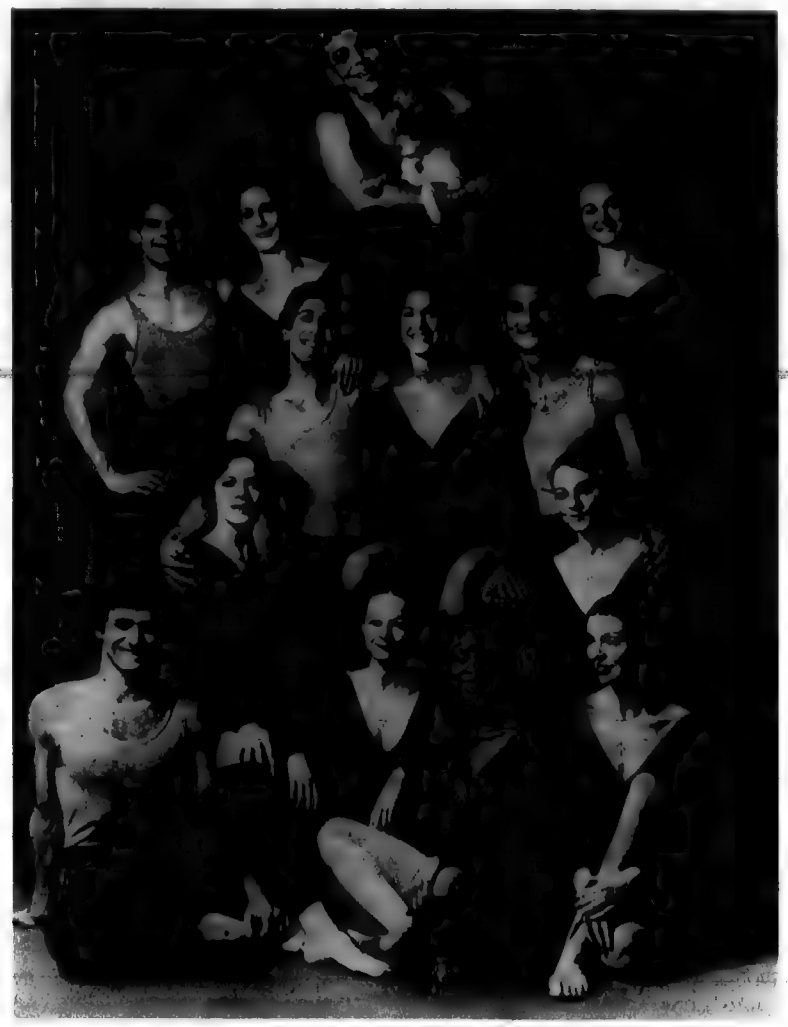
'Dominant force in dance'

Taylor residency starts Friday



The Williams College Dance Society will conclude its series of dance residencies on May 13-15 with the Paul Taylor Dance Company. The company was organized in 1955, was recognized as one of the world's foremost in 1973 and has continued to grow in achievement and stature. It has danced in over two hundred cities in the United States for countless college, university and civic groups and has completed twenty-two foreign tours. Also included in its achievements, has been major television exposure.

Paul Taylor has been a dominant force in dance for over two decades. He began his dance career in New York after studying painting at Syracuse University. Among his teachers were Margaret Craske, Martha Graham, and Anthony Tudor. From 1955 to 1962 he was a soloist with the Martha Graham Dance Company and in 1959 he was a guest artist for the New York City Ballet Company. In 1965, he was named "Dancer of the Year" by London's Dance and Dancers Magazine, was elected to knighthood by the French government in 1969, received the Festival of Nations' International Award for choreography, and has twice been a recipient of the Guggenheim Fellowship for Choreography. In 1967, he was honored by the Capezio Dance Award and has, through the years, received many grants from the National Endowment for the Arts and New York State Council for the Arts.

Since the formation of his company, Paul Taylor has choreographed over seventy dances. Edwin Denby has said, "What he has been doing since 1969 is new in the sense that such dance movement had not existed before in the modern dance; the technical as well as creative discovery is his." His superb dancers are quick and light, extremely agile, and capable of the enormous range he demands of them. Some of the works to be performed here are "Polaris", "Esplanade", "Runes", and "Cloven Kingdom". Clive Barnes describes "Polaris" as an experiment in focus and texture. The ballet is composed in two parts in which the second half is an exact repeat of the first—only the cast, music, and lighting have been changed. "It is a curious effect," says Barnes, "because given this changing context, the very same dances take on quite different shades of kinetic significance."

In the three works, "Polaris", "Esplanade", and "Cloven Kingdom", Clive Barnes notes Taylor's, "fluency and ability to engage dancers in a special moment of sensibility," and he suggests that it is, "perhaps the particular effect of Mr. Taylor's choreography that it exudes a sense of humor and humanity. It has also an element of seriousness that adds up to one of the most individual and important statements in American Dance." Robert Kimball of the New York Post explains that the title of Taylor's work called "Runes" has to do with hieroglyphics and secret messages used to cast a spell. He describes it as follows, "Under a full moon rising slowly over the darkly lit stage, Taylor's dancers enact primeval, spooky, rituals ... its music subtly shifts mood from mystical to sinister to rhapsodic." In this piece, Clive Barnes feels Taylor uses an unusual way of combining dance with drama. He explains that, "an evening with Paul Taylor is an intensely theatrical experience ... Taylor's dancers are always people."

The residency program begins Friday, May 13 at 3:30 p.m. with a master class at the Lasell Gymnasium and at 8:30 p.m. with a lecture demonstration at the Adams Memorial Theater, AMT, both free for students. On Saturday, May 14, Performance I will be given at 8:30 p.m. at the AMT and Performance II will similarly follow the next night, $2.00 for students. The program for Performance I includes "Public Domain", "Polaris", and "Esplanade" while Performance II includes "Images" (World Premiere), "Three Epitaphs", "Runes", and "Cloven Kingdom".

The Paul Taylor Dance Company, recognized as one of the world's foremost performing groups, will be in residence at the College from May 13-15.

Future role of the ACEC

by Steve Case

The ACEC may be the most controversial organization at Williams. In the past, students have consistently expressed discontent with the quality of groups booked, and the College Council has complained of misallocation of funds. In my opinion, the new ACEC structure, adopted by the council last week, will render these complaints obsolete.

The major problem the ACEC has encountered each year is a misinformed student body. The intent of this article, then, is to set the record straight and allow next year's ACEC to start out on the right foot.

Let's start with the facts: ACEC funds have been cut $5000 since 1973, yet talent costs have doubled. Suffice to say, this means the ACEC can't book the type of groups it used to. This year the ACEC was budgeted $15,000. Although that seems like a lot of money, its peanuts in terms of the music business. The group Boston, for example, grossed $140,000 in a recent appearance. Obviously, Williams can't afford groups of this magnitude. It sounds simple, but for some reasons students fail to realize it. Every year, students say that the ACEC used to promote well-known groups, and go on to attack the committee for not maintaining the same booking policy. Obviously, due to the skyrocketing talent costs and cutbacks in ACEC funds, it can't be done. Until students accept this fact, the ACEC will be marred by apathy and ineffectiveness.

Students must adjust their attitudes before the ACEC can adjust its booking policy. Ideally, the ACEC should book new, up-and-coming talent, instead of second-rate, overpriced bands that a handful of people have heard of but nobody really cares much about. But the ACEC can't do this unless students will respond, because even if the group's outstanding, the concert will be a failure if only a few people show up.

This year, experts agree, there will be no major breakouts of the sort we experienced in 1976 (Frampton, Boston, Fleetwood Mac, etc.) Instead, a number of groups will break on a regional, marginal basis. There are dozens of relatively "unknown"—but excellent—groups hovering on the edges of national stardom. The ACEC can—and will, with student support—book these groups before they become major attractions and their prices skyrocket. Ticket prices for these concerts would be low, and entertainment value extraordinarily high.

The ACEC has always had problems determining the musical tastes of Williams students. Basically, it has been agreed that they don't have any. But this doesn't help the ACEC much in deciding what to book. To solve this problem, a survey will be conducted next week. Questionnaires will be distributed in S.U. boxes, and the results will be a major determinant of ACEC booking policy.

Next year's ACEC recognizes its role and limitations, and is willing to contribute a lot of time and effort to achieve its goal, which is, basically, to please the students. If the students get behind it with their support, it will be very effective. Otherwise, it's doomed to fail, and will eventually be abolished.

Quite simply, its fate is in your hands.

Steve Case was recently selected by the College Council to head the ACEC next year.

Panthers rap purple lax, 18-5

When senior captain Jamie Taylor gathered in the opening faceoff, galloped into the goal attack area and pumped in a perfect feed to the crease where senior attackman Dave Moffitt waited to convert the quick stick goal, only six seconds had elapsed and it looked like it might be a very pleasant afternoon at Cole Field.

When, at 6:25, driving middie Collie Nelson parlayed a Todd Eckerson loft into a net-denter and locked it up at 2-2, Purple rooters were confident. The Ephs had been getting off a lot of shots, and Middlebury goalie Paul Scheufle had lucked out, thieving a couple of Dave Moffitt feeds.

When the Ephmen scored a third time, a long 13 minutes and 41 seconds later, the fans hung onto the hope that Dick Goodbody's tally, scored when Eckerson beat his man to the right side of the goal and rerouted a Taylor toss to Goodbody on the far side of the crease, meant the Ephs were on their way back from a 7-3 deficit.

They weren't.

In fact, Eph mentor Renzie Lamb told his charges as they assembled on the bench beneath the 18-5 final tally glowing on the scoreboard, when the Panthers play the brand of lacrosse they played Wednesday there's no way anybody is going to stop them.

"Today they were the best team we played all year," Lamb said. "They could've taken on UMass today."

The Panthers went bananas in the second quarter, double teaming the ball and constantly pressing, forcing the locals into blown face offs, abortive clears, dropped passes, short passes, long passes and stupid passes. The Mids burgled the ball on three consecutive Williams extra man plays.

And if you think that's bad, how about three unassisted goals in 40 seconds during the third quarter?

Amherst knocked off Wesleyan 9-8, and the Ephs followed suit, 13-10, last Saturday. Jeff coach Peter Gooding was on hand Wednesday to scout the Ephs, and Lamb promises a "dogfight" for the Little Three title, on Cole Field tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

Chiefs club Williams; season record now 6-6

by Frank Pergolizzi

It was almost as bad as the UMass Lacrosse game. Sunday afternoon a strong Springfield College baseball team invaded Weston Field and stung the Ephmen with two embarrassing defeats, 10-3, and 8-2. The losses were the fourth and fifth in a row for Williams and marked the lowpoint of a week long slump that saw the Ephmen make twenty errors in five games while giving up 44 runs in the same game span. Their record has now dropped to 6-6.

Both games Sunday were characterized by high scoring first innings for the Springfield Chiefs. The first game saw them score six runs on five hits off starter and loser Steve Maier, whose record now stands at 2-3. Williams showed signs of threatening midway through the game, but they were quickly turned off when centerfielder Scott Miller made a diving catch of a Roger McEniry line drive that the umpire changed his call on three times. The hit would have made the score 6-5. Rick Walter continued his hot hitting for the Ephs, going two for five with two runs batted in.

The second game saw Springfield score four runs in the first on four hits and four walks by starting pitcher Tony Stall. Williams got as close as 4-2 with runs in each the third and fourth innings but Springfield scored four in the top of the fifth to put things on ice. Tony Stall was the loser and Paul Barnes the winner. Brian Cox went three for three for the Chiefs while Scott Harrington had his best hitting game of the year going three for four with a run batted in.

Tomorrow Williams seeks to avenge its April 26th loss to Amherst as the Ephmen entertain the Lord Jeffs in a big doubleheader on Weston Field starting at 1 P.M. The Little Three title is still up for grabs.

New Yorkers trip Ephs

by Frank Carr

The men's varsity track team closed out a rather disappointing dual meet season on Tuesday, losing to both Union and Albany State. The Dutchmen garnered 11 first places for an 83 point victory and Albany followed closely with 71, while the Ephs managed a lone pair of individual wins and finished third with 37 points.

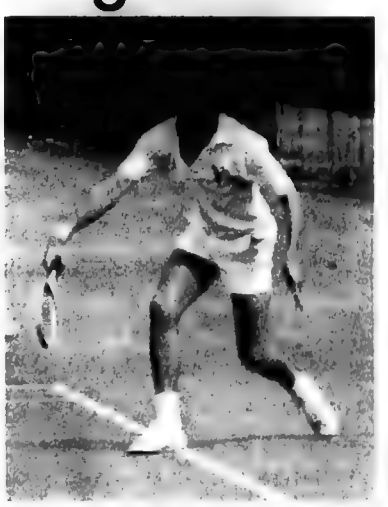
Williams actually held the lead early in the meet on the strength of Larry Tanner and Jim DeSimone's 1-2 performance in the hammer throw. Tanner blasted a 177 ft. 6 incher to break his school record for the second time and DeSimone followed at 108'1". DeSimone also grabbed a second in the shot put (42' 4¾") and fourth in the discus (108' 8") while Bob Duffy sailed the disc 125' 11½" for the second individual Williams victory. Duffy added three more points to the team total with a second in the javelin (178' 4") and John Dell'Erario tacked on two more, placing third in the event at 166' 8". Jamie Rouse (3rd in the high jump—6') and Greg McAleenan (4th in the long jump—19' 4½") closed out a respectable 25 point Williams scoring total in the field events.

Once on the track, the Ephmen found a mere dozen points with 4 pairs of second, third and fourth place finishes. Freshman Vernon "Tiger" Davis negotiated the 120 yard high hurdles in 16 flat for runnerup honors, while the mile relay quartet of Paul Untch, Vin Zinicola, Jeff Coombs and Terry O'Reilly finished just behind the winning Union foursome in a 3:34 clocking. Senior Ken Leinbach ran his fastest mile time of the season with a 4:19.5 effort and wound up third in back of Albany's Bill Mathis and winner Kevin Scheuer from Union who blazed to an Albany State track record of 4:13.3. A Union duo paced O'Reilly to a 2:03.0 third place in the 880, while Glenn Harris and Frank Carr added fourths in the 100 yd dash (10.2) and two mile (9:48.6) respectively.

Racketeers swing into sixth at New Englands

Last weekend the varsity tennis team took what's known in presidential terms as a "working vacation" as they ventured to Amherst for a lot of work and a little play at the New England championships. The Ephs' hard work was rewarded by a sixth place tie with Trinity, behind winner Yale, Dartmouth, Harvard, Boston College and Tufts, while the play served as a relief from the grueling, sometimes four match-a-day, format of the tournament. With this fine showing under their belt, Coach Dave Johnson and his team returned home on Wednesday to smother Wesleyan 9-0 and virtually place the Little Three title under there, too. The match for the title remains to be played by Williams this Saturday at Amherst.

The two place jump by the Ephs from last year's eighth place finish was marked by all-around good team play and several outstanding performances. Martin Goldberg and Tad Roach particularly shined; Roach capturing the "B" division consolation crown while Goldberg matched his showing of last year by reaching the semi-final round of the "A" division. On his way to the semi's, Goldberg avenged two earlier season losses and managed to keep Williams high up in team points. Roach played an outstanding first round match only to lose in a close third set to a fine Dartmouth player. He was then fed into the consolations where he rolled through the field without losing a set.



The remaining four singles entrants saw enough green to make any leprechaun feel right at home as three lost to players from Dartmouth. Jim Parsons cruised through his first round "A" match only to be derailed in the second. In a similar situation was Perry Nelson as he dropped a close second round "B" match by losing just a few big points too many. Dean Gianakos returned to singles play for the first time since early in the season, only to lose a well played second match by two tie-breakers. Advancing well into the "C" draw, Bill Whelan scored two wins before being felled in a third set tie-breaker by a Tufts opponent.

Doubles play was a bright spot for the Ephs as Goldberg and Whelan fought their way into the "A" semi-final where Yale's brawn proved to be too much for Williams' brain. The "B" division team of Nelson and Gianakos won a match before they were also out-hit. Peter Friesen and Parsons failed to get back at a Harvard duo for a previous loss after winning their first round easily.

Against Wesleyan, Williams started its "second season" in defense of the Little Three title like a little kid who has something and refuses to give any of it away. The 9-0 shut-out was Williams' first of the year.

Goldberg retained his tournament form with a two set win, while Parsons looked strong in three sets. A second set tie-breaker sealed a victory for Nelson and Evan Bash got some exercise by also going three sets. Roach, as usual, showed no mercy as he won in straight sets, while Whelan proved to be a good host by surrendering one.

Highlighting the doubles action was the successful return of Roach and Bash. The nos. 1 and 2 duos of Goldberg and Whelan and Nelson and Gianakos won.

SAILING

Freshman sailors George Wilbanks and Anne Flocken placed Williams to an outstanding finish at the 37th Annual New England Sailing Association Freshman Cup at Yale last weekend. Wilbanks and Flocken, racing in the B-division, coasted to a second place finish as a result of excellent sailing Sunday. The duo met stiff competition in their division as Tufts entered its A boat to grab first place with 27 points, followed by the Ephs with 33, and Yale with 47.

BIKING

Competing in its first race, the Williams Road Racers biked its way to a strong finish last weekend in the Berkshire Community College Marathon. Freshman Roger Prévot won the junior men's class, while sophomore Peter Monson raced to a third place finish among 90 in the senior men's division. Freshman Wade Smith fared less well than expected as he was plagued by mechanical difficulties.

WOMEN'S SKIING

The women's ski team has selected Rachel Potter and Marty Epstein as captains of next year's squad. Potter excelled in cross country competition this season and fared well in the Regionals. Epstein, captain of this year's alpine contingent had an outstanding year, finishing well at the Williams carnival.

RUGBY

Last weekend the Williams rugby team faced Harvard at the Smith College annual Rugby weekend. The Ephmen rallied from a 6-3 halftime deficit to tie the match at 9-9. The Ephs established control and Dave Levy then booted what proved to be the decisive penalty kick to beat the Cantabs 12-9.

Laxwomen lose one

by Rex Coons

A three game win skein for the Women's lacrosse team ended Tuesday as it dropped a 6-5 decision at Trinity.

With difficulty adjusting to the hard, bouncy surface at Hartford, the stickers fell behind 3-0 early in the first half. They finally began to overcome the sluggishness that characterized this performance and achieved a 4-4 deadlock at the intermission. The game was still tied at 5 goals apiece, until the Bantamettes knocked home the game-winner with a minute left.

Although the performance was a definite letdown following their weekend win over Wesleyan, Williams actually outshot their opponents 34 to 23. Mary Fish and Maggie O'Brien each scored twice, while Dawn Bedrosian added the fifth tally; however, the trio required 30 shots between them. Priscilla Buckley and Vivian Patterson led the defense with two interceptions apiece. Marty Taft turned back 15 shots in goal.

Williams will take on Dartmouth Friday afternoon, and then host the New England College Women's Lacrosse Association Tournament over the weekend. Games will be played all day Saturday and Sunday morning with the announcement of the All-College teams at 2:00 Sunday. Williams will meet Yale at 9:00 Saturday morning, take Bates at 2:45, and finish by playing Harvard at 10:15 Sunday morning.

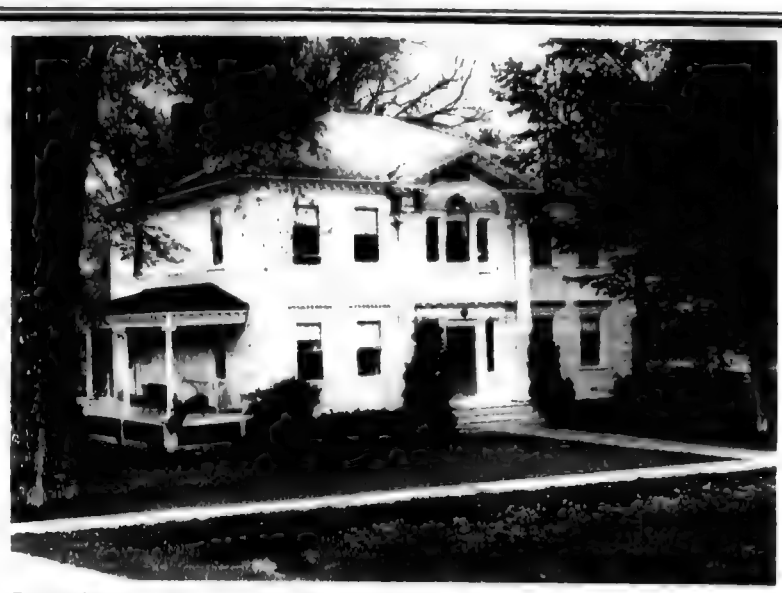
Speakers detail African apartheid, liberation

by Stu Massad

Collistus Ndlovu of the Zimbabwean African People's Union (ZAPU) and Paul Pomphrey, director of the U.S. Anti Apartheid Movement, spoke on the future of liberation movements in Rhodesia (Zimbabwe) and the role of the U.S. in supporting apartheid in South Africa Thursday in a talk sponsored by the Williams Black Student Union.

Ndlovu, former delegate to the Geneva talks on Rhodesia and now ZAPU's North American representative, spoke on the future of Rhodesia from a Zimbabwean guerilla's perspective. With the Portuguese withdrawal from Africa, particularly from Mozambique, Ndlovu said, the fall of the Ian Smith government is inevitable. He projected success for the guerillas, now gaining in manpower as blacks leave Rhodesia for training camps in Zambia and Mozambique, "within the next 18 months."

Ndlovu ruled out negotiation and peaceful change in Rhodesia. He characterized the Rhodesian government as too entrenched in apartheid to seek change, and charged that instead it uses peace overtures to split the African movements at the bargaining table.



The proposals made by Secretary of State Henry Kissinger for Rhodesian settlement, calling for black majority rule with certain posts reserved for whites and an international fund to reimburse losses by white refugees, are racist and unacceptable because they sharpen racial divisions and compensate oppressors, not victims, said Ndlovu. He criticized Kissinger for not moving to settle the Rhodesian problem until after the liberation movements began to succeed.

"We are not fighting whites," Ndlovu said, "we are fighting a system. He said the introduction of token blacks into Rhodesian government would not sufficiently alter apartheid policies or what he called the exploitation of black labor by whites.

Ndlovu predicted the war would escalate while the guerillas gain in strength and unity, which he admitted they now lack. He discounted the role of Chinese, Russians and Cubans, saying they served only as advisers and trainers and would have no part in actual fighting or the eventual policies of a new regime.

Pomphrey focused on the role of U.S. corporations in supporting apartheid in South Africa. He noted

Option houses possible for 1978-79 year

A sub-committee of the Housing Committee has proposed that some current residential house satellite buildings be converted to option housing for 1978-79, according to Housing Committee Co-chairman Sally Coney. The proposal is "very, very tentative, she said, and initially involves only Dewey House and one of the Dodd House satellites.

If the Committee on Undergraduate Life approves the proposal next fall, it will go to the Board of Trustees for approval at their January meeting.

Option housing would be open to juniors and seniors, and all students involved would be entirely off board. The College has suggested that it might provide funds for the enlargement of existing kitchen facilities, said Coney. Each house would have about ten to fifteen residents.

Students living in the option housing would be responsible for light maintenance; no matrons or janitors would be assigned.

Each person applying for option housing would be assigned a random number, with prospective seniors being assigned numbers first. The applicants would then form groups to fill up the houses, the groups with the lowest average number receiving their preferences first. There would therefore still be a random aspect of the procedure but some selectivity in the formation of groups would remain, and would avoid the possibility of fraternity-like groups being formed, added Coney.

The decision to propose option housing resulted from the increasing number of students applying for off-campus housing, she said. Option housing is a compromise between off-campus and on-campus, suggested Coney. Those students living in the option houses would retain an affiliation with a conventional residential house to prevent their becoming isolated. If all current satellite buildings are converted to option housing, the number of Main Street row houses may be reduced, said Coney.

Lindsey to run Log next year

Claudia Linsey will serve as Log manager for the '77-'78 school year. According to Eva Grudin, Chairman of the Log Committee, it was a "very difficult decision" choosing her from a "very strong pool of applicants."

Claudia Lindsey, '77, will be the new Log Manager. (photo by Oettgen)

Lindsey saw her job not only as business manager, but more importantly as a public relations expert. Her major objective, she said, will be to establish a "wider clientele." More people would come to the Log, she asserted, if they knew of the varied and flexible atmosphere. She likes the changes and wants to make people aware of the differences of the "lively weekend crowd" as opposed to the "quieter weeknight business" and the radically different "vacation crowd."

As well as attracting varied student groups, the new manager set getting the faculty to the Log as a high priority. To do this she plans to deal directly with the staff rather go through the students, since "Bring a Professor" nights have not been particularly successful in the past. Originally, she said, faculty members patronized the Log, but attendance has fallen. She felt their interest would pick up if they knew the people at the Log were making an effort to accommodate them.

Lindsey felt no handicap in being female. She thought that any problems with rowdy clientele, were not the result of malice, and that a few words should calm most trouble makers. "I'm not afraid to get in the middle of things, though" she said, if the going should get rough.

She looked forward to special promotions, such as class nights, and televised sporting events to spark interest and increase business over the next year.

Lindsey saw the manager's job as a once in a lifetime opportunity to run a small business. She planned to make this a short term job, leaving in a year or two either for business school or to get additional experience elsewhere.

Lindsey's selection pleased Log Committee chairman Eva Grudin. "Claudia is very charming and very bright. She gets along with everyone," she said. The qualities Lindsey embodied were both "good business sense" and a "practical sense," Grudin noted. She knows the campus, which will be important in making quick managerial decisions, she said.

Grudin praised the abilities of outgoing manager Gene Falk. "He's done a fabulous job, he's been very energetic and open to change," and these have been very important to the operation of the Log, she said.

Gargoyle taps new members

"It's an honor, and some people view it as an honor society," said Lynn McConnell, co-president of Gargoyle Society. But, she emphasized, Gargoyle is an increasingly active, low-profile organization working to present issues to the College community.

Members tapped this spring were selected from a large number of qualified nominees, McConnell noted. She claimed that Gargoyle is moving outside traditional membership choices, like editor of the Record and captain of the football team, to select from active students in all sectors of the campus community.

Gargoyle is changing, McConnell said. The society, founded in 1895, and until the late sixties was heavy with tradition and ceremony. In 1967 members charged it with elitism, and it began to liberalize. Women and juniors were admitted in 1972, and blacks began entering a few years ago. "In the early seventies," said McConnell, "it was just a white elitist society. That's changing."

Gargoyle Society, which in the past had been important in founding the honors system, College Council, student-faculty committees and the Junior Adviser system, has not been highly visible while it has changed, McConnell remarked. This year, she said, the group has tried to become a forum for student debate, working against student apathy on specific issues. The society has met with the trustees to question the College's building plan and the effectiveness of its financial aid program for middle-class students. Gargoyle has written letters to administrators on topics like the institution of the central mail room, none of which, McConnell said, were answered.

McConnell saw Gargoyle's two open discussions this year as highlights of the group's activity. Last November, the society hosted professors and students to discuss the viability of the American political system in providing meaningful choice between candidates. In January, Gargoyle convened a forum on "What's Wrong with Williams." McConnell said attendance and debate at both discussions were great because the forum touched "a raw nerve on campus."

"It's my anticipation that the group next year will become more active," the co-president said. She looks to next year's members "to found a series of Gargoyle panels over the next few years." She said she hopes the society will become a forum for student views and a channel to the administration.

"This organization suffers from the fact that we elect people active in other organizations on campus," McConnell remarked. She said this sometimes means members committed to other activities are unable to devote adequate time to Gargoyle meetings and programs. Student apathy and lack of Gargoyle publicity are other problems for the group, she said.

Food service subsidies aid senior dinner dance

Food Services will provide the food for the Senior Dinner Dance at no cost to seniors, according to Linc Avery, chairman of the Senior Dinner Dance Committee.

Last year Food Services served the dinner, but did not cover the costs of the meal. Food Services did, however, offer a $1.00 discount to everyone that attended, which included seniors, underclassmen, parents, and faculty.

This year, Food Services is supplying the dinner entirely free of charge to all seniors, including those not on board. The costs of the meal for the underclassmen, parents, and faculty who will also attend the meal will be paid for out of the $12.50 admission fee that is to be charged. This admission fee also covers the costs of tent rental, liquor, and a band.

Avery remarked that the subsidizing of the dinner by Food Services was entirely Food Services Director Ross Keller's idea, and that it was his way of saying farewell to the Senior class. Keller explained that his decision to pay for the meal came about because he said he believed "Food Services should be doing something on behalf of seniors during senior week. I feel this is something the College should do and I have no reservations about it."

Avery noted that the money saved by Keller's decision to subsidize the dinner would be used to increase the liquor supply and hire a better band for the dance.

The menu and the serving schedule for the dinner will be determined mainly by the Senior Dinner Dance Committee. Neither Keller nor Avery know exactly how much the dinner is going to cost, although Keller noted that "Food Services is planning to keep a lid on it so that it doesn't cost too much."

Roughly 400 to 450 seniors and underclassmen are expected to attend the dinner dance, according to Avery.

Kite Day

Kite Day will be held on Saturday May 14 at 1:00 p.m. People are invited to come fly kites or just watch on Cluett hill. About 60 kites will be flown by students in the Basic Design course.

Co-op Option

After several years of discussion, co-op housing may become a reality on the Williams College campus by fall 1978. Although the proposal has just emerged from a housing committee subcommittee and faces scrutiny by the full committee, the CUL and the trustees, the chances for adoption are apparently good.

The major benefit of incorporating what the sub-committee calls 'option' housing into the present system is that it may reduce the number of people living off campus. Even the CUL Final Report on the Residential Housing System, which opposed co-op housing, admitted, "The situation in which around 140 students are allowed to live off-campus is viewed with concern by the committee." A CUL survey last spring showed "a significant, although not overwhelming" interest in the option alternative.

Conceivably, students dissatisfied with the residential housing system who normally seek off-campus housing for junior and senior year would take advantage of this option. Even the staunchest defender of the residential system would agree that keeping students physically associated with the College in co-op houses contributes more to the desired atmosphere of the College than having students spread out all over Williamstown.

The objection that option housing would reduce the diversity of the housing system could bog down passage of this proposal at the CUL or trustee level. Although the small scale experiment with option housing would not be a threat to the status quo, the implications of this change could receive extensive debate.

The Record believes that the proposal submitted to the housing committee successfully reconciles the principle of randomness—the key to diversity—with the self-selection required in forming a single housing unit.

Hopefully, the interest in this alternative will not be dissipated over the summer months. Procuring option housing for 1978 requires swift action this fall on the part of the housing committee and the CUL. The Record suggests that both committees make this a top priority issue when the groups reconvene in September.

No Surprises

It is fun to have someone throw a surprise party for you. It is entertaining to open a box of Cracker Jacks and see what your surprise is. It is neither fun not entertaining, however, to have the administration of a college drop major surprises in your lap over the summer.

Last year, students were told right up until the end of the school year that problems with Baxter Hall, seating and line problems and space problems for freshman activities would be explored and solved before any decision would be made concerning a central mail service in Baxter. Yet, the decision was made and implemented over the summer with little or no chance for student input. The Record staff returned and found that it no longer had an office. Individuals and organizations reacted strongly against the administration decision but there was little that could be done.

We don't want to return to Williams next year only to learn that over the summer some one decided to remove the columns from the front of Chapin Hall or close the row house dining halls. It is the administration's responsibility to make decisions. The summer break, however, should not be used as a grace period where controversial decisions can be made irrespective of the wishes of the College community.

No error in logic

To the editor:

We wish to comment on the response to Ali's logic which appeared in your May 3 issue.

It is not that Mr. Ali has erred in his logic but that he need not state a "second hypothesis": it is a well known fact (for those who care to see) that the majority of people at Williams, regardless of color, are racists. Trying to make that fact a "hypothesis" will only be denying the truth. In effect, the writer(s) is a good example of what Mr. Ali terms "the master who does not see or pretends not to see." The writer(s) is certainly a liberal given the majority of liberals on campus; pardon us, there are no racists at Williams. The solution to this problem of "blindness" might be a correct political education, which, unfortunately, Williams College does not offer and the American society tries its best to suppress.

—Tariq Abdulla and Bhaktinanda Prasad.

Ali responds and elaborates

To the Editor:

Thank you for printing my last article and for the lively and thoughtful responses it generated.

It is a great pity if the article conveyed the impression that in the special case where the rich exploit the poor, the poor constituted a particular ethnic group. In no way did the article state or imply that poor people constituted a specific ethnic group. It is when a person living in a society where he is used to seeing the poor as predominantly one specific ethnic group that any mention of poor people reminds him of that specific ethnic group. Such is a classic example of how society and environment affects the individual's perception of things and people.

In Williams College, the average student is apt to think of all blacks as being on financial aid or welfare. In just the same manner, the blacks tend to think of all whites as belonging to the jet set.

In the article, I raised the point that perhaps one may object to the existence of a BSU or a black newspaper. Of course, anyone can question the existence of a BSU or the Jewish Union or country clubs. What is often forgotten is that these organizations exist primarily because of the racist factors inherent in this society and that but for the racist factors, the need for unions on strict racial lines would not arise.

Then comes the problem of "responsibility for the sins of the fathers". Yes, one must accept responsibility for the past sins of the fathers. Not only that one must accent responsibility for the present guilt of the fathers insofar as one continues to enjoy the fruits of those sins. Yes, one can quickly deny responsibility for the sins of the fathers, but does one refuse to accept the estates willed to him-her by the fathers which are tainted with these sins. If the answer is yes, then one may refuse to accept the responsibilities of the "sins of the fathers."

Now comes the major question as to whether racism is inherent in the individual as though one was born with it. To borrow the idea of Stokley Carmichael and C. Hamilton, racism must be defined into two categories: institutional racism and inter-personal racism. Racism inherent in the individual (if such a thing is possible) would come under inter-personal relationship. To subscribe to the belief that inter-personal racism is an organic part of the individual is to yield to the forces of reaction who entertain the notion that a particular race is born evil or that it is "The Devil."

In the majority of cases, one has to look at the problem in terms that racism exists in the individual not for its own sake but that it is precipitated by certain social, political and economic factors. It is the knowledge that at the end of the semester I'll head for the rat-infested ghetto while most of my suite mates and friends will head for their plush suburbs which creates hatred in me towards them. In this case also, my hatred is aroused by the fact that this system allows the existence of ghettoes as well as suburbs; it allows one man to lounge by the swimming pool while others cool themselves in front of a broken fire hydrant. At such times, I hate the white man. But my hatred is the product of my environment. It is when people of similar socio-economic class but of different ethnic groups have to compete for jobs or housing that these problems become manifested in racial terms.

Institutional racism, on the other hand, has little to do with the individual. It exists within the socio-political and economic structures of a society and about which an individual, regardless of his good intentions, can do little unless he wishes to change the society. It is this institutional aspect which makes many people, such as the liberal, unwilling accomplices in the racist and exploitative process of that particular system. A few examples will suffice.

Many American youths were conscripted to fight a war which was both genocidal and racist in character in Indo-China (Gen. Westmoreland said that he was not concerned about Vietnamese casualties because Asians did not value life as much as Americans did) even though many of these youths opposed the war.

Andy Young, the American representative to the U.N., calls the South African regime "illegitimate," but the Carter administration thinks otherwise and hastens to 'clarify' Young's statements, as in so many other occasions. Carter as the President necessarily approves of the Southern African regimes of Rhodesia and South Africa, but Carter as the individual is probably opposed to them on his moral and human rights grounds, we hope.

Thus, the main point in all this is that it is not Vietnamese against Americans, Jews against Arabs or blacks against whites, but it is the contradictions between the socio-political and economic systems which creates racial awareness and bigotry, which are then actively manifested by individuals. To further crystalize this argument, I would like to say what the speaker on South African problems said a couple of days ago when he gave a lecture in Bronfman. He said that the guerillas in Southern Africa are not fighting the White Men, but the system created by these men that actively propagates racism and discrimination because of the color of one's skin. Thus, it is not possible to eradicate racism and other forms of discrimination unless one is willing to eradicate the system which consciously or unconsciously encourages such attitudes among the people.

Student group investigates power

by Mark Leach, Eric Scheye, Greg Weber

Once upon a time a great commotion was heard in the Purple Valley and there was great wailing and gnashing of teeth. There was talk of strikes, of voting "NO", of seceding from the College Council, of tearing the student government up by its roots and starting afresh.

That was three months ago and things have quieted down somewhat since then. Have you noticed?

The concern, however, about the students' place in the decision-making processes at Williams has outlasted all the faddy politicking, angry letters and hoopla. The concern was first given constructive attention at the forum held in Baxter Hall immediately after the College Council elections. About one hundred people from the Williams community attended the forum. Forty of these people signed up to hold further meetings to discuss decision-making at the College. The group met four times by itself and also conducted open meetings with the CAP and the Steering Committee.

Four weeks ago a proposal was drafted and subsequently presented to the College Council which would "create a College Council committee charged with the investigation and evaluation of student decision-making power at Williams College." The proposal was approved one week later and on April 24 the first organizational meeting was held. The meeting was widely publicized on posters and radio, and most of the twenty students who attended are now actively engaged in the business of investigating decision-making at Williams.

The committee works this way: By means of extensive interviews with members of the student body, the faculty and the administration, we hope to get a total picture of all the various decision-making processes at the College. From this picture we hope to deduce the degree of student access to information as it is presently found in these four decision-making centers: 1) Individual departments, 2) Student-Faculty Committees, 3) Faculty Meetings and Committees and 4) the Administration. Two subcommittees, headed by John Raitt and Tom Stone, have already begun investigating individual departments and student-faculty committees. Next year two more subcommittees will be established to look into decision-making in the faculty meetings and committees and in the administration.

One of the committee's primary objectives is to be highly accessible and responsive to student concern and input. To facilitate this accessibility, the committee is recruiting people in every residential house on campus to act as liaison representatives. Over a dozen of these representatives have already been found and have held meetings during this past week to solicit student input during these formative days of the committee. Next year every house will have a liaison representative to whom students can speak about questions involving decision-making at the College.

The response to the meetings already held by the liaison representatives in over half of the College houses has been disappointing. Three months ago it seemed as if students were asking to take some responsibility for the decisions which affect their life at Williams, and we hope that that perceived attitude was not just a passing fad. This committee should provide constructive expression for the desire to understand and influence the powers which affect us here. For those who do want to take some responsibility for the decisions which affect them and who feel that understanding the politics of the community in which one lives is important, we invite your help. We need help conducting interviews, establishing the liaison network and, above all, we need help to be in touch with the concerns of all students. Input and insights from graduating seniors is especially needed now. If you would like to get involved during these next two weeks or if you would like to plunge in next year, contact one of the persons named below, or come to our next meeting in the Wilson Room at 6:00 pm Wednesday.

Leach, Scheye and Weber are the Temporary Coordinators of the decision-making investigation committee.

Twenty-eight profs leave to do research, catch-up

Twenty-eight professors will be taking all or part of next year off, either on sabbaticals, leaves of absence or assistant professor leaves. Included in this exodus are nearly half of this year's department chairmen and the entire history of science department (Professor Donald deB. Beaver). Some will be taking time off to catch up on developments in their fields, some to do research for articles and books, and some will be teaching at other schools, either as a change of pace or to supplement their incomes.

Tenured faculty are entitled to sabbaticals of a semester once every four years or of a full year once every seven. They receive three quarters pay from the college in either case. Untenured faculty may be granted one semester assistant professor leaves at full pay if the College believes that a research or creative project merits it. Additionally, all faculty may take leaves of absence without support from the College.

Following is a partial list of what some faculty will be doing in their time off.

Laszlo Versenyi, professor of philosophy and chairman of the history of ideas program, will be teaching at an as yet unnamed institution next year. Versenyi says he will most likely be teaching the same type of courses he teaches here, but is going to another school because he needs the money. He hopes to earn enough on top of his three-quarter Williams sabbatical pay to help him put two children through college.

Professor Donald deB. Beaver, chairman and sole member of the history of science department, will be doing research at Yale next year on the growth of collaboration in science, particularly in Napoleonic France where it first appeared as a common means of researching. Beaver plans to work alone, although the idea came out of a collaboration, he says. Being the only member of his department, Beaver was asked how he felt about leaving the entire history of science sequence bracketed in his wake. "The department is divided about the move," he says. "I have some misgivings about taking an entire year off. I hope in the future just to take a semester off at a time."

All faculty may take leaves of absence without support from the college.

Raymond Chang and Harold Warren of the chemistry department will both be at Stanford next year. Chang will be doing research in bio-inorganic chemistry, hoping to discover how certain small molecules are able to mimic the action of hemoglobin in the blood. Hemoglobin is the protein which transports oxygen from the lungs to the tissues. He also plans to complete two books during his leave, one on the structure of the Chinese language, the other an introductory chemistry text. Finally, he plans to teach a course while there, in order, he says, to "see what Stanford students are like."

Warren will be a "visiting scholar" at Stanford, although he is not quite sure what the title entails. He plans to take some graduate courses, make some explorations of the current literature, and possibly do some writing while there. He also wants to look at the organic chemistry course taught at Stanford to "see what they're doing with it."

Professor Don Gifford, the English department's Joyce scholar, will be spending time in England and Ireland next year. While in Ireland he intends to revise and enlarge his annotations of Joyce's Dubliners, and A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, and also work on a monograph on the nature and function of metaphor.

Professor Guilford Spencer, chairman of the mathematics department, will not be going anywhere next year, but will establish an "office hideaway" in Williamstown to catch up on some reading and pursue some interests that he has not had time for because of his teaching and administrative duties.

The sociology department is losing its chairman, Professor Robert Friedrichs, to Cambridge University where he will be working on a book about the sociology of the sociology of religion. He also plans to do some tutoring while there, but the book will be his main focus, he says. Friedrich also plans to present papers at two conferences of the International Sociological Association, one in Sweden and the other in Hungary.

Professor Irving Shainman of the music department plans to travel around the world during his time off. He hopes to do some lecturing at near and far eastern universities, on his way, most likely in the Philippines, Thailand and Israel.

H. 'Ganse Little, chairman of the religion department, will be studying hermeneutical problems associated with the metaphor in London next year. He says he is "interested in trying to get a sense of what people in fields of philosophy, anthropology and literary history are telling us about the importance of metaphor in understanding creativity, interpretation and imagination." He plans to do research in "several bodies of literature" and make contact with many of the prominent anthropological thinkers working in England now.

The development of political tolerance will be the subject of a study by George Marcus of the political science department next year. Marcus will be staying on campus and continue coaching women's crew, but will not be teaching. He expects his research to consume the bulk of his time. Marcus is waiting to hear from the National Science Foundation about a grant for the project, but says he will do the work using secondary materials if the money is not approved. He expects the entire project to take two and a half years.

"Foreign language teachers should go abroad as often as possible to 'recharge their batteries.' "

Nicholas Fersen of the Russian department hopes to spend some time with his family in Rome during the first semester next year, but he says his plans have not jelled. He expects to spend the second semester at his Pownal, Vermont home working on translations and planning new courses.

Stuart Crampton, chairman of the physics department, will work at MIT next year on "bulk quantum effects on hydrogen atoms at liquid helium temperatures." Helium cooled to 2.6 degrees suddenly and inexplicably changes from a vicious liquid to a state of "superfludity". Crampton and his research associates at MIT hope to shed some light on the phenomenon by using hydrogen, a simpler atom, in experiments. "It's a long shot experiment," says Crampton, "but we can afford a long shot. And we are bound to learn a lot even if it fails." The project is expected to take several years.

John Hyde, chairman of the history department plans to travel to Canada and France to do research for course materials. In Canada, he plans to visit new historical sites to help him "capture the flavor of Canadian life." In France, he hopes to look at the north and northwest regions which have served as invasion routes often in the past. Hyde is interested in the mixture of cultures that has resulted. Hyde also expects to spend some time in Williamstown next year working on new courses.

George Pistorius, chairman of the romanic languages department will be in Paris doing a stylistic study of 19th century French poetry. Pistorius says he also wishes to return to France to help him keep his French current.

"Foreign language teachers should go abroad as often as possible to 'recharge the batteries'. The language is growing," he says. Pistorius, who answered the phone on departmental chairman business several times during the interview, gave another common reason for taking a sabbatical. "I need it," he said.

Respect and Selfishness

by Eric Sundin

Williams students are intelligent, eloquent, and well-rounded. Their education is responsible for their moral decency, as well as their usefulness in society. Unfortunately, the word respect seems to be missing from their volcabularies. Another word is too often put into practice—selfishness. An education at Williams implies "constructive introspection" and "striving for personal achievement." Achievement and improvement upon the "old ways" are the cornerstones of the capitalist system of the United States. Tragically, respect falls victim to disrespect which results from selfishness.

Everyone would like to think of themselves as "respectable" and "decent." No one can ever be totally "decent." The Williams student, however, comes to find his elite and excellent Williams education as a manifestation of respectability and therefore erroneously concludes that he is wholly respectable.

It doesn't really take much to shatter this snobbish bubble. Williams students are guilty of the same sickness which permeates our society as a whole. The crimes here may be comparatively small, but in principle they have the same root, namely selfishness.

At Williams, "personal achievement" has been perverted into a selfish excuse to step on other people or show disrespect. Like stealing books off reserve shelves or from other desks. Like cheating on tests. Some people just don't respect the rights of others: the right to a clean campus, the right to property, the right to quiet in the library to name a few "rights." Trash is everywhere so we need to hire vacumers and janitors. Perhaps our noses should be ground in the trash to prove a point. Instead it is picked up, which absolves us of our "sin." Eventually, WCFM gets around to replacing stolen records and equipment. Parking lot scrapes are eventually repaired by the unfortunate owner. (How do some students merit driver's licenses)? Sidewalk lamps are picked up off the ground or rebent back to a vertical position. Windows are replaced at great costs. Photography Club equipment can only be recovered by re-purchasing. Money, even clothing, is stolen from rooms, food from refrigerators and books from hallway storage boxes.

The point is not that the lesser the crime, the less guilty one is. Obviously, burning costumes is more sick and more heinous an act than stealing lab results. The point is that students are taught to be competitive and learn as much as they can and have as much fun as they can. Unfortunately, despite the isolation of Williamstown and the decency of its students, the campus is still plagued by the basic human, and maybe American, tradition: selfishness. Such small thefts and damages only hint at the tip of the iceberg of selfishness which grows instead of diminishes as things get more expensive, time more rare, job openings more scarce. The disrespect rolls on.

I don't mean to preach nor do I profess to even expect a solution. But perhaps if people weren't quite so set in their old ways, they could switch to new tracks, correct tracks, on which respect rules over disrespect.

Hopefully, such truth will reveal itself and not be externally imposed by negative law—punishment when the damage is done. Any damage must be resolved and reconstruction must occur.

Central to the idea of disrespect and damage is the problem of cheating at Williams. The person who cheats shows no respect for the person who is honest. Ideally, everyone would agree that honesty "is better than" lying.

Poetry has imagination, lacks craft

by Henry Ricks and Jonathan Sanoff

Student poetry is unlikely to usher in a new age for the written word. The efforts of the Academy of American Poets Contest winner Steven White, and the honorable mention designees Laurie Giemza, David Clement, Carol Croland and Catherine McCune, will not force us to reformulate our views on the possibilities of language. Nevertheless, the poetry has praiseworthy qualities. It exhibits a willingness to use everyday language and objects, and a certain amount of humor and playfulness. In matters of craft, however, these poets are still amateurs. They do not employ the sound of language well and at times the motive behind their line breaks is a mystery. Each poet is best examined individually.

The winner, Steven White, is familiar to most people who read student poetry on this campus. White is notable principally for his constant experimentation; so much so, that it is difficult to discern a consistent voice in this writing. He shows creativity in his use of images, which are often striking. In a "Mime's Elegy" the voice tells us that "The intimacy of silence-Lay siege to me." or in "About My Invention" we are directed to "the floor strewn with the possibilities." Striking images are not enough to create a poem, however White sometimes deals images at random as from a deck of cards. In "Tatoo" there are three images: "the sharp ships-of circumstances," "a glass-of water," and "a pure-white room." The last two images strengthen each other, but the first remains isolated. This randomness of image weakens the poem, making it seem fragmented. White's other weakness is the use of "poetic punch lines". At the end of "Tatoo" the voice tells an unidentified listener: "We both know-What indelible means," which is meant to sound ominous. Another example is "Divination" which ends:

"While the coin shines up through murky water, Guiding you like the first pale star Barely burning through this night."

The problem with this practice is that it cheapens the rest of the poem. We have a sense that the poem exists only to lead us to the final lines.

The first of the honorable mentions was Laurie Giezma whose poetry was read by Rabb; the poet herself was ill and could not attend. Giezma's poetry is marked by a colorful imagination. The speaker of "The First Chinese Brother" is "from the country of fireworks." This image alone would be commonplace, but in conjunction with the line, "I . . . never could say No-to a child striking a book of matches," and "Dead languages sifting from the sky" it takes on power. The obvious delight with which Giezma writes, is infectious. She is not as slick as White. The word "Then" is the first in four lines of the third stanza—a sin White would never commit. Still the poetry is engaging.

David Clement's poetic indicia is humor and common speech. For example, "nice" is used twice in "Amy in Africa." Normally, this word is only cliche but in this poem's context, where the speaker is a vague and perplexed man a cliche is appropriate. The poetry is unpolished and also seems highly influenced by Rabb; nevertheless it is often funny.

Carol Croland's poetry is quite uneven. Her personal poems often avoid the issues they attempt to deal with by shifting imagistic vagueness. In "Miriam," a poem about the poet's grandmother, the first section successfully employs realistic detail. The second section moves from the specific into the fantastic image of a hospital room attacking the poet while her grandmother dies. The death itself is lost in the image; the experience is obscured rather than revealed. "On Henri Matisse's Portrait of Madame Matisse" is another poem which breaks down at the end. Matisse adopts a dispassionate and effective tone throughout the first four stanzas. Disappointingly, the final phrases use too many adjectives and mood loses its earlier objectivity. Both pieces begin strongly, but the quality is not maintained.

A MIME'S ELEGY

I knew myself in a pool
Of light and let
The intimacy of silence
Lay siege to me. I opened Onto the world like the doors
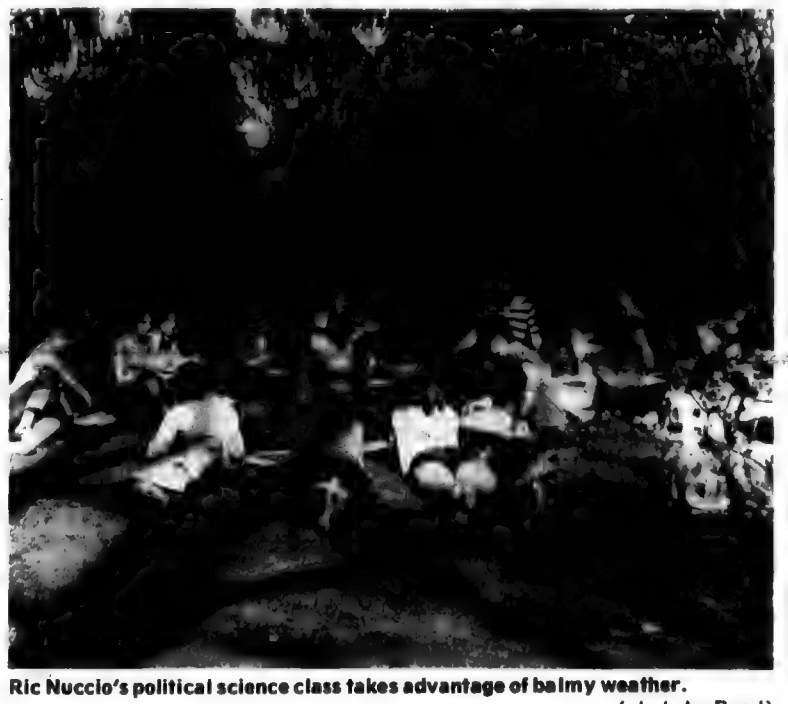
To a high balcony.



—Steven White
copyright 1977

The last honorable mention was Catherine McCune. Many of McCune's poems are marred by sentimentality. Her standout, though, is "The Elephant Man—Robert Merrick (1887-1927). It was one of the best poems read, perhaps the best. It is a story about a circus freak, interspersed with quotes from Freaks by Leslie Fiedler. The poem is successful because it is complete deception. We believe that McCune has taken her material from an actual book which describes real though grotesque events. Yet, all this is pure invention. A well controlled passage:

I am sometimes moved by the persistent trembling of a landscape or the specificity of a butterfly whose twitching wing divides and defines sunlight.
Now this way. Now that.

This poem reveals intelligent artifice far superior to any of the poems.

The reading was chiefly notable for two pleasant experiences, Laurie Giezma's exotic imagination and Catherine McCune's thoughtful invention.

Viewpoint: Respect and Selfishness

The person who cheats is therefore dishonestly selfish. (Everyone is selfish). The honor code system at Williams is an admirable effort to strike at the conscience of those dishonest people and not to strike from over their shoulders during an exam. Practically, however, the system falls short. Even though the cheater might get a better grade than the honest student, it is a consolation to know that he's wasting his own education and that, perhaps, will eventually catch up with him. Some people may cheat so well that this may only happen after Med or Grad school if at all.

In a less drastic way disrespect also flashes its nasty teeth: the word 'silence' seems to be an unknown in a student's vocabulary. You almost never hear it for any length of time in Sawyer, as ironic as that fact is. With the increased usage of the library at the end of semester, the Reserve Room sounds like the runways of JFK airport, complete with turbo-prop vocal cords. An occasional whispered conversation or restrained laugh is tolerable, but a library shouldn't have to double as a cocktail lounge. Other college libraries seem much quieter. Why can't ours be?

What are the solutions? If I knew, I could solve all the world's ills. A police force and library gestapo hardly seems the answer. The nasty librarian in secondary school showed us the meaning of respect by "carrying a big stick." It is sad to think that students here are not beyond this level of maturity, and that someone else has to wield power to enforce such respect. What is so enervating is the flurry of wisecrack comments and profane language which immediately follow someone's attempt to tell them what silence and respect for those who need to concentrate is.

Of course not everyone is to blame for everything. We've all got to be a little selfish in this society and at this college to "get ahead." But disrespect need not accompany this selfishness, and the education we get here should teach us this, if nothing else. Racism and crime would not exist if it weren't for disrespect. Perhaps such an ideal society is unattainable—but what is so difficult about having a quiet library, a clean campus and a more honest student body? We have so many luxuries here at Williams so why don't we show our appreciation through respect??

Green edges laxwomen, 9-8

by Rex Coons

A single goal made up the bitter difference once again as Dartmouth spilled the lady laxers 9-8 on Friday. The Big Green threatened to turn the game into a romp as it cruised to a 7-2 lead in the first half. Then, as against Trinity on Tuesday, the team suddenly rallied after Sarah Baldwin drew first blood following intermission. Instantly the Ephettes quickened the pace and the attack unit of McKinley, Fish and O'Brien began making sharp, precise passes to find the open shooters. The display brought the moderate sized crowd to life on this lazy afternoon and a confused Green team found itself in a tie at 8 goals apiece. But Lady Luck intervened after an injury to McKinley suspended play with five minutes remaining. The delay, followed by a missed penalty shot swung the momentum back to the Hanover invaders. With only 30 ticks of the clock to play, the deciding tally slipped past goalminder Taft. Its record now standing at 3-4, the team concludes the season at Middlebury on Wednesday.

dejected Jeffs took to the doubles where their clay-court games were no match for Williams' controlled power. The no. 1 duo of Goldberg and Whelan, semi-finalists in last weekend's New Englands, played the errorless tennis expected of them in a 6-0, 6-0 win. Perry Nelson and Gianakos won the kind of match where the only thing in doubt is the final score, 6-3, 6-4, while Roach and Bash did it all in winning 6-1, 6-0.

Women's volleyball ends season with four straight wins

The women's varsity volleyball team completed their season with two solid victories at a tri-meet in North Adams on Monday, ending with a winning record of 7 wins and 6 losses.

The squad defeated Union College in two games, 15-9, 16-15. It also beat North Adams State in two games, 15-10, 15-10. The victories were more substantial than the scores at first indicate because Coach Susan Hudson put in all the JV players during these games and in short, it was the Williams JV that defeated the varsity teams of the other two schools.

The volleyball team ended its season with four straight victories—marking the development of a strong and well-coordinated squad. The setting techniques of Leslie Ferguson and Jenny Armstrong were consistent throughout and made it possible for some of the superior spiking demonstrated by the other members of the team. In addition, the serving of Karen Dold and Lisa Marder was consistently outstanding.

The final record does not adequately express the strength of the team explained Coach Susan Hudson. Women's volleyball had a tough schedule. Williams was rated as a Division III team this year yet it played primarily Division I teams against whom it did extraordinarily well. "I was extremely pleased with the team's progress," said Hudson.

Freshmen awarded RECORD promotions

Record editor Scott Fenn has announced the appointment of three associate editors to the paper's staff. Nancy Richman, Ray DeMeo and Stu Massad, all freshmen, have been promoted from staff reporters to associate editors. The appointments are effective immediately.

According to Fenn, DeMeo and Massad will be working in the news department while Richman will be concentrating primarily on arts. He stated that the promotions were based on consistent and high-quality reporting throughout the year. "These appointments are an attempt to get our most promising reporters more heavily involved in the production of the paper," said Fenn. He added, "Getting an associate editorship is usually the first step in moving up the Record hierarchy and brings both more freedom and responsibility."

College's evolution outlined in book

Peter P. Welanetz, director of the college physical plant, has written a section of a new book about college and university facilities.

The recently published book, "Campus Planning and Construction," by Sam F. Brewster, includes an entry by Welanetz entitled "Planning and Construction at Williams College." It describes the evolution and expansion of the college from 1793 to the present, and includes plans for new construction.

The Association of Physical Plant Administrators of Universities and Colleges publishes the book. Welanetz was president of the organization in 1969 and 1975. He has directed the plant at Williams since 1951.

Trackmen go to Easterns

by Frank Carr

A quartet of Williams trackmen travelled to Westfield State College on Saturday for the Eastern Track and Field Championships and finished well back in the field of over 20 teams with a mere trio of team points. Injuries, sickness and other assorted factors reduced the Eph contingent to about one-third of what it has been in recent years.

The only Williams scorer in the large scale meet was senior Ken Leinbach who erased the school mile record with a lifetime best of 4:12.8. He easily captured third place just three seconds behind winner John Savoie from Providence. Leinbach's next race will be at the N.C.A.A. Division III Championships to be held in East Grand Rapids, Michigan on May 27-28.

Junior Larry Tanner made the finals in the hammer throw but finished one place out of the scoring in 6th. His longest heave of the day was 177 feet, just 6" below his school record, and his series of throws was consistently out around 170 feet. Tanner will compete this Saturday in the New Englands at UMass and then join Leinbach for the Nationals in Michigan.

Half-mile specialist Dave Seeger toured the first lap of his qualifying heat on the shoulder of eventual winner Mick O'Shea, but the purple strider's kick was not enough to stay with the Irish Streak, as Seeger missed the finals cut-off with a sixth place conclusion. Seeger ran to a personal best of 1:56.9 and smashed his previous Westfield State track record by one-tenth of a second.

Junior Frank Carr also set a personal record, clipping .8 seconds off his lifetime best in the three mile. Carr's 14:32.0 performance brought him to sixth place among a crowded field of 20 runners.

Leinbach named Athlete of Week

Ken Leinbach, miler on the varsity track team, has been chosen as the Record Athlete of the Week following his excellent performance at the Eastern Track and Field Championships on Saturday. The senior trackmen sprinted to a third place finish in the large scale meet and shattered the Williams outdoor record of 4:16.7, (set by S. H. Orr in 1966) with a lifetime best of 4:12.8. Leinbach's clocking also surpasses the indoor mark of 4:12.9 held by Jay Haug '73, for the fastest mile ever run by a Williams student.

Honorable Mention—Vivian Patterson, senior point on the women's lacrosse team, has been awarded an honorable mention after her selection to the New England College squad.

Crew ends season on upbeat

by David Hitchcock

Last Saturday at Onota Lake in Pittsfield, Williams' heavyweight crew nipped perennial powerhouse Trinity by seven-tenths of a second to win an extremely gutsy and hard fought race. The victory carried an especially satisfying flavor due to the quality of the competition and because it marked the first time a Williams heavyweight boat had beaten Trinity. The Williams lightweights powered past their bewildered Marist and Trinity College opponents to an easy 8 second win. Having an off day in the choppy water, the freshmen fell to Trinity by a length.

The women's heavyweight and lightweight eights apparently rowed well, but were overcome by more experienced Radcliffe crews. Since Radcliffe is currently ranked first in the nation, the results do not really reflect the strength and fine style of the women's boats this year.

Coming off a disastrous debacle with Coast Guard the week before, the men's varsity heavies simply decided they would not be beaten again. Rowing into a moderate headwind that made the 2,000 meter course appear 300 meters longer, the heavies went all out at the start of the race to find themselves ahead by a length over both Trinity and Marist shortly after the 500 meter mark. The strain evidently took its toll as the other two boats slowly crept up to the heavies, whose stroke had slipped to a relatively low 32. Providing the high point of the day for the spectators and a particularly hair-raising moment to coach Brian Dawe, the Williams crew took the stroke up in the last 500 meters to 36 per minute and called a kamikaze sprint, pulling up by three seats on the last 20 strokes, to beat Trinity by a seat. The triumph tasted sweet as Trinity boasted six of the eight men who had won England's prestigious Henley regatta last summer.

There was never any doubt in the lightweight race as they took an early lead, letting the oarsmen comfortably view the competition. From a length lead at the 1,000, the lights leisurely widened the open water. Both Trinity and Marist have top lightweight crews, making Williams a good bet in next week's Dad Vail regatta, generally recognized as the eastern small college championships.

Trinity usually fields several seasoned prep school rowers in their freshman boat. However the Williams freshmen are waiting for another chance at Trinity during the Vail, as they were hampered by several boatstopping crabs (when the oar gets caught in the water). Rowing below their usual standards, the frosh lost to Trinity by a length.

The women's lightweight crew almost beat Radcliffe's second varsity boat, missing by .6 seconds. In the heavyweight division, Radcliffe's first and second boat won by 26 and 13 seconds respectively.

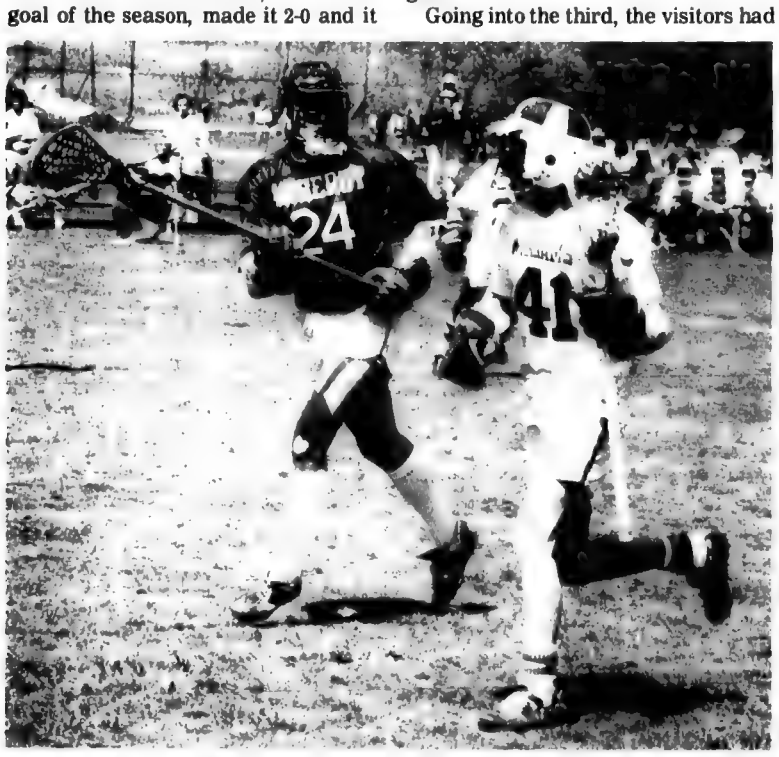
Laxmen crush Amherst, 17-7

by Nancy Rhein

It's all a matter of really wanting it. Coming off an 18-5 loss to Middlebury Wednesday, the men's lacrosse team used Panther like play to get what it really wanted—a smashing 17-7 victory over Amherst and yet another Little Three Crown for Eph mentor Renzi Lamb and senior captain Jamie Taylor. Although the Jeffs sported the superior record and had a better showing against defending NE champ Middlebury, Williams was looking for the win as eight seniors closed out their Cole field careers.



It took but 57 seconds for the team to get rolling as middie Colie Nelson connected for an unassisted tally. Minutes later Bob Hiltzik, in his first goal of the season, made it 2-0 and it was 10 minutes and many Bob Cowin-saves later before the Jeffs got on the board following a sloppy Eph clear. Attackman John Glynn put one in at :41 to give the Ephs a small lead going into the second.

Determined to widen that margin, Todd Eckerson and the midfields fed and fired, scoring five within five minutes. The team's scoring spree was slashed midway through the period, as the squad was faced with a three man disadvantage which resulted in 2 Amherst goals. Eckerson, playing tough, rippled the Jeffs' net, only not the ref's satisfaction as the goal was disallowed. Refusing to give up, Eckerson fed Taylor for a goal.

Going into the third, the visitors had hopes for a few quick goals to start a comeback similar to that which had taken the teams to a double overtime last year. Frosh Glynn scored from Peter Thomsen while Gus Nuzzolese hit for the team's eleventh on a man up play. Max Murray, in one of three excellent goals, tallied at 9 minutes before the game's paced slowed.

Senior goalie Bob Harryman and senior defenders Bob Marquess, Scott MacLachlan, and Carlton Tucker took over in the fourth for their final home action. On offense, Dick Goodbody scored twice and Doug Gill added one, while senior Dave Moffitt connected for Williams' last goal.

The lacrosse team has been invited to compete as the No. 2 seed in the Division II-III ECAC tournament this weekend. The Ephs will meet Tufts (7-5, with losses to Amherst and Wesleyan) Friday at 3 on Cole Field. No. 1 Middlebury will host No. 3 Mass Maritime Friday, with the winner of that match meeting the Tufts-Williams victor on the top seed's home field Saturday.

Women's track sets first season records

Season No. 1 was quite a success for the women's track team. Taking on Middlebury and Amherst in tri-meet action, the Ephwomen grabbed five firsts, with the Panthers and Lady Jeffs taking 4 and 1 top finishes.

Frosh Jane Golay got the team jumping with a 4'6" winning leap in the high jump. Amy Langston tossed the javelin 86'4" for the Eph's second field event win. The running events were the highlight for the squad as Renalda Pierce dashed to a first in the 100 yd. event with Michele Johnson following her in at 12.9 for a second. Frosh Vanessa Blowe picked up a third in the 220 with a 29.5, her season's best. Tricia Beckwith flew to a 63.4 finish in the 440 with Mary Hakala taking charge of the long distance in a 5:35 mile.

Meeting tougher competition, the Ephwomen turned in a determined effort for a third place finish behind Harvard and Dartmouth. Golay's 4'6" earned her third while Beckwith had a second in the 440. In the two mile frosh Debbie Gregg came in third, following her fourth place in the mile. Pat Strong led the Ephs field finish with a fourth in the shot put and a fourth in the javelin.

Track coach Sue Hudson said she was pleased with the team's performance this season as many team members showed great improvement as newcomers to the sport. Hudson and her crew hope to fare even better next year with an expanded roster and schedule.

Ephs keep tennis crown after smashing Jeffs

by Evan Bush

For a while things weren't going quite as they were supposed to last Saturday. There was Williams, the heavy favorite to retain the Little Three tennis title for the fifth consecutive year, deadlocked at 2-2 with a mediocre, albeit scrappy, Amherst team. But, as that old fellow Anonymous once said, "When the going gets tough, the tough gets going." For the Ephs then reeled off five consecutive wins for a 7-2 victory which, when combined with an earlier 9-0 trouncing of Wesleyan, keeps the Little Three crown in the heart of the Berkshires for yet another year.

The win, Coach Dave Johnson's first ever on the Amherst Courts as a player or coach, was Williams' fifth against five losses and marks the first time this season they have reached the .500 plateau. Only today's match against tough Colgate remains on the schedule.

Amherst came out smoking in the singles matches, showing as little respect for the champion as did Rocky. Leading the Ephs once again was no. 1 Martin Goldberg who recorded his sixth straight win 7-5, 6-0. Dean Gianakos at no. 6 showed why he's a master of Har-Tru courts as he frolicked to a 6-2, 6-1 win. Williams trouble came in the middle of the lineup, as no. 4 Tad Roach lost only his third match of the year 6-2, 6-0 and no. 5 Bill Whelan was slowed by the Har-Tru to a 6-3, 6-2 defeat. The real crusher to Amherst's hopes, however, came with the score tied at 2-2 and Jim Parsons (no. 2) and Evan Bash (no. 3) involved in three set matches. Bash put the Ephs in front to stay with a come from behind 3-6, 6-0, 6-4 victory and Parsons followed soon after with a nifty 6-7, (5-4 in the tie-breaker) 6-2, 6-3 performance.

The nails were now all but hammered in Amherst's coffin as the

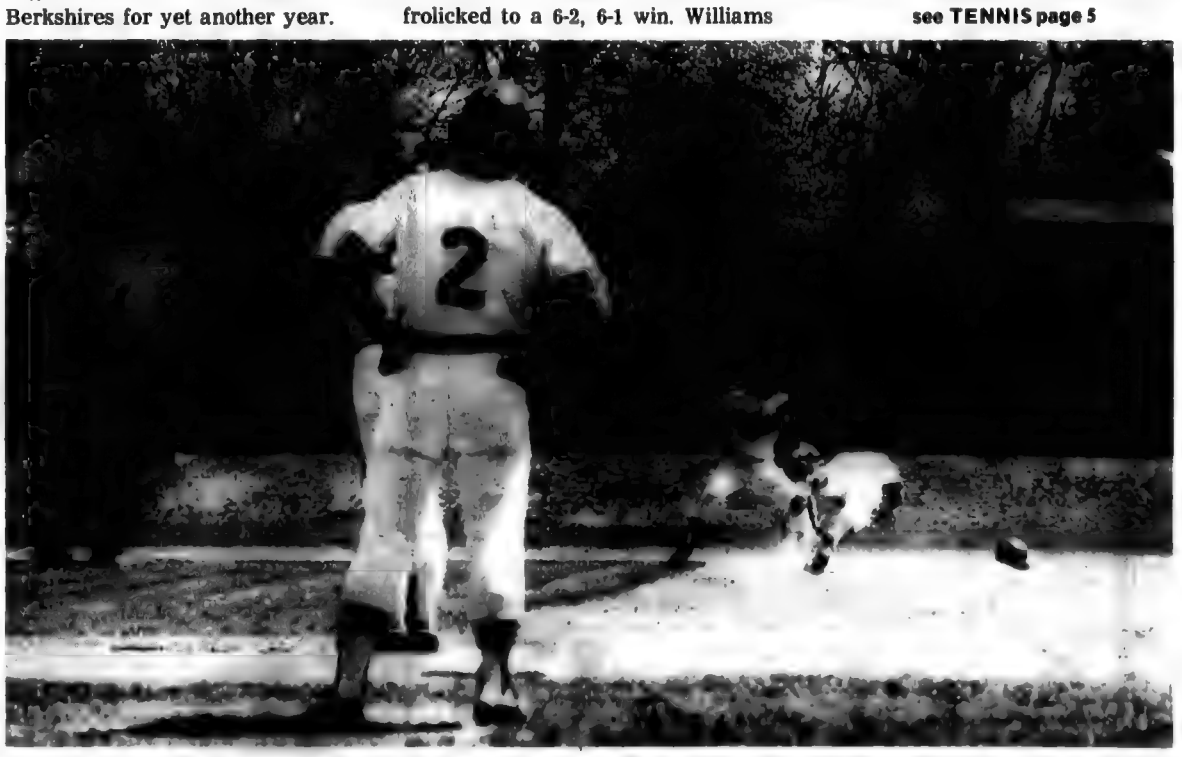
The dam broke Saturday afternoon on Weston Field as Bill Swiacki, Jerry Seppa, and company pounded out a total of 28 hits, scoring 31 runs and taking away any hopes the Ephmen had of salvaging their season with a Little Three title. The Williams slate now stands at 6-9, as the Ephs have suffered defeat in their last eight games.

The first game saw Williams score two runs in the third inning, to take a lead that lasted until the fifth. Two errors by Amherst, including one where Ken Hollingsworth knocked the ball loose from catcher Paul Harasimowicz on a play at the plate, helped Williams score.



Starter Steve Maier had looked strong through the first four innings but in the fifth, Amherst belted five hits and sandwiched in a couple of sacrifices to score four runs and take a 4-2 lead. They scored two more in the sixth on Bob Sternberg's homerun to right center field and three more in the seventh.

Amherst pitcher Bill Swiacki was having little problem with the Williams hitters, yielding only two hits. Williams scored once in the seventh to make the final 9-3.

In the nightcap Williams again took the early lead scoring a run in the first as Scott Harrington walked, went to second on a passed ball, stole third, and scored on a passed ball.

Williams pitcher Tony Stall had also looked strong for the first two innings. Then, in the third, Stall walked three men and Amherst rapped three base hits to score four runs and jump out to a lead that was never seriously threatened. They scored three runs in the fifth, seven in the sixth, one in the seventh, two in the eighth and five in the ninth. Williams got as close as 7-4 when Frank Kreutz hit a three run homer to left center field, about the only bright spot on the day for Williams.

Wednesday Williams traveled to Middlebury and bowed to the Panthers, 3-0. Tom Albert was the losing pitcher. The Ephmen finish out the season Saturday with a doubleheader against Wesleyan at Middletown.

United Nations ambassador Andrew Young

Social scientist David Riesman

Young, Reisman to deliver addresses at commencement

U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Andrew Young will give the Baccalaureate address and social scientist David Riesman will deliver the Commencement address at graduation ceremonies this June. Young will speak in Chapin at 5:15 p.m. on June 4, and Riesman will speak at 4:30 p.m. in Mission Park on June 5.

President Jimmy Carter appointed Young Ambassador to the UN on January 30, 1977. Since that time, Young has represented the United States on several trips to southern Africa and other parts of the world. He has aroused considerable controversy in recent months by comments he has made on ambassadorial missions.

Riesman has done several studies of the higher education system in America. In 1950 he published what he calls "a psychoanalytic study of society," A Lonely Crowd. He co-authored The Academic Revolution in 1968, an account of the development of American colleges and universities.

He has also published several other works on alternatives for higher education, and is an advocate of "competence-based education," which determines a student's aptitude according to practical experience rather than through examinations and grading systems.

Riesman is currently involved with curricular revision at Harvard, is a member of the Task Force on College Life, and is director of a graduate seminar on higher education.

Young rose to prominence in the 1960's as a close associate of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and a leader of the civil rights movement. He was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives from Georgia in 1972, the first black Congressman from Georgia in 101 years.

In Congress, Young was a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, the Democratic Study Group and the Environmental Study Conference.

Young is a graduate of Howard University and the Hartford Theological Seminary, and is an ordained minister of the United Church of Christ. He currently serves as an official of the National Council of Churches.

Buda Bear brings trivia!

Two a.m. The minutes drag wearily on as words click monotonously out of the typewriter. There is no end in sight. A classic all-nighter. Unless . . .

You guessed it. Unless it's trivia night, the most celebrated all-nighter of all time. Buda Bear, taker of top honors in last semester's contest, will be in charge of the evening's festivities.

by Special Correspondent James D. Nail

All the available manpower of Buda has been at work scouring the Six Great Realms of Trivia: TV, Movies, Comics, Sports, Advertising, and Miscellany. The semester-long process of choosing questions has just recently been completed and the team is confident that the megatonnage generated will take participants back to the days of Dick Van Dyke, In-A-Gadda-Da-Vida and Great Caesar's Ghost faster than a pair of P. F. Flyers.

A short stop will be made in those days of study halls and hall passes, college applications and the S.A.T.'s. The third hour bonus will make participants sweat again as they see the once-forgotten circles (to be filled in with No. 2 pencil only) and the sealed question booklet of the Trivia Contest Admissions Test. Scores from 200 to 800 will be awarded for trivial achievement.

The challenge round will also be from the days of driver's education and "It's Academic." Teams will be asked to submit questions to Buda Central where they will be screened for megatonnage and placed in numbered envelopes. When Buda calls a team, the team will request an envelope and Buda will ask them the question. If they are stumped, the team which submitted the question will receive the points; if the team answering the question shows their collectively trivial minds to be unstumpable, they will, of course, receive the points.

Buda Bear has been a power in trivia for over two and one half years. Their meteoric rise to the heights of triviality began in the fall of 1974 when as freshmen and rookie trivia-ists they placed fifth. Showing the consistent strength necessary for a good team, they also placed fifth in the following spring, both semesters ranking as the top freshman team. These early efforts were based in Morgan Hall where Buda, dorm mascot, guided the team. These two strong showings marked the team as one to watch in following contests.

And Buda continued its ascent; the fall of 1975 saw them rise to third, the following spring they rose to second, behind the always trivially powerful Bomo. Last fall they were not to be denied again.

What team will earn the title "Most Trivial Minds on Campus"? All that remains is the waiting.

Council creates committees; clamps down on club funds

The College Council allocated $2,600 of its 1977-78 budget to finance a Fall ACEC concert, and accepted proposed formats for two committees to parallel the activities of the CUL and the CEP.

ACEC Chairman Steve Case announced plans Tuesday night to hold a concert featuring a "new, up-and-coming type of group," sometime during the month of September. He estimated total cost for the event in the range of $5,000, including $3,500 for the lead group and $500 for a warmup band. Case specified that the event would be a rock concert, but did not indicate possible artists that might be available. Council President Tom Herwitz submitted a motion to establish the Student Life a id Student Education Committees, paralleling the CUL and CEP, respectively. The committees are designed to "allow for further discussion of major problems" confronting the CUL and CEP. Herwitz added that they would enable the members of the student-faculty committees to "look at problems without being swayed by faculty viewpoints."

By a narrow margin, the Council voted to require student organizations to place all of their funds in the business office. Business Manager Shane Riorden originally proposed the change in the interest of improving bookkeeping procedures. The College will provide organizations with all the interest accrued on their accounts.

Trustees add two

Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis last month approved an amendment to the College Laws authorizing an increase in the size of the Board of Trustees from twenty to twenty-two members, according to Francis H. Dewey III, Treasurer of the College and secretary to the Board. The move was intended primarily to facilitate the appointment of more women.

The two newly created vacancies will be filled by term trustees, who are appointed for three years. The Board currently has three term trustees, five alumni trustees who serve for five years, the remaining members being designated permanent trustees and appointed for fifteen years.

Under the present arrangement, women have been excluded mainly because of the scarcity of vacant positions. Two women serve on the Board at present. The new openings will hopefully provide a more balanced and representative Board in the future.

Dewey said that possible candidates to fill the places will be considered between now and June when the new appointments will be announced. The nominating process is informal and trustees may recommend anyone whom they believe is qualified, he added. Not all of the available places however, need be filled. Dewey said he expects at least one woman to be appointed.

485 freshmen join the class of 1981 men/women-1.15

Four hundred eighty-five applicants have accepted admission to the Class of 1981, according to Admissions Director Philip Smith. He expects a class of about 475-480 next year after allowing for a small reduction over the summer.

According to Smith, 259 men and 226 women will enter Williams next year. The difference is due to the excess of applications by men over the applications by women. This reflects a nationwide trend, he said. Although admissions is sex-blind, a higher percentage of women applicants than men were accepted.

Most of the students Williams accepted and lost who went to Ivy League colleges such as Harvard, Yale and Princeton, said Smith.

No change in housing arrangements will be necessary to accommodate the Class of 1981, although the rooms in Currier which were used for this year's freshman class will not be needed next year. This is just a return to normal procedure, said Smith.

No entries will have to be changed from male-occupied to female-occupied, since adjustment of basement rooms in Fayerweather and Lehman can accommodate a swing of 10-15 students either way, according to Smith.

The Class of 1981 is smaller than the Class of 1980 was at the same time last year. Smith attributed this to the reduction of acceptances by the College from 1015 to 909. He could not say whether this lower level of acceptances would be maintained, citing applicant pool characteristics as the deciding factor in determining policy.

Eighteen applicants remain on the waiting list for the summer and will be contacted if too many of the already accepted applicants go elsewhere.

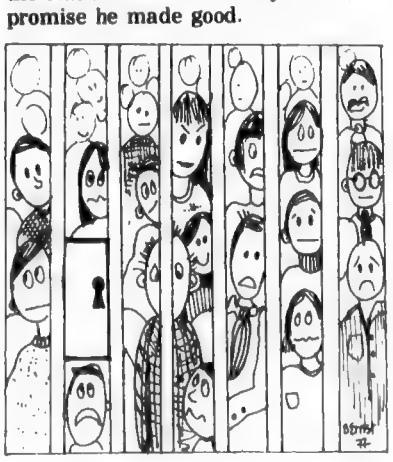
Seabrook: The nights Randolph spent in jail

"The main thing is the crowding. There's no privacy," said Dave Randolph '79, describing conditions at the Concord armory in New Hampshire. Randolph is being held for his participation in the "occupation" of the Seabrook nuclear power plant construction site on May 1. He is being held in lieu of $100 bail on a charge of criminal trespassing, a misdemeanor.

Randolph says he will stay in jail "until they let us all out on general personal recognizance." Protesters arrested along with Randolph at the demonstration to stop construction of the $2 billion atomic facility are refusing bails of $100 to $500 in a gesture termed "bail solidarity," which they hope will force the state of New Hampshire to release all of them on personal recognizance. According to the National Guard, it is costing the state nearly $20,000 a day to keep the prisoners locked up in four National Guard armories around the state, and the cost has forced New Hampshire governor Meldrim Thomson to ask corporation and union help in paying for it. Of 1,414 protesters arrested, 737 were still in jail last Tuesday.

Randolph is also awaiting the outcome of two American Civil Liberties Union suites charging that the armory jails are "cruel and inhuman" because they are grossly overcrowded and that the arrests and bonds being set are illegal.

Two other Williams students, Paul Schneider '77 and Ross McConnell '80, also took part in the protest. McConnell says he left when police and National Guardsmen moved in to make arrests Sunday afternoon (May 1). Schneider was arrested, but bailed himself out to return and finish a senior thesis.



An alliance of environmental and antinuclear groups calling itself the Clamshell (for the damage thermal pollution from Seabrook was expected to cause the Seabrook clam flats) began planning the "occupation" last October and kept the New Hampshire state government informed of their plans all the way through. An earlier occupation of the construction site last August drew about 180 people. Sunday's drew an estimated 2000. In the event of another occupation (which is probable according to Clamshell organizers) Randolph and McConnell said they would return, while Schneider said it would depend on the circumstances.

The issues surrounding the nuclear facility go beyond the dangers of nuclear power, although these were prominent in the protesters' reasons. In addition, however, a town referendum had opposed the plant, but the local edict was overturned by a two to one vote of the state licensing commission, which gave the Public Service Corporation of New Hampshire to go-ahead on construction.

The EPA subsequently stopped construction when they learned that the plant had a woefully inadequate cooling system that would in effect be pumping hot water into the ocean.

Clamshell's preparation for the occupation included training sessions in non-violence, which Randolph and Schneider attended. Clamshell sought to prevent any confrontations with the police and Governor Meldrim Thomson and keep the focus of the protest on nuclear power. Damage to Nonetheless, Thomson branded the demonstrations as a "cover for terrorists" and threatened to call out the National Guard if they came, a promise he made good.

The following account of the protest and the arrests was put together from accounts of the Williams students there.

Protesters arrived Saturday, April 30 with tents and supplies for 4 days. Police stood by and moved fences to let demonstrators onto the site. Roughly 2000 people came, mostly young, but a considerable number of professional people as well. The protesters had previously been divided up into "affinity groups" of 20-30 members. Each group had a representative on the central council which made decisions for the demonstrators.

On Sunday at around 3:30 the state police told protesters in effect that their "day of fun was over" and that they had half an hour to either leave or face arrest. Almost all chose to stay and arrests began at around 3:45 p.m. and did not end until Monday morning.

Schneider was finally arrested at 4:30 Monday morning, and Randolph not until 5:45 a.m.

When police announced that arrests were going to be made most protesters gathered their things together and went over to busses waiting to take them to a National Guard armory in Portsmouth. Many, however, chose to "non-cooperate" and went limp when police ap-

Behind the Scene

Journalism is a team sport. While many of the people who have made the publication of fifty-four issues of the Record possible this year have been singled out either in by-lines or in the masthead, certain individuals crucial to our existence have served in undeserved anonymity. We take this opportunity to thank these people for service above and beyond the call of duty:

The Girls at Lamb Printing—who work miracles in five minutes and put this thing together with only an occasional disaster.

The Guys at Lamb Printing—who are always jealous when we only mention the girls and who display a sense of humor that makes going to Lamb's after guest meal an indescribable joy.

R. Cragin Lewis and the Alumni Office—who get our issues mailed out to subscribers like clockwork.

Charlotte Marlowe—who insured that our cartloads of mail were sorted and who tolerated our visits in search of more mail.

College Administrators—who gave of their valuable time to engage in informative cat and mouse conversations and who answered our questions with remarkably little effort to influence the tone of articles.

The Baxter Hall Custodians—who had to live with our messy office despite their noble efforts to keep it clean.

The News Office—who fed us reams of news releases with nice purple letterheads that can be found even in our messy office.

Our Readers—who praised us, cursed us, were moved by us, were bored by us, and above all who gave us a raison d'etre. For you, we humbly try again next fall. Now it's summer . . .

Record gives kudos to outstanding staff

Record editor Scott Fenn announced the selection of seven Record staff members to receive awards for excellence in work on the newspaper. The awards will be presented tonight at the Record's annual banquet.

Nancy Richman '80 will be named best news writer; Peter Rintels '79, best features writer; Hans Oettgen '80, best photographer; and Dennis O'Shea '77, best sports writer.

Andy O'Donnell '77, Bill Dahling '78 and Keron Walker '80 will receive special recognition for contributions throughout the year.

Former Record editors George Schutzer and David Ross, both seniors, are scheduled to be the keynote speakers at the banquet and will be cited for their numerous contributions to the paper.

In reviewing the year, Fenn stressed the consistency of the paper's publication and the establishment of a dedicated core of talented young writers as the greatest causes for celebration. He lamented the relative isolation of the Record from important issues in the outside world as perhaps the paper's greatest weakness.

According to Fenn, no changes are expected in the editorial staff for next fall.

Letters urge talking, walking

Static racism

To the editor:

I have seen people playing some strange games since I have been at Williams College . . . very strange. Perhaps I consider them strange because of my cultural bias. Or just as likely, this racial frisbee we've been tossing is a strange game. For a lot of people in this country racism is not a myth, an academic problem or a game. It's a hurting thing. So I'm asking the players to either stop playing and be serious or go back and study the question right out of their minds. After all, finals are around the corner.

Now, if anyone has the time to be serious, I have some serious questions to ask. Who presided at the divorce of individuals and institutions? When did individuals and institutions become such separate entities? Isn't racism a very institutional process? Isn't that why in the last few decades black Americans have witnessed a dramatic increase in the number of white liberals while their relative socioeconomic status has dramatically declined? I don't suppose that many of the politicians, business executives, generals or educators who keep the lids down ever call black folks "niggers" to their faces.

Many blacks, as well as whites, are mystified by institutional racism. The majority of the people who keep us in our places never threw bricks at our heads or unleashed dogs on us. Black children growing up on the Harlem reservation rarely if ever interact with the people who keep them there. Those people live in another world, behind high-walled institutional barriers that obscure any concept of blame. The situation just is. No one is to blame. One day those black children stop blaming themselves . . .

That is the day they realize that their oppressors need not show or even feel any hatred for them to keep them in their places. Those accursed forefathers have already etched, gouged out the lines of power along the color line. Little else remains to be done except to keep the institutions running as they always have. The oppressor just keeps zoning his cities the way he always has, investing his capital the way he always has, hiring his workers the way he always has to keep oppression alive. John Dunn, average easy-going family man who never hurt a fly and Joe Doe, whose neck turns bright red every time he sees another human being with a trace of color in his or her skin, do the same job. They do the same job by doing nothing except maintaining the status quo. Institutions remove from them both the burden of feeling any responsibility for the injustices perpetrated by their society. In fact, John and Joe rarely think about black people at all except when there appears to be a leak in the institutional barriers.

Black people's focus must be institutional because institutions have power. It is heartening for me to know that great masses of white individuals do not have to be converted to a more humane way of thinking for meaningful changes to come about in this society. If a few individuals whose names are synonymous with power could be pressured into changing their ways of dealing or not dealing with racial issues, the concordance of large numbers of individuals would follow. Black Americans understand that the moral evolution of white people has little to do with the way we live. We cannot be concerned with the amount of genuine affection the upper-class white housewife has for her black maid, but must marshal our energies to challenge the social sanctions that guaranteed that the white women would never end up in the black one's kitchen. We must work for institutional reforms that will spark white individuals out of their complacency into serious soul searching.

What am I?

To the editor:

This letter is not about racism. I'll pause here a moment to give the reader time for a sigh of relief.

I would just like to inquire of your frequent contributors to Viewpoint and the letters page whether there is any crime against humanity that I as a Williams student am not guilty of. I know I can rule out materialism, racism, selfishness, snobbery, and possibly friendliness. I need to know for my grad school applications.

Thanks,
Peter Rintels '79

Needless driving

To the editor:

This letter is directed to all students, faculty, staff, and anyone else who drives a car or knows anyone who does. As I look around this campus on an average day I am dismayed by the amount of unnecessary driving. We are faced with a genuine energy crisis and the singlemost area that needs to be reduced is gasoline consumption. Too many students drive needlessly to class, from Mission Park to Greylock, to Hopkins, Spring Street, Cole Field and everywhere else. We have become so pampered with our automobiles that we drive everywhere. It's logical; it's so easy. We have come to think nothing of jumping into a car to visit a friend, pick up one or two needed items, or simply to drive around. We are presented in this country with the inescapable fact that energy reserves are limited and that the more we use now the less there will be later to be spread around among more people, industries, and homes.

I urge people to carefully examine their driving habits. Walk when possible; it is good for you and your wallet. For those of you who do not drive very much, I urge you to bother and pester your friends and family to change their driving habits because the energy shortages are affecting you also.

As summer approaches and we spread out across the country, I feel that it is especially important that everyone become concerned and make a real effort to conserve energy. Summer provides a real temptation for lots of driving. DON'T. Cut down your driving by walking, bicycling, or using mass transit when possible. The best way to get Federal, State, and local officials to approve funds for new mass transit programs is to show them that there is a real and steady demand for mass transit. It will require an effort and a change in life styles but as the situation exists now, we are driving ourselves into a real crisis with our pampered habits and life style.

Sincerely,
Ken Albrecht '79

Straight talk

To the editor:

Enough is enough!! For weeks we have been reading of "racism" to no end. The result has been countless, but fruitless discussions. We can solve nothing by attaching emotional labels and generalizing what, if it exists, is a serious problem. Talk about "racism" is useless. Constructive talk about just what it is that is wrong about race relations at Williams might get us somewhere. We will all agree that something is wrong. Yet, why attach blame, when we have not yet defined the problem? Personalities, society, the environment, institutions about us may all be contributing factors, but if anything is to be done we must focus on the problem. The problem isn't "racism", but it may be the perception of "racism" in certain situations (or even all situations). We must discover which ones. Emotional appeals lead nowhere, especially with an issue like this. If there is a problem, and there is, worth talking about, then let's talk about it not around it. For everyone's sake.

Council selects new committees

The proposal ran into serious opposition from several Council members, including Don Toumey, who worried that organizations would face substantial delay in obtaining needed finances if they were forced to deal through the business office. Assistant Dean Ellen Julien commented, "I don't see the need for this kind of control over organizations." Treasurer Harry Kelly, however, contended that the proposal was necessary from an organizational standpoint. "It's difficult for us to keep track of money kept in different accounts in different places," he said.

The parallel committees consist of all the members of the CUL and CEP and an equal number student representatives chosen by self-nomination. Several council members contended that the number of CUL and CEP members on the committee should be reduced, including Jim Parsons, who felt that they would present "quite a large front of influence." Herwitz disagreed, pointing out that since the major purpose of the committees is to "expose student representatives to student viewpoints," reducing the number of representatives would "defeat the whole purpose of the committees."

The end of a beginning — how did it all go?

by Rajendra S. Khadka

Yes, it is all over now. So how did it all go? I am sure you learned a lot. If you did not, something is wrong. Maybe you can't handle the job next year. You must admit that now you understand what Zarathrustra really said or why he said those things. Or perhaps you can now decently analyze the death of love or love of death in contemporary fiction. Or how about religion. Were you born again?? Come on, you must have learned something. After all, one year or so of intense academic work that demands dedication and commitment; and after all, we are all intelligent. Perhaps you are not 'the academic type. Who needs Hemingway or Plato or Organic Chemistry, right? Right on! One more sucker. I'll recite a requiem for you in some distant future. Title: Let Us Now Praise Those Who Didn't Make It After All—Don't Blame Us!

Did you fall in love? Did you fall out of love? Did you just make love? Did you even learn to love—or lose? None of these? Jesue kid! Think twice before you decide to come back to school next year. Wait! Perhaps there is hope after all. Did you learn to throw the frisbee? Yes, that's it! By God! You must have learned to throw the goddamned frisbee if nothing else. What is that? Oh, you don't believe in UFO sport. Gee, that is too bad. For a moment I thought you did make it after all and I really thought you had some chance. So you didn't know what the hell was going on inside the classes and what was going on outside the classes. You are a lost case, if I may pronounce a judgment upon you. Strictly student criteria, you understand. Maybe the administration will think otherwise, although your academic record is not promising at all, to say the least.

But hang on. I just thought of something. Yes, kid, if you get this, you will pass with flying colors. Yes, I am talking about that weird-looking cigarette—no it is not a Mexican cigar—with the pernicious smell. By your description of that 'thing' I can already see that you are headed for disaster. You mean you did not get high at all? No, I understand you are a down-to-earth personality, but still . . . It seems there is nothing to tell your folks back home after all, huh? Oh, you will invent stories and give the usual bull like in your papers at Williams?? But friends are harder to elude than pedantic professors, you know.

How about friends? Surely you met some terrific characters. They all disliked you? Damn? There must be at least one person who can at least tolerate you, what do you say? For example, the guy I saw you playing pool with. Surely . . . Oh, you guys don't talk at all while playing, and you still don't know what his middle initial stands for. But that really is not very important is it? You really don't know anyone, huh? That is profound, kid You have potential, it seems. Perhaps you should become extremist—conservative or leftist. Start something like "Right On, Nixon Party," or "Ban Nixon Party." I am sure in this manner by becoming committed to a profound cause you will meet people and have a responsibility to bear. It is also a good way to get into politics and rip people off later on in your life, not to mention fringe benefits like free trips abroad, fact finding trips, and exotic gifts like elephants and giraffes and necklaces for your daughter and wife and mistresses. "You are what you make out of your life," courtesy of Salada tea bag served in Baxter hall and elsewhere. Salada tea philosophy must have taught you something!

Think hard. You mean to tell me that you really learned nothing. Listen, that is gonna be a hard blow to your parents who are chucking out six grand and more just so you can learn something. Imagine their shock (heart attack!) when you go home and tell them that they sweated in their air-conditioned offices somewhere in the concrete jungles of the American metropolis for nothing!

What, oh, you did pick up some titbits. Like what? Yoga and TM. Listen, that is no good. I mean, what the hell are you gonna do with TM? Pack your bags and hit the road to join the freaks in the Himalayas. And let me tell you, life there is even more rough.

How about something more concrete? For example, let us see, yeah, skiing? Did you ever learn to ski. Feel that wind rushing past your face and feel all flushed at the end of the run? And if you ever make it to Switzerland, you can ski on the Alps and maybe run into the Shah of Iran or others.

How about writing poetry and drinking wine and feeling melancholy. That sounds like a sure disaster, but let me tell you, there is a future, although precarious, I will admit, but future nevertheless. Big money and hob nobing with the who's-what-where-and-why-and-how-come folks. So think about that. And a guy like you has the natural looks of a disillusioned poet, no, "artist" is the word. So fake it, if you can't make it. Just look melancholic, drink cheap wine, read Walt Whitman, Keats and write insignificant things that look significant and promising, avant gardish. Think it over!

". . . I'm only faking it
I'm not really making it . . ."

ACEC reacts to students

by Steve Case,
ACEC Chairman

The response to the ACEC questionnaire was phenomenal, and although we don't yet have the final results, I'd like to take this opportunity to respond to some of the questions and comments of various students.

1) "Musical tastes of students at Williams are so diverse that you can't please everyone, which is why I think it would be better for you to have 6 or 7 concerts with lesser-known artists or groups. That way, you're bound to hit something for everyone." If everyone had this attitude, the ACEC would be the most popular organization on campus. The problem, of course, is that a lot of people don't, and until they accept it the ACEC is going to have problems.

2) "The Winter jazz series should be dropped." Preliminary findings of the ACEC survey indicate that jazz is not as popular at Williams as we thought. As a result, it is likely that the jazz series will be dropped. (Suffice to say, there will still be at least one jazz concert per year, but it will be treated like any other ACEC event.)

3) "We can have good talent as it breaks out onto the national scene if we keep our eyes, ears, and minds open." I agree wholeheartedly, and that's precisely the policy which next year's ACEC will be working under. We'll be looking for new talent, and we hope students will be receptive.

4) "You should put concerts in different places then Chapin, such as the hockey rink." There are very few places on campus which are viable for concerts. We're exploring the possibilities, but I doubt we'll use the hockey rink, because of the horrid acoustics.

5) "Before finalizing any agreement with a performing group, you should obtain some feedback from the student body concerning the interest in the group." A provision of the new ACEC rules requires that the College Council approve a list of possible groups before the ACEC can even submit bids. We'd also like to conduct surveys, and will when possible. The problem is the time restraints under which we operate—often we have to get back to an agent within 24 hours to tell him if we want the group or not.

6) "There should be more entertainment for blacks." If we have a number of concerts (say six or seven), one will undoubtedly be in the soul-disco vein. Otherwise, we will be unable to fill this need, because the survey indicated that it was not a particularly popular musical form. Needless to say, we'd like to please as many people as possible, and we recognize the desires of all students.

7) "Try to get more funding from the College Council." We have been allocated $2600 for a September concert. If the attendance at that concert (which is tentatively set for Friday the 16th) is high, and the response is positive, the Council would be likely to increase funds. If that first concert flops, the ACEC is in jeopardy.

8) "Try to satisfy as wide a range of musical tastes as possible throughout the course of the year." That's our goal, and if the student body supports us, it will be realized.

9) "Don't give any credence to turkeys who refuse to hear new music from up-and-coming groups." Because every student pays for the ACEC through the student activity tax, we try to give credence to everybody, regardless of their musical tastes.

10) "The ACEC has lacked sound financial management in the past. This should be improved." A paid student business manager will be hired at the beginning of next year to handle ACEC finances.

I was pleased with the response to the questionnaire, but I hope that it doesn't stop there. The ACEC wants to hear your ideas, complaints, suggestions, and questions throughout the year.

So long, Coach Johnson

How many people in this day and age wear antiquated "Don Budge" long white tennis pants? If you've ever been to the squash or tennis courts you'll know that's the way in which coach Johnson distinguishes himself from his players. Dave's youthful appearance has attracted many young ladies to racquet sports and has broken an equal number of young hearts upon their discovering that he was a married coach. Having disguised himself as an excellent squash and tennis player during his undergraduate years at Williams, coach Dave Johnson returned to the College in the fall of 1975 to substitute for Sean Sloane who left on a two year sabbatical. Upon arriving at Williams, Dave faced the difficult challenge of introducing his "system" to a group of veteran players.

There are many qualities which make Dave a highly respected and well-liked coach. First and foremost, Dave cares about his players as individuals. He displays an equal amount of respect and concern for them regardless of their ability. The nature of individual competition inherent in racquet sports requires a coach to be especially sensitive to the psychological state of his players. Dave both perceives and identifies with the problems often faced in competition. His capacity for understanding is continued off the court as well. Players never hesitate to come to him with their problems knowing that he will be both open and helpful.

Although squash and tennis are individual sports, coach Johnson has been able to instill a vital spirit of unity among his players that contributes both to the comraderie and success of his teams. With this unity has come a healthy competitive attitude as well as an enhanced enjoyment of sports. Dave views his players as a reflection on both Williams and himself and therefore will not tolerate ungentlemanly conduct in competition. All of these qualities have resulted in four seasons of successful "class" teams.

During his tenure at Williams Dave has led both a squash and tennis team to their most outstanding seasons in recent Williams history. His 1976 tennis team proved to be the top small college squad in New England, while the 1976-77 squash team was ranked fourth in the country. In his brief two years Dave has certainly gained the respect of his coaching colleagues.

All of us who have worked with Dave will sincerely miss his warm and considerate personality. The bonds of friendship we have formed with him will transcend our years at Williams. We wish him the best in the future.

They Write by Night

Adieu!

EDITOR'S NOTE—Tony Spaeth did not submit a completed column to the RECORD for publication this week. He apparently decided that he didn't want to go out with a bang. The following notes were found in Tony's RECORD mailbox, however, and are undoubtedly the work of the master himself. We humbly offer them up for public scrutiny in order to get the last laugh on a columnist who has inspired and mocked us all.

This is my last report on the campus scene. I had intended to fade away quietly and with dignity, and not to write any more columns. I was banking on the adage, "How soon they forget." But there are still several friends of mine who insist on being mentioned in at least one issue of THE RECORD, and I find myself involved in a ludicrous feud with Paul Stupin of WCFM's PAUL STUPIN HOUR, and cannot resist a few jabs. It irritates me that he will get the last, squeaky-pitched word.

Don Taylor, the chameleon-like MEMBER of Garfield house, has started paying dues to the snack bar. He is frequently seen in one of the booths along the South-side window, his head thrown back in laughter. Most often he is alone. Let that be a lesson to all of my parasitic friends who want mention in these pages. Jackasses!

Everyone is buzzing with the newest campus trend. It seems that you just can't go anywhere without hearing someone doing a Paul Stupin imitation. Any mention of the word "precipitation" (or even "rain" to the less discriminating mimics) will elicit loud shouts of "LOVE THAT WORD!!" And across campus everyone is humming hilarious send-ups of various Gordon Lightfoot tunes.

The prices at Colonial's are higher than those at The Pizza House. Bear in mind that they have identical menus, are thirty yards apart, and are run by the same Za Czar. We suspect some sort of translation problems; or perhaps . . .

Also, Kevin, the boy who works there, is no longer Kevin. He is now Albert. Oh boy oh boy oh boy.

A few words on The Record.

Clamshell Alliance strikes Seabrook

proached. According to Randolph's account, many of these people were dragged roughly off the site while in other cases, police would bend the protester's wrist into his arm until he came voluntarily.

In the armory where arrests were being made, much of what went on "seemed without coherent legal pattern," according to a New York Times report. Recounted Schneider, "The judicial system is a farce. Some people were being released immediately on personal recognizance, others are still being held." (As time wore, the arresting judges began releasing New Hampshire residents on personal recognizance. Those that refused it were shoved out of the courtroom and released, according to the Times. The Times also reported that different judges were routinely setting bond at $100 and $250) Schneider summed up the experience as "frustrating." Randolph deemed it "brutal."

In a telephone interview with the Record on Sunday, Randolph described conditions at the Concord armory as "crowded." "There is no privacy," he said. ACLU lawyers filed suit in Federal court last Monday seeking release of the prisoners on the grounds that the overcrowding was "cruel and inhuman." As of Wednesday, the suit was still pending.

Randolph has joined many other prisoners in a fast protesting his treatment by the legal system. "We are not criminals," he said, adding that "Laws of private property are absurd when you're talking about nuclear power."

Spirits among the prisoners are high and relations with the guards are cordial. Originally the state had manned guards from talking with prisoners, but this rapidly broke down, said Randolph, and now guards will occasionally join in with prisoner's songs, according to Randolph.

At this writing no one is sure when Randolph and the other protesters are going to be released. Originally, trial dates had extended into November. A member of Core Support, an arm of Clamshell keeping track of persons arrested in the demonstration, was asked if this meant people might be held until then, and replied, "If Meldrin Thomson is as much of a scumbag as people around here think he is, it's possible." Because of the cost of holding the prisoners, however, trials are being pushed up.

People who had been tried already have gotten sentences of from 15 days and $100 fine to 120 days.

Randolph's status when he returns to campus is uncertain, according to Dean Cris Roosenraad. He said that a call from the Record on Monday was the first he had heard about a student being in jail. He also said that there is college policy on such cases and that Randolph's disposition would be a matter for the CAS. Roosenraad himself, however, appealed unsympathetic, saying that "he (Randolph) had made a decision about how he feels his time should be spent." Randolph, while recognizing the possibility of failing his courses, said that "this (the protest) is much more important."

Robert Starer composed Quartet which premieres at Music In The Round tonight at 8:30 in Thompson Memorial Chapel.

Starer's quartet premieres tonight

A Quartet by Robert Starer, commissioned for Music in the Round by Peter Kermani of Albany, N.Y. and The Starr-Danforth Fund of the Williams Music Department, will be premiered at Music in the Round's final concert of the season, tonight at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The work, composed for piano quartet, will be performed by Julius Hegyi, violin; Susan St. Amour, viola; Douglas Moore, cello; and Charlotte Hegyi, piano.

Starer, a noted American composer, was born in Vienna on January 8, 1924. He began playing the piano at the age of four and was accepted at the State Academy of Music at the age of thirteen. In 1938, soon after the German annexation of Austria, he left Vienna, and continued his studies at the Jerusalem Conservatoire of Music. In 1947, Starer came to the United States on a post-graduate scholarship from the Juilliard School of Music, and has been living in New York City since then, becoming an American citizen in 1957.

Among Starer's prizes and awards are two Guggenheim Fellowships and a Fulbright post-doctoral research grant. His symphonic works have been performed by major orchestras throughout the world under such eminent conductors as Mitropoulos, Bernstein, Steinberg, and Leinsdorf. His commissions include ballets for CBS Television, National Educational Television, "the "Dybbuk" for Herbert Ross, and "Secular Games," "Samson Agonistes" and "Phaedra" for Martha Graham, as well as an opera in three acts, "Pantagleize," based on Michel de Ghelderode's play. More than seventy of his compositions have been published for a wide variety of musical mediums.

Also on the program for Friday's concert are Schubert's Quintet, familiarly known as the "Trout" Quintet, with the same performers joined by David Cobb, bass, and Brahms' Quintet, Opus 88, in F Major, for two violins (Hegyi) and his daughter Lisa, making her first appearance in Music in the Round).

Sunshine Stage presents Stravinsky's 'L'Histoire'

The Sunshine Stage will present a special performance of Frank Bessell's highly acclaimed production of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" (The Soldier's Tale) at the Clark Art Institute Thurs., May 19 at 8:30 p.m. The performance is being cosponsored by the Clark Art Institute and the Northern Berkshire Council of the Arts.

"L'Histoire du Soldat," which is rarely given a full production complete with actors, dancers and musicians, was originally presented in March at the Holliston Theatre in Lenox, home of The Sunshine Stage. It was held over for an extra performance and subsequently brought to the Pittsfield and Taconic high schools. The production features an eight-member chamber orchestra, drawn from area symphony orchestras, which performs on stage as the drama unfolds.

Stravinsky wrote "L'Histoire," a classic Faustian play with music, while in exile in Switzerland during World War I. As he composed the music, known as one of his most original works, he bought each instrument and taught himself to play it. Drawing from a wide range of sources including American ragtime, Viennese waltz, Bach preludes and chorales, Spanish pasodoble, and Argentine tango, Stravinsky created his instrumentation to achieve the maximum range in each of the timbres: clarinet-bassoon, trumpet-trombone, violin-double bass.

Tickets will be available at the door. Tickets are $2.50; $1.50 for students.

Writing is everything

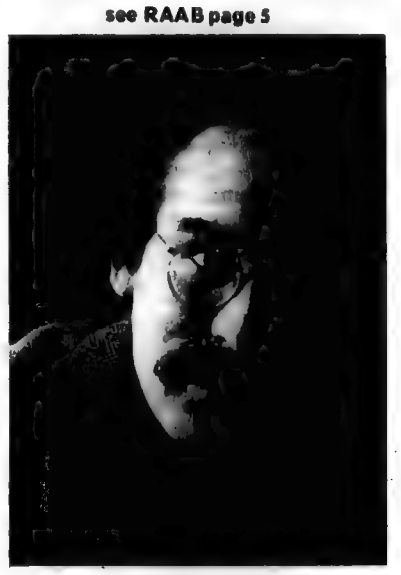
Raab enjoys students, courses

Larry Raab is a writer who began teaching English at Williams last fall. His two books of poems are Mysteries of the Horizon and The Collector of Cold Weather. The following are excerpts from a conversation I had with him April 30.

ON BEING A POET: If a poem is successful, it may rescue for a moment the way words work. I think the greatest poems have served to rescue and renew the possibilities of our language—the way we speak when we try to speak most truthfully, the way we tell each other what really matters to us. In recent years—through the Vietnam war, through Watergate—we've seen how easily an "official" language can rob words of their meaning. Murder becomes "protective reaction" or "defoliation." Lying becomes "stonewalling." Innocence and guilt are blurred into "deniability." The poem, however fragile, stands against this. The poem demands that we look beyond what the words merely seem to stand for, that we see what they really mean, and that finally we all refuse to submit to the pressures of reducing the complexities of language to a few signs that conveniently pretend to mean whatever we may want them to mean. The poem, of course, is not a matter of life or death. But the words of the poem, misused and violated, always have that power. So the best poems turn us away from those easy, protective responses and attitudes. They return us to ourselves, to our whole sense of what might be thought and said, and said truly. Then the poem indeed does become, and not metaphorically, a matter of life and death.

ON BEING A POET AT WILLIAMS: I wanted to teach at Williams partly because I've always wanted to teach at a small college in New England. I really enjoyed being a student at Middlebury College, and felt I would like to teach at a similar place, partly because I like that kind of environment, partly because this part of the country seems to me to be my own landscape, and the one in which I write the best.

Writers who teach inevitably have a love-hate relationship with the institution that supports them. Fortunately, I had four years of fellowships—four years free to do nothing but write—before I came here. I have a sense of the way I write without any outside demands. And, at the moment anyway, I feel pretty comfortable both teaching and writing.



Of course I have to admit that it is hard, maybe impossible, to try to concentrate on a poem after a day of reading twenty Freshman English essays. You start hearing them in your mind. It's a little like playing Monopoly for a whole day. You can't hope to dream of anything except playing Monopoly. After reading those essays, everything starts sounding like a student essay. You pick up a novel to escape and you start correcting the punctuation.

But that's to be expected. At best I think I learn a lot from my students, and from my colleagues, and I value having my job to do which is beyond the pressures of my own writing, though at the same time that work is by no means disconnected from my concerns as a writer. And I am pleased with the attitude of the English Department toward the writing courses. I don't feel that writing courses here are seen as irrelevant to the basic aims of the English program, as is the case at many schools. And that's one of the important reasons why I chose to come here.

ON HIS STUDENTS: The students I have here are much better than those I taught at the University of Michigan and American University. What I value most about them is that they are not careerist. They aren't overly defensive about their own work. They're not anxious to develop a "style" that—because of one quirk or another or some easy cleverness—might be immediately recognizable as theirs. I really value that attitude. And rather than restricting the students I believe such a perspective allows them to try many different kinds of writing. It allows and demands that they take more risks.

I don't believe that poetry writing

WRC lacks openness

by Peter H. Stark

An Open Letter to Steven Aspis, President of the Williams Republican Club, concerning the publication LOYAL OPPOSITION.

Dear Steven,

As one who is a registered Republican (for convenience) and NOT a member of the Williams Republican Club, I feel that as a matter of conscience, the tactics used in the Loyal Opposition must be questioned. A number of gross distortions mar this publication to the point of nausea. Examples:

1) Inconclusive data attempts to show that students "adopt the liberal views of their professors." Citing a drop of those students holding "largely conservative views" between the ages of 17 and 21, Loyal Opposition would have us believe that the Political Science Department and its Marxist Chairman are responsible for this shift. Who cares if the departmental chairman is a Marxist? Does that affect his ability to perform his duties? How could one isolated study of a small New England college possibly "prove" the first contention? Other factors, such as the longer exposure of the 21-year-olds to the "liberal" 1960's are totally ignored.

2) Overt generalities like "In such an atmosphere, a McGovernite becomes a moderate, a Carterite a conservative, a Ford supporter a reactionary, and a Reaganite unthinkable" referring to supposed liberal-radical views of the Political Science Department members are totally uncalled for. Where is the evidence to support these contentions? A pseudo-poll where response to broad topics such as "Increase Welfare" are given undue importance without any legitimate qualifications. I'm sure that Messrs. Harris, Roper, and Gallup would be on the unemployment line if they tried to use such dubious data for their polls.

3) Calling the National Commission on the Observation of International Women's Year sexist may be legitimate, but patently irrelevant because of the organization's private status. Since, to my knowledge, it does not receive public funds, the organization has no legal mandate to obey affirmative action edicts.

The examples could go on, but further exposition is unnecessary. My basic gripe is this: you are calling for a more conservative faculty at a time when the Republican Party is floundering because of its limited appeal to conservative elements. Instead of regressing further, the Republican Party and the Williams Republican Club should broaden its core of support to embrace liberals—what is wrong with a free exchange of ideas? Republican political philosophy, as I understand it, should ENCOURAGE debate of the issues from within its ranks. Traditionally, Republicans are champions of individual liberties—this picture has been distorted in recent years because elitists have gained the upper hand in the party. We should strive to get back to the GOP's original goal of less government with more individual liberty.

Steve, please don't delude yourself into thinking that the Loyal Opposition even remotely resembles Republican viewpoints on a large scale. It is the closemindedness that is shown in your paper that put the Republican Party in the dangerous straits that it is today. We can take a cue from the Democrats: they had their own political scandals a la Wayne Hayes and Teddy Kennedy, yet they do not suffer losses of registration. Why? Because they have a broad core of support coupled with the opportunity for party members to be a part of the decision-making process.

Until we, as Republicans (and I use that term loosely—I have voted for Democrats as well) realize that at the present time, we are our own stumbling blocks to real progress, the GOP will continue to stagnate.

At any rate, until there is some sign of openness in the WRC, you can count me out.

Republican responds to Stark

by Steven Aspis

As editor of the Loyal Opposition, I would like to take this opportunity to respond to Pete Stark's critical though I am sure, well-intentioned remarks. In reference to the article concerning the overwhelmingly liberal faculty, Pete asks, "Who cares if the departmental chairman is a Marxist? Does that affect his abilities to perform his duties?"

I do not object to the idea of having a political science chairman who happens to be a Marxist. In fact, I have no objection to any of the individual professors. My quarrel is with the department collectively, which is totally one-sided in its political orientation. With a department so structured, an unbiased presentation of political viewpoints and philosophies is impossible.

Pete then asks, "How can one isolated study of a small New England college possibly prove the first contention" (that students at Williams tend to adopt the liberal views of their professors)?

Since the article concerned the political views of Williams students and faculty, it seemed logical to do the study at Williams. Where would Pete suggest the study be done, Amherst? Furthermore, Newcomb's Bennington Study and the National Review College Survey indicate that this political shift is not an isolated occurrence. As for Pete's contention that our data was derived from a "pseudo-poll", I suggest that he take this matter up with Professor Philip Hastings, Director of the Roper Public Opinion Center, under whose auspices the survey was designed and administered.

As for Pete's long-winded sermon on the narrow ideology of the Republican Party, I am reluctant to accept philosophical advice from "one who is a registered Republican (for convenience)", as Pete characterized himself. Frankly, I can't understand why anyone would register with a political party out of convenience instead of conviction.

Pete, you complain about a lack of "openness" in our political ideology. If your definition of openness means abandoning one's political philosophy for the sake of electoral expediency, then you were right when you said that the Williams Republican Club is not the organization for you.

Students influence board

Williamstown, Mass.—Wednesday evening at the Williamstown Municipal building, a special information session was held for the benefit of the joint Williamstown-North Adams Planning Board and the intermunicipal Industrial Development Commission (IDC). Also present were representatives from the site concerned—Harriman Airport (an intermunicipal site), the Soil Conservation Service (SCS) and the Berkshire County Regional Planning Commission (BCRPC) headed by Karl Hekler. The information involved was presented by a group of students in the ART 318 Environmental Planning and Design course taught by Sheafe Satterthwaite.

Beginning with the socio-economic background of the area, then a terrestrial study of the site using slides followed up by access-circulation, site selection, architectural considerations and general conclusions the entire presentation took 50 minutes. No questions were asked of the group after the applause settled. The BCRPC also gave a brief (made briefer due to the comprehensive student work) presentation of potential-analysis. In their official capacity the BCRPC made the suggestion that if any development of this area were to be developed it should be done in a piecemeal fashion beginning with parcels in North Adams, thus excluding Williams from the venture at the present.

classes on an undergraduate level should be seen as "professional" training. A class in the craft of writing must also be a class in the craft of reading. In many ways a writing class does not have appreciably different aims from any other literature course. After all, very few of one's students—even over a whole lifetime—will probably go on to commit themselves to writing. I don't think that the writing teacher's responsibility should be to weed out the "serious" writers from those whom he may think have less talent.

In this endeavor the process of writing is really everything. We're talking about writing that can teach you something, both about the single poem, and then about the next poem, and about who you are or may be or become, and about how and why you read.

It's very easy not to be attentive to the way language is being used. One danger—for the teacher as well as the student—of writing within the academic institution is that you can easily become attentive only to the way language is used in literary works, and less aware of how it's used on the streets, or in the cafeteria, or in an advertisement, or a newspaper, or in sub- or non-literary genres. It's important to be attentive to all the ways we're surrounded by language.

Colgate bounces tennis, 8-1; doubles play well

by Evan Bash

Tuesday's varsity tennis match with Colgate was all planned to be a grand send-off gift to departing Coach Dave Johnson as well as provide a final indication of just how far the Ephs have come since the season opened. Only problem is, someone must have lost Colgate's reminder note along with the one that says it isn't supposed to snow in May, for a strong Red Raider's team barreled into Williamstown like the snow that preceded it by a day to repulse good home team showing for an 8-1 victory.

Senior golfer Barney Ireland displays the form which led him to a tenth place finish among 55 competitors at the N.E.S.C.A.C. tournament on the Taconic course last weekend. Ireland, shooting an 83 in the one round tourney, followed in Middlebury linksmen Jim Whitten and Andy Goodenough with a 78 and 79 to take 1st and 2nd in the event.

This has been an ever improving 5-6 year for Williams and Coach Johnson has been primarily responsible. He kept the squad's hopes up after a shakey season start and provided the encouragement and insight into the game that were needed for the player's confidence, something essential to their improvement. As a result, the Ephs rightly hold high hopes for next season when all team members return.

The Williams' singles players were at times as frustrated in their good performance as someone caught in a bureaucratic mess, for no matter what they tried, victory was virtually beyond reach. Martin Goldberg particularly experienced this feeling as he tried everything in losing 6-3, 6-4, while Jim Parsons had things under control before he stumbled late in the second set and then fell 6-7, 7-5, 6-2. No. 3 Evan Bash played a sound match but it wasn't enough in a 6-4, 6-3 loss and Ted Roach lost 6-3, 6-3 as his normally deft vollying deserted him. Playing at no. 5, Bill Whelan felt a 6-3, 6-1 defeat at the hands of a tough opponent. Facing one of the best no. 6 men seen all year, Dean Gianakos took his lumps in a 6-2, 6-2 loss.

Hungry for wins in their last matches of the year, all three doubles teams shook off the single's results to play well. Goldberg and Whelan managed to keep Williams from being shut-out by scoring a 7-6 (5-4 in the tie-breaker), 6-2 win. At no. 2, Dan O'Connell made his long awaited season debut after a winter injury and teamed well with Perry Nelson as they lost to a good team 6-2 in the third set. Roach and Bash lost only their second match of the year as they couldn't hang on, losing 4-6, 6-2, 6-2.

See you on the courts this summer!

Women's Soccer Club ends season

by Cora Yang

The Williams women's varsity soccer club was shorted out 0-1 by Middlebury in overtime play in Vermont on Tuesday. The Ephwomen dominated the second half, with the help of Jane Lester's power kicks, Kate Burke's body, and Cora Yang's rabid hypertension, much to the relief of goalkeepers Blythe Miller and Cindy Scarborough. Coach Vennell muttered profoundly on the sidelines, "You have to score to win." Unfortunately, offensemen Emily Glimp, Laurie Jones, and Kristen Johanson were stymied in their efforts.

Baseball season disappoints fans

A 1977 baseball season that started out so optimistically for the Williams College baseball team has quickly turned sour. From a 6-1 record before the Amherst game April 26th, they have lost their last nine games to drop their record to a dismal 6-10, including doubleheader losses to both Springfield and Amherst.

The reasons for this decline are numerous. An infield that was flawless through the first seven games suddenly turned into a sieve. They not only committed fielding errors, but mental errors, covering bases inadequately, not backing up throws, trying to make plays at home that were impossible, allowing runners to take an extra base, the list could go on and on. Batting averages that were phenomenal in the first seven games have dropped drastically, with Frank Kreutz remaining the only consistent hitter. The pitching, while still strong, has not been able to withstand the diminished run output and the inconsistent defense.

But all these problems can probably be attributed to one cause—inexperience. Williams has only three men in the starting lineup that played last season, Tom Redden, Roger McEniry, and Scott Harrington. Harrington last season played center field while this year is at shortstop. The rest of the lineup are all first year starters, and their inexperience has hurt the Ephs.

But Coach Jim Briggs has reason to be hopeful for next season. The only starter graduating is catcher Redden. The entire pitching staff returns along with a solid core of young players including Kreutz and freshman DH Rick Walter, who also has been solid at the plate all season.

Women end lax season 3-5

by Rex Coons

Women's Lacrosse finished a season of ups and downs on a sour note bowing out with an 8-4 loss at Middlebury. Linda Wilkins' stickers put together a string of three wins at midseason in compiling a 3-5 record. Improvement was evident everywhere as the team tripled its win output from last year. The prospects for next year are bright with the loss of only three seniors off the varsity and the arrival of potential stars from an 8-2 Junior Varsity squad. Maggi O'Brien led the squad in scoring with 32 goals while Vivian Patterson was named to the All-New England Tournament team.

Middlebury jumped out to a 4-1 lead and was never seriously threatened on Wednesday. Their small field helped contain the wide-open passing attack employed by Williams. Goals by Fish, O'Brien, Baldwin and Scheffer were not enough to offset the fired-up Pantherettes. The Jayvees also had their hands full in an 10-4 loss.

A season of high hopes fell short of expectations as the team never realized their full potential. They began to gel late in the year, losing two one goal contests. One last ritual remains as the women await the annual scrimmage against Jimmy Rodgers' J.V. men's juggernauts.

Women's Rugby

The women's rugby squad will make its debut Saturday as the Ephwomen take the field against an experienced Siena Club. The women's club, with two weeks practice under its belt, will tackle the female contingent of the New York squad in an afternoon of rugby beginning with the men's A-game at 2 p.m. on Cole Field.

472 receive degrees at commencement

Seventeen garner summa degrees

The College awarded 441 Bachelor of Arts degrees this morning at its 188th Commencement. Harvard sociologist David Reisman, delivered the commencement address to the graduates, their parents, faculty and friends and to crowds who attended the ceremony to see Robert Redford who sat on stage as an honorary degree recipient.

Seven students who completed the two-year master of arts program in art history received degrees. Masters degrees were also awarded to two graduate students in biology and to 22 graduates of the one year program for representatives from developing nations at the Center for Development Economics.

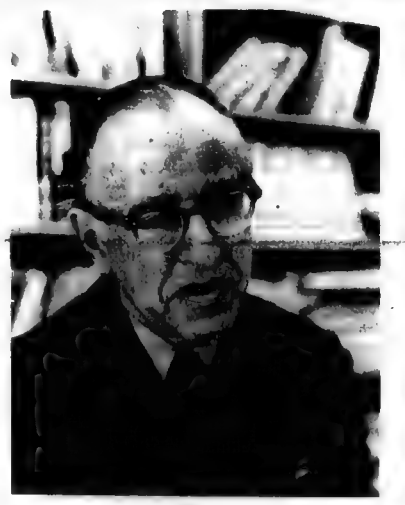
Ann Ingerson, who ranked first in the Class of 1977 and graduated with Honors in Economics and Highest Honors in Philosophy, delivered the valedictorian address. A member of Phi Beta Kappa and one of seventeen seniors to graduate summa cum laude, Ingerson spoke on "Fear and Trembling and the Stagnation of Learning." Anthony Spaeth was the class speaker.

The 48 seniors who qualified for membership in Phi Beta Kappa at the end of their junior years elected Frederick Lawrence as the Phi Beta Kappa speaker. Membership in the academic honor society grew to 110 as 62 additional seniors qualified at the end of this year.

Seniors who graduated in the top twenty-five per cent of their class with a grade point average of above 9.0 on a scale of 12 are eligible for Phi Beta Kappa. Seniors with a GPA of 10.25 or greater graduate summa cum laude, those with a GPA of between 9.25 and 10.24 graduate magna cum laude. The cutoff for cum laude is 8.0 which is below the College wide GPA.

In addition to the seventeen students who graduated summa cum laude, 98 seniors graduated magna cum laude and 188 graduated cum laude. Thirty-three students graduated with "highest honors", two receiving honors in two majors. Seventy seniors graduated with "honors."

The graduating class consisted of 294 men and 147 women. The number of women more than doubled from last year's total of 68 while the number of male graduates fell by thirteen.



The College awarded honorary degrees to Anne L. Armstrong, Lucia Chase, George Heard Hamilton, David M. Pynchon, Robert Redford, Jon Stone, and Raul Cardinal Silva. Baccalaureate speaker Andrew Young and Reisman also received honorary degrees.

Riesman says managers yes, litigants no

David Riesman

Social scientist David Riesman told graduates at Commencement that "what we need are leaders who are steeped in science and technology and at the same time are capable of managing the traffic jams created by conflicting expectations in a large and litigious society such as ours."

In order to meet the challenges of a world facing dwindling resources and the threat of nuclear war, the Harvard professor said "it is more important for the graduates of Williams to enter large, entrepreneurial high-technology corporations, many of them multi-national, and large organizations of all sorts, rather than to seek the individualism and even in academic life the anarchism of the professions."

"How else are we to manage with teamwork rather than by endless litigation the tacit class conflicts between the already affluent who want clean air, water, and porpoises, as against the not yet affluent, who would also like these amenities, but for whom immediate jobs are more important?"

Riesman acknowledged that many graduates are "allergic" to large corporations, but said that the "brain drain" of gifted people into law and medicine stems from the mistaken belief that this leads to personal independence.

"The fact is," Riesman said, "that most lawyers and doctors are subject to the demands and expectations of clients and colleagues at least as imperative as would be the demands in working for IBM or, as many Williams College graduates did, for Time magazine."

The ability to forge this new mentality assumes the absence of nuclear war, Riesman stressed.

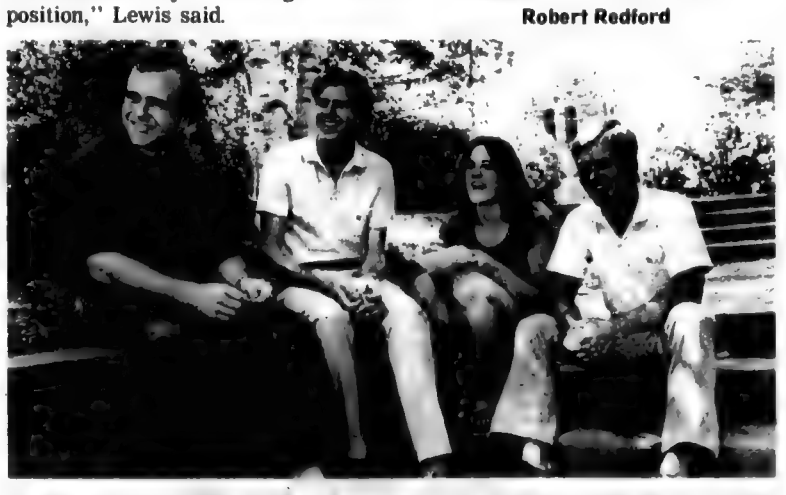
Riesman expressed confidence in President Carter, however, stating that the President has "an all-American faith that problems are soluble and that they can be resolved not only within but among nations by being talked about candidly and openly."

"If my view of human prospects is dour," Riesman said, "I still regard Spaceship Earth, though clearly finite, as almost wholly unexplored and surely not uninteresting."

First woman leads graduates

Five members of the Class of 1977 will be responsible for keeping the graduating class together until it returns to Williamstown in 1983 for its fifth reunion. The class has also picked students to fill four other positions that do not entail duties after commencement.

The four senior class officers recently elected are Claudia Lindsey (President), Tim Pritchard (Vice President), Buzz Inboden (Secretary) and Steve Christakos (Treasurer). They will hold these offices for five years. Lindsey is the first woman elected President of a graduating class.



The class agent, responsible for soliciting monetary gifts from classmates, will be selected soon by Director of the Annual Giving James R. Briggs '60. According to Director of Alumni Relations R. Cragin Lewis '41, the class agent has no fixed term.

Class speaker Tony Spaeth, Class Marshals Joninna Sadoff and Tom Redden, Class Poet Steve White and Class Historians Andy O'Donnell and Polly Prentice have what Lewis called "one shot assignments". All class members voted for the first two positions while the class officers selected students to fill the more latter roles.

The Class President and Vice President preside over class meetings, appoint officers such as reunion chairman and recommend classmates for such positions as Alumni Trustee and member of the Executive Committee of the Society of Alumni. The president also organizes special class functions, such as memorial ceremonies for dead class members.

The Class Secretary gathers news from classmates for the Alumni News column of the Alumni Review. The Class Treasurer, Lewis said, "is at first more honorary than functional." Christakos will collect money for special class functions.

The Class Speaker joins the Valedictorian and Phi Beta Kappa Speaker in competing for the Dewey Prize for the best student Commencement address. The Class Poet and Class Historians address the graduates during Class Day. Class Marshals lead their classmates in the commencement procession." Athletic standouts very often get this position," Lewis said.

Secretary Buzz Inboden, Vice President Tim Pritchard, President Claudia Lindsey, and Treasurer Steve Christakos know something we don't know.

Redford draws crowd

Chandler honors nine

Williams awarded nine honorary degrees at its 188th commencement this weekend.

Among those receiving degrees were the two graduation speakers, David Riesman and Ambassador Andrew Young. President John W. Chandler presented a Doctor of Letters degree to Mr. Riesman, the Commencement speaker, this morning and a Doctor of Law degree to Ambassador Young, who spoke at Baccalaureate, yesterday evening. Other recipients of degrees this morning were Anne L. Armstrong and David M. Pynchon, Doctor of Laws; Lucia Chase, Doctor of Fine Arts; George Heard Hamilton, Doctor of Letters; Monsignor Raul Silva Henriquez, Doctor of Divinity; and Robert Redford and Jon Stone, Doctor of Humane Letters.

David Riesman is one of the nation's leading social scientists and a pioneer in the study of American higher education. In 1950 he published a landmark book, The Lonely Crowd, a study of the social character of American society, and he is currently involved with curricular revision at Harvard. His Williams citation read in part: "Because of your creative scholarship, deep moral sensitivity, and dedicated teaching, we have a richer understanding of ourselves and our major cultural institutions, and a more profound awareness of the choices that lie before us as a people."

Robert Redford

Andrew Young was appointed United States Ambassador to the United Nations on January 30 by President Jimmy Carter. Prior to becoming Ambassador, Young worked with Martin Luther King Jr. during the Civil Rights Movement. In 1972 he became the first black man in 101 years to be elected from Georgia to the U.S. House of Representatives. Williams honored him for "refusing to be bound by the rigid canons of diplomatic language and cutting through to the heart of urgent issues that confront this country in South Africa and other parts of the world."

Robert Redford, leading film actor and producer, is active in environmental and Indian affairs. He also has spoken out for the Equal Rights Amendment, has drawn national attention for his efforts to preserve the environment in Utah, and has donated the proceeds of two of his film premieres to Consumer Action Now. "As both actor and producer," his Williams citation read, "you have been intrigued with the influence of social pressures on personal autonomy and character, a theme that is dominant in Downhill Racer, Jeremiah Johnson, The Candidate, and All the President's Men.

Monsignor Raul Silva Henriquez is a Cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church and Archbishop of Santiago, Chile. The Cardinal is involved in organizing educational and charitable organizations in Chile and around the world. Williams welcomed him "to show our profound respect for the courage and admiration you are showing in speaking out against excesses from the political left and right and in operating agencies to relieve the injustices and suffering of victims of political recrimination."

Jon Stone, a 1952 Williams graduate, has won six Emmies for his work as executive producer-writer of "Sesame Street." Before joining the Children's Television Workshop, Stone was the producer of "Captain Kangaroo" and the "Children's Film Festival." His Williams citation

Farewell

A number of the persons graduating today have made important and lasting contributions to this newspaper. Andy O'Donnell and Tony Spaeth have displayed insight and wit in their weekly efforts as columnists this past year. The sports page has flourished under the care of Dennis O'Shea. Andy Kahane and Charlie Janson distinguished themselves as first-rate photographers. Peter Jacobson brought organization and humor to layout nights during his tenure as managing editor. The trio of Ron Adams, Jeff Verney and Roger Wilson was perhaps the most efficient business staff the Record has had in a number of years and brought this newspaper back from near financial collapse to relative prosperity.

Without belittling the contributions made by these and other people, two of today's graduating seniors are largely responsible for the existence of The Williams Record as an ongoing concern. David Ross and George Schutzer joined the Record-Advocate as freshmen, when the viability of that newspaper was seriously in question. Both were promoted to managing editors as sophomores where in the ensuing year and one-half they assisted editor J. William Widing III in restructuring the entire operation of the newspaper.

Together David and George wrote a stylebook which codified the "rules of the game" under which this newspaper still operates. Each has written a number of outstanding journalistic features in addition to countless news articles and editorials. They were largely responsible for changing the name of this newspaper back to The Williams Record and developing much of the layout style to which it still tenaciously clings. In all of the vital areas on which the successful operation of a newspaper depends—editorial, financial and personnel—their influence has been pervasive. Even this past semester, as ex-editors, they continued to produce a generous quantity of both articles and useful suggestions. Perhaps fittingly, the publication of this issue is due in no small measure to their efforts.

Even while they both leave Williams, however, George to brave the rigors of Yale Law and David to try his hand at employment in the "real world", their influence on the Record will remain behind. We thank them and wish them the best of luck.

Turning Point

Although some may see it as the beginning of the future and others the end of the past, graduation day marks a major turning point for 441 students.

These students have contributed to the College in various significant ways. Some have provided the academic excellence, others the extracurricular efforts, still others the athletic talent and some the party image which makes this place go. For some leaving is easy, for others it is a difficult task.

For those who see growing class sizes, bad tenure decisions, increased use of teaching assistants and heavier workloads, graduation has come just in time.

For those who envision a more even male-female ratio, better food, more complete music facilities and good, young professors, graduation arrives too early.

It is not surprising that students should leave Williams with varying feelings. For those who have listened to the often heard message that college constitutes the best years of your life—enjoy them, leaving becomes difficult. But for those who have studied and studied but not learned, escaping can only be a relief even if there is a boyfriend to leave behind. For some leaving becomes so difficult that they choose to remain in Williamstown for another year. Others will escape Billsville before this paper is distributed.

Whether a student leaves reluctantly or anxiously or with mixed feelings, we give him the hearty congratulations he has earned and deserves. At this major turning point it, becomes especially important to encourage graduates to cherish the past, anticipate the future, but to live the present.

Letter: Course guide evaluated

To the editor:

Let The Buyer Beware

The introduction to the "1st bi-annual Williams College Student Course Guide" states: "It was felt that the 'college grapevine' did not provide students with adequate, unbiased information with which to make informed course selections. We hope that students will find the information contained in this, first and unfortunately incomplete, Guide helpful in choosing courses." This intent is admirable and the people who obviously devoted considerable time and effort to the Guide are deserving of praise. If, however, the Guide is to survive as an accurate and unbiased source of information serious consideration should be given to correcting several methodological flaws inherent in the current version.

One commonly heard criticism of the Guide is that the ratings for each course are based upon the responses of only a small sample of the students (by my calculations, an average of 38.5 per cent of the students in each course responded). From a statistical point of view this argument is both correct and incorrect. The argument is incorrect in assuming that sample sizes of 38.5 per cent cannot be representative of the entire population of students; they can. After all, political preference polls, which have an extremely high degree of accuracy, typically sample less than 1 per cent of the registered voters. The argument, however, is valid in assuming that a self-selected or volunteer sample of 38.5 per cent of the students is not necessarily representative. A well documented effect in the psychological literature indicates that people who volunteer to participate in experiments or surveys differ from those who are selected by other means. In statistical terms, samples comprised of volunteer subjects tend to be biased; that is, they do not necessarily represent the entire population. Thus the possibility exists that the responses of the students who participated in the course survey do not accurately represent the opinions of all students. Perhaps only students who liked the course they had taken responded (the overall positive flavor of the Guide, with a +.7 as the average response on "Rate the Overall Quality of Instruction," suggests this may be the case); perhaps it was some combination of those who really liked the course and those who didn't; perhaps different courses or instructors got different types of students responding. The critical point is that there is no way to know. It is, of course, possible to validate the current Guide by randomly selecting a number of courses and asking all students who took these courses to complete the questionnaire. If the scores from all students were positively correlated (related) to the scores in the Guide, then a strong case could be made for the accuracy of the present version. Unfortunately, this would have to be done every semester and consequently is not the best solution. Rather, future Guides might randomly select a percentage of the students in each course and ask these students to fill out the questionnaire. Granted this is a tedious and time-consuming procedure, but short of getting nearly a 100 per cent response, it is the only way to make the Guide truly representative of the student's feelings.

A second and less severe methodological problem is the apparent inconsistency between the numerical ratings and the written description of each course. It is difficult to speculate as to the source of this since the Guide does not (but should) indicate how the descriptions were compiled. For example, when the Guide reports: "... but some students said ..." does some mean 10 per cent, 25 per cent, or 75 per cent of those responding shared this opinion? If, for example, it means 25 per cent of a sample of 38.5 per cent of the students in the course, then this statement reflects the feelings of only two students in a class of 25! Nevertheless it could easily be misconstrued as an accurate representation of how the class progressed. Some indication of how the comments were tabulated as well as the number of students making each comment would be helpful.

It seems that whether or not the Course Guide survives depends to a large extent on whether or not the users perceive it as useful, and whether the users will perceive it as useful will depend upon its accuracy. Although correction of the methodological problems in the first Guide will require additional effort, this seems to be a reasonable trade off for increased accuracy.

honored him as a "schoolmaster to millions of people of all ages who delight in the antics of Grover, Mr. Hooper, Gordon and Susan, Kermit the Frog, Big Bird, and the Cookie Monster while learning letters and numbers as well as the moral lessons of self-respect, tolerance and love of neighbor, and cooperation."

Anne L. Armstrong served as United States Ambassador to Great Britain from February 1976 until March 3 of this year. Before that Armstrong was the first woman ever to be named counsellor to the President and Republican National Committeewoman. While counsellor, Armstrong founded the first office of Women's Programs in the White House. Williams cited her for her "long list of high-level political and government appointments in which you have worked for a larger presence for women in public life."

Since 1945 Lucia Chase has been co-director of the American Ballet Theatre, one of the most renowned dance companies in the world. "More than any other one person," her citation read, "you have resolved this country's ambivalence towards dance by fulfilling your dream of making the American Ballet Theatre an authentically American national institution."

George Heard Hamilton, director of the Clark Art Institute, is retiring this summer. He came to Williamstown from the Yale art faculty and also was professor of art at Williams from 1966 until 1975. In 1972 he became the first director of the Williams graduate program in the history of art. Williams honored him for "a list of splendid accomplishments that includes constructing a new building that more than doubles the Institute's capacity, founding and directing a highly respected master's program in art history, assembling a research library of international distinction, and creating a wide range of programs that make the Institute's resources more accessible to school children and the general public."

David M. Pynchon, a 1950 Williams graduate, has been the headmaster of Deerfield Academy since 1968. Williams cited Mr. Pynchon as "a recognized national leader in secondary education."

Faculty hears committee

Report hits black admissions

The Committee on Black Students at Williams urged a reallocation of Admissions Office recruiting efforts and discussed possible inadequacies in the curriculum and in relations between black students and white faculty in a report to the faculty on May 25.

The committee, formed in March, reported on the progress of its discussions this spring and outlined target areas for discussion next fall.

Committee member Dennis Dickerson, Assistant Professor of History, stated that the committee was concerned that Williams was recruiting black students too exclusively from preparatory and country day schools and neglecting inner-city areas.

Dean Peter Berek, chairman of the committee, indicated in a Record interview that the Committee recognized that this bias arose from the fact that a lower concentration of academically strong students and poor college guidance services in inner city schools push up the costs of recruiting. Nevertheless, a committee memorandum to the Admissions Committee suggests that cost-benefit calculations to date have inadequately considered the need to more accurately reflect the socio-economic divisions of black society in the Williams student body.

Reporting the committee's tentative conclusions on the curriculum, Associate Professor of Economics Earl L. McFarland, Jr. said there was a need for "Afro-American experiences and culture to be integrated into course curriculums where it would be appropriate." He stressed that such integration should take place only in appropriate areas, but that it might reduce the sense of "foreigness" between black and white students and help blacks feel less isolated and alienated from the Williams experience.

Berek indicated that the Committee will continue to discuss how this integration should be implemented next fall.

The committee report also noted the existence of "difficulties" in the relations between black students and white faculty creating obstacles to learning. The report argued, "Black students are frequently reluctant to seek out faculty members for help and to participate in class even when they feel they have something to contribute."

According to Berek, the need for a committee on black students was perceived in discussions among black students and administrators last fall. He told the faculty that relations between faculty and black students were the "single most important are in which we needed to make some progress."

Dickerson declared that the following five items were at the top of the committee's agenda for next year: examine the College's tutorial services, discuss charges of racism in athletics, consider the Black Student Union as an educational resource, evaluate the relations between black students and the Dean's Office, and discuss social relations between black and white students.

Seniors win Watson and Fulbright awards

Two Williams seniors have been awarded Thomas J. Watson Fellowships for a year of independent study and travel abroad. Michael Knight and Michael Rosenblum, who will each receive grants of $7,000, were among the 70 fellows chosen this year from 977 applicants.

Knight, an English and history major, will spend next year studying theater and the oral tradition in Nigeria and Ghana. An actor in some Williams College Theatre productions, Knight has a long-range goal of working in the theater, possibly as a producer-director-actor.

Rosenblum will compile a photographic documentary of the lives of Jewish emigres in Israel, France, Germany, Italy and Eastern Europe. He has been an active member of the photo club at Williams and has been a teaching assistant for a photography course; his photograph of Williams Professor Robert G. L. Waite will be used for Waite's book on Hitler.

Lynn T. McConnell and Dinny Weed have each received Fulbright awards, also for a year of study abroad. McConnell will study early 19th century Polish Romantic Literature, associated with the University of Warsaw. Weed will be enrolled at the University of Geneva where she will study psychology, specifically the theories of Piaget.

McConnell and Weed were among some thirty Williams students who applied for the Fulbright Fellowships through the College. Three of the Williams applicants were nominated by a national committee but only McConnell and Weed were approved by the specific countries to which they applied.

College plans summer renovations

Students returning to campus next fall can expect few major physical changes, although officials of Buildings and Grounds are expecting a heavier load of renovation and planning work than normal.

Last fall, the construction of a new mailroom and the availability of new student housing in Seeley House and the basements of Lehman and Fayerweather Halls received considerable attention as a result of the switch-over to a centralized student mail system and the threat of overcrowding of student housing at the start of classes.

As of the end of May, College officials were expecting a small but significant drop in the number of students arriving next fall. Thus, it is unlikely that summer construction projects will have as great an impact on students as last year.

Nevertheless, construction and renovation work totaling over $200,000 will be completed over the summer and planning for several longer range projects will continue.

"There's a lot of renovation work going on that costs an awful lot, but that no one really sees," said Director of Physical Plant Peter Welanetz.

The transformation of Woodbridge and Chadbourne Houses from faculty to student housing are the most expensive projects on Welanetz' agenda. At $53,000 and $57,000 respectively, the conversions will add space for 29 undergraduates.

Nearly $55,500 has been allocated for improving fire and theft prevention facilities in the Chapin Library and Lawrence Hall (Williams College Museum of Art).

Planning will continue for the new Music Building to be built to the east of Chapin Hall. Construction bids on the building are expected to go out in late August, with ground-breaking scheduled for just after the start of classes.

Director of Student Housing Charles Jankey confirmed that renovations of Garfield House will begin on schedule in January. Nineteen students will be housed there first semester. After renovations are completed, the house will have room for 33 students.

The increase in bed space is made at the sacrifice of some social space, particularly the old dining room, which has been used for dances. Jankey has agreed to renovate the Wood House basement as a social area.

Welanetz indicated that long range planning for new art and physical education facilities will continue.

Guidelines to cut confusion

Faculty sets honor rules

The faculty overwhelmingly voted to endorse a proposal to require instructors to distribute specific guidelines on academic honesty in all courses. The approved plan is an amended version of a proposal submitted by the student-faculty Honor Code Committee at the faculty's final meeting on May 25.

The proposal, as amended, requires all instructors to distribute written guidelines in each of their courses reminding students of their obligation to abide by the principles of the Honor Code set forth in the Student Handbook and discussing the manner in which the Honor Code applies to the specific course. Instructors must distribute a copy of these guidelines to each student in all courses and to the student chairman of the Honor Code Committee at the beginning of each semester.

According to Anson Piper, chairman of the Honor Committee, the committee's proposal was made in response to the obvious confusion which existed this past year, on the part of both students and faculty, concerning the Honor Code. He noted that the wide-spread proliferation of exam options, especially involving take-home exams, has led to a situation where a number of students are confused as to the nature and application of the Honor Code.

The Honor Code Committee's original proposal did not include the clause refering students to the statement about academic honesty in the Student Handbook. A number of faculty members voiced the concern that the original proposal seemed to imply that anything which an instructor did not explicitly ban would be allowed. In its amended form, the proposal assumes that all stipulations concerning academic honesty which are listed in the student handbook will apply unless otherwise noted by an instructor.

Despite the broad support displayed by the faculty for an individualized system, where all instructors are allowed to set their own examination ground rules, in the debate over the proposal many faculty members stressed the need for a greater uniformity of guidelines than currently exists.

Trustees discuss race relations

The Board of Trustees discussed black-white relations, the use of campus facilities in the face of rising energy costs, and the future financial integrity of the College in a series of committee meetings this weekend.

The June Trustees' meeting has traditionally been dominated by Commencement related activities, College Officials indicated. For example, the Board of Trustees formally confer the degrees on the recommendation of the faculty.

Director of Physical Plant Peter Welanetz warned the Buildings and Grounds Committee of the implications of rising energy costs for the College over the next five years. Although the College's Energy Conservation Program was able to hold energy costs within budget this winter despite the cold weather, Welanetz declared that future savings will require greater capital investments and may not be sufficient against shortages and rising prices.

President John W. Chandler described the goals of the newly formed Facilities Utilization Committee. Chaired by Francis H. Dewey III, Vice President for Administration for the College and Secretary of the Board of Trustees, the committee will consider a wide range of issues concerning the most efficient use of campus buildings and land. College officials indicated that there is a real need to evaluate the existing physical plant after the building boom surrounding the expansion of enrollment and with proposals for new art and physical education facilities coming up for consideration.

Other members of the newly formed committee are Welanetz, Professors William T. Fox and Whitney S. Stoddard, Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, and Dirk van Dijl '78. Another student member will be named before the fall.

The Budget and Financial Planning Committee discussed a proposal to pay the costs of the Mission Park housing complex and other costs related to the expansion of enrollment to 1850 through a low interest bond issue. For the past seven years, the College has carried the $6.2 million outstanding from these construction costs on its books as an "internal loan," according to Dewey. Under Massachusetts law, the College as a nonprofit educational institution could issue a bond underwritten by the Massachusetts Health and Educational Facilities Authority at relatively low interest (under six per cent) for a term of up to 30 years. No decision on the proposal or on the package of collateral to be used to back the bond was made at the meeting.

The Committee on Campus Life met with the deans to discuss black-white relations (particularly the on going discussions of the student-faculty Committee on Black Students at Williams), undergraduate housing, and the participation by small numbers of students in fraternity activities in violation of College educational policy. Dean Peter Berek noted that this was a chance for the committee to discuss issues informally with the deans. During the College year, the committee usually meets somewhat formally with groups of students.

In other business, the Committee on Degrees began preliminary discussion of possible honorary degree recipients and speakers for next year's Commencement; and the Development Committee discussed the final phases of the Capital Fund for the 70's drive.

The Board of Trustees also approved several staff appointments for next year.

Sigma Xi

The Williams College chapter of Sigma Xi, the national science honor society, initiated ten graduating seniors as associate members this weekend. Assistant Professor of Biology Lee C. Drickamer presided at the short initiation ceremony in the Bronfman Science Center at 11:00 Saturday morning.

According to Drickamer, full membership in Sigma Xi is limited to those completing doctoral research in the sciences. However, the society annually awards associate membership to graduating college students for significant progress in undergraduate research and potential for meaningful future research as exemplified by an honors thesis or independent research project.

Unlike Phi Beta Kappa, associate members are elected by a membership committee based on nominations from each science department. Membership is not automatically linked to grade point average and class rank. This year's membership committee consisted of Professor of Physics Stuart J. B. Crampton, Ebenezer Fitch Professor of Chemistry Charles Compton, Thomas T. Read Professor of Mathematics H. William Oliver, Assistant Professor of Psychology Hugh E. Criswell, and Edward Brust Professor of Geology and Mineralogy William T. Fox.

Newly elected associate members are:

Robert P. Comer, Peter D. Hislop, Kevin M. Jones, Saik Chuan Kee, John B. Kinney, Heidi S. Phillips, Leila V. M. Siukola, Richard C. Spicer, Martin A. Weinstock and Stephen F. Yates.

Eager faces, scarred faces: Year in review

by David R. Ross

College years tend to follow cyclical patterns, with campus crises erupting in inverse proportion to the number of midterms, papers, finals, good skiing and football games. Relatively little time need pass before obstinate administrators, morally indignant students and winning or losing seasons fade into a bland background.

One of the great strengths and curses of the Record is the fact that chronicled events seem to take on that bland insigifnicant appearance a lot sooner.

For the most part, though, it is the regular rhythms of college life that quickly put even the most serious campus catastrophe into perspective. This past year has been no exception.

A freshman class (497) eager faces); a senior class (441 scarred faces) graduated; and in the wings some 484 students waited to take their places next fall. Somehow, an early crisp fall, the first really snowbound winter in years and the arrival of August in May will frame more memories of the year than the traumatic arrival of a new Director of Food Services, the heady, complex effort to revitalize student government, and the frustratingly inadequate attempt to come to grips with the lack of understanding among the races.

Yet, the year ran its idiosyncratic course:

Arriving: There were more hassles than usual in finding people homes this fall. Too many freshmen were admitted, too few upperclassmen withdrew and too many decided to return. At one point, nearly 60 students above the "normal" 1855 were expected to descend on Williamstown. The College survived thanks to last minute withdrawals, more off-campus housing and the use of the north entry of Currier to house freshmen.

As the hordes arrived, Mrs. Marlowe and the Baxter mailroom found a new home in the old TV room and Record office, as all student mail became centralized in Baxter.

September: By mid-September, the long lunch lines at Baxter and the desertion of Row House dining halls that many had predicted would occur as a result of the centralized mail system had failed to appear as chronic problems. Although the mailroom continued to be congested around noon for the rest of the year, most students and administrators came to agree that the move was an unqualified success. Nevertheless, the College Council voted to "express its displeasure" that the centralized mail system had been instituted over the summer without consultation of students and in the face of a CC resolution against a centralized system.

The existence of fraternities again became an issue when Dean Peter Berek announced that an organization called the Adelphic Literary Society, loosely affiliated with the Alpha Delta Phi international fraternity, was actively initiating members in violation of the College's prohibition against participation by undergraduates in fraternities.

For a few days, the campus was awash with rumors of rapes both on and off campus. Neither the Record nor College officials were able to confirm the occurrence of any rapes involving Williams students, and the rumors soon died down. The College and town began a campaign to increase street lighting in and around the campus and the Dean's Office sponsored a guide to dealing with and preventing rape.

The Committee on Undergraduate Life published a draft report on upperclass housing. Among the report's conclusions was the charge that excessive use of alcohol for house social functions was contributing to alcoholism on campus. The report also reaffirmed the principle of housing diversity, but noted that minorities (essentially everyone except male beer drinkers) were not getting their fair share of house social activities.

October: The Board of Trustees voted to "emphasize their resolute opposition to efforts of fraternities to re-establish themselves among Williams undergraduates, including continuing fraternity activity in and near Williams . . ." The Adelphic Literary Society had voted to disband several weeks before the resolution was passed. However, two fraternities, TDX and KA, continued to operate out of Pownal, Vermont, chapter houses through the year.

An attempt by the Record to have a reporter admitted to a meeting of the Committee on Educational Policy sparked a general debate on whether student-faculty committee meetings should be open to the College community. In November the faculty voted to keep committee meetings closed while allowing each committee to open individual meetings "at their own discretion."

Cynthia Krizack, a 17-year old Mt. Greylock High School student, disappeared after leaving her home to study at the Sawyer Library. A full scale search, in which many students and townspeople participated, failed to locate her in the Williamstown area. Three weeks later, her strangled body was found in the woods near Pittsfield.

Jimmy Carter (43.2 per cent) defeated Gerald Ford (38.8 per cent) in a mock campus election.

Criticism of policy changes by new Director of Food Services Ross Keller began to emerge. At first, Keller's administration had been well received. Wider food selection, a liberal seconds policy, expansion of salad bars, and an expanded vegetarian menu received universal praise. However, by mid-October, members of Row Houses were beginning to complain about a deterioration in dining services there and a lack of autonomy and flexibility in planning and preparing meals.

November: The College Council concluded its student activities tax funding allocation process. Although the process took no longer than in previous years, it moved more smoothly as the CC expanded the number of meetings devoted to considering Finance Committee recommendations from two to five. The most heated debates centered on Back Talk (the need for two literary, journalistic magazines), the Gul (proposal to force students wanting to receive the Gul to pay a nominal part of the cost was defeated), and the Dance Society (whose budget was essentially a fait accompli as a result of contractural obligations).

The football team finished a 4-4 year with a surprising Homecoming rout of Wesleyan and a disappointing loss to Amherst—the first in five years.

December: The Committee on Appointments and Promotions: tenure recommendations sparked student protests over the denial of tenure to Assistant Professor of Economics Thomas Tietenberg. Students also criticized the "closed nature" of the tenure decision process and charged that student opinions were not given adequate weight. The CAP agreed to reconsider its Tietenberg recommendation following a petition signed by 219 students but voted to leave its negative recommendation unchanged.

January: The Board of Trustees approved the CAP's tenure recommendations, authorized a 7.7 per cent hike in tuition and other term charges for the next year and authorized the renovation of Garfield House and the conversion of two faculty residences for student housing. The Garfield renovations would raise housing capacity from 19 to 35 students by eliminating some common social areas.

An attempt to sell Mt. Hope Farm to a land trust—the Kellogg Plan—received a fatal setback when tests revealed that the soil could not handle the sewage disposal needs of the up to 50 houses envisioned by the plan. Mt. Hope is sparsely used by the College and carries an annual net maintenance deficit of $100,000.

February: Students rejected a new College Council constitution. The proposed constitution differed in only procedural details from that in effect. The high "No" vote prompted demands for the radical reform of student government. Gladden House formally withdrew from the CC and sponsored an open forum to discuss and propose better methods of getting the voice of students into campus decisions.

Despite the unusually long and cold winter, College energy conservation efforts kept the College within budget. There was never any danger of fuel shortages disrupting campus life. Classrooms and laboratory buildings were closed at night to lower heating needs. Provost Neil Grabois approved a plan linking summer research grants to the reduction of electrical consumption by Division III buildings.

The cold weather was a real factor in making Winter Carnival a success after last year's thaw-inspired cancellation. Buzz Inboden '77 was credited with organizing the smoothest run Carnival in 2 years.

March: The election for CC president became something of a referendum on the future of student government. An unusually large field of eight candidates represented a wide spectrum including those advocating minor reforms and those seeking abolition of a formal student governing body. In addition, there were campaigns to vote No on the presidential ballot. Although there was some question as to what constituted a valid ballot, nearly 72 per cent of the student body filled in ballots (not significantly lower than the turn out for elections in previous years). Tom Herwitz '78 defeated Harry Kelly '78 in a runoff. More significantly status quo and reformist candidates clearly outpolled candidates calling for radical changes.

Complaints against Director Keller's handling of Food Services rose as the dining halls instituted stricter ID checking and portion control. A series of Record articles on Food Services revealed that student attitude's toward Keller's policies varied widely—especially among dining halls. Many students, particularly those using Driscoll dining halls, continued to praise Keller's innovations. Other students, particularly those eating at Dodd House and the Row Houses, spoke bitterly of Keller's "inflexibility, unreasonableness and aloofness."

April: The faculty voted to eliminate the major grade and make the requirement that seniors pass a major exercise optional for each department starting with the Class of '79. Currently, performance on the major exercise or "comp" constitutes one-fifth of a student's major grade.

The Committee on Undergraduate Life expanded the housing categories to five and made upperclass house transfer applicants go through a random inclusion process similar to that used for freshmen. The five categories (Fitch and Prospect, Dodd and Tyler, Greylock, Mission Park, and the Row Houses) better reflected student preferences, since in the past desirable and undesirable housing had been linked in the same housing category. Nearly 80 per cent of freshmen were placed in their first or second choice housing category. The transfer process went equally smoothly—in large part because the most desired houses coincidentally had the largest number of seniors.

Growing out of a charge that blacks were not given a fair chance to compete on the basketball team, a lengthy debate on racism at Williams filled the Op-Ed page of the Record. The debate was characterized by seeming inability of participants to fully understand each other. More formally, an ad hoc committee worked through the spring to suggest improvements in the academic environment of black students at Williams.

Reacting to overacceptances last year, the Admissions Office mailed over 100 fewer letters of acceptance to applicants for the Class of '81. The College accepted only 19.3 per cent of all applicants, placing Williams fourth in the annual Amherst Student poll of northeastern college selectivity. As of the end of May, 484 of those accepted indicated that they would join the Class of '81 next fall—a number expected to drop to near 475 when classes start. Of these, 53.5 per cent are men—the smallest percentage ever.

Leaving: On June 4, 1977, Claudia Lindsey, President of the Class of '77, dropped a pocket watch from the tower of the Thompson Memorial Chapel. It broke, indicating good luck for the members of Williams' 188th graduating class.

Newly identified works go on College display

An unusual small exhibit of newly identified works from the Williams College Art Museum's collection went on display shortly before Commencement activities began. The exhibit will remain on display at least through Reunion Weekend.

In one small case in the Blashfield Room of Lawrence Hall there are five newly recognized works by 17th century sculptors Francois du Quesnoy and Georg Petel and painter Nicolas Poussin.

The real excitement of this small show is a marble fragment recently uncovered from the Museum's storage holdings by newly appointed Director Franklin Robinson. Lecturer Sheila Somers Rinehart recognized the fragment as a rejected first attempt at a putto head for the monument of Ferdinand van den Eynde, whose tomb is in Rome's church of Santa Maria dell'Anima. Du Quesnoy executed the work in 1629.

Also by du Quesnoy is a small silver sculpture of a Christ Child. This is the only known silver sculpture by this artist.

Two small bronze sculptures of putti with goats in the exhibit are attributed to Poussin, the great classical French artist, who lived with the Flemish sculptor du Quesnoy for the first four years of his studies in Rome (1626-30).

In addition to these previously unknown works is a sumptuous Crucifix in ivory by the short-lived Augsburg sculptor Georg Petel (1601-34). Petel was a friend of Rubens, in whose honor the Lawrence Hall exhibit has been arranged.

This marble fragment from the Williams College Museum may have been a first attempt at a putto head executed by du Quesnoy for Ferdinand van den Eynde.

450 attend Dinner Dance at Cluett

"Profits from Thursday evening's Senior Dinner Dance will be placed in the class fund for use at the fifth year reunion of the Class of '77, dinner dance ticket chairman Tim Pritchard said.

Cost and attendance estimates which the senior dance committee released to the Record prior to the dance indicated that the profit should be in the range of $600.

Approximately 450 persons paid $12.50 per head to attend the dinner and dance under a tent at Cluett House.

The College's Food Services department prepared all the food and paid the cost of dinners for seniors, but charged the dinner dance committee $6.50 for each of the approximately 150 non-seniors attending the affair, Pritchard said.

The committee had purchased $1400 of liquor and mixers for the 7½ hour, open bar celebration.

The Cluett House site was decorated with blown up pages from What's What 1977, the book containing pictures of the graduating class issued during the beginning of its Freshman Days.

Ingerson warns of learning stagnation

Concern over opportunities missed and the tendency to avoid going out on a limb for personal beliefs were the general themes of student addresses at Williams' 188th Commencement Exercises this morning.

Valedictorian Ann L. Ingerson spoke on "Fear and Trembling and the Stagnation of Learning." She argued that students seem to be afraid to have an opinion. Even the most successful students make too much use of other people's thinking. Too few student papers come to any conclusions.

College is a good time to try things out, Ingerson stressed. Yet, many students are so concerned about grades that they refuse to take a chance. But the heart of learning is trying new things, taking chances, and coming to grips with oneself through occasional failures. Without the willingness to dare to think new thoughts, learning stagnates, she concluded.

Ingerson graduated summa cum laude receiving her degree with honors in economics and highest honors in philosophy. She was awarded the Moody Graduate Fellowship, which will enable her to study for a master's degree in Agricultural Economics at Oxford University, England for the next two years.

At Williams, she was a member of the Student Advisory Committee on Hiring for economics and the Computer Services Committee. She was manager of the men's cross country and indoor and outdoor track team for four years.

Phi Beta Kappa speaker, Frederick M. Lawrence, entitled his speech "Are You Talikin' to Me?"—a reference to a line of Robert De Niro's in the movie Taxi Driver. Lawrence attacked the notion that idealism and pragmaticism are two exclusionary concepts.

"The true pragmatist is the individual who can live in the present, dream of a future, and is willing to make his life the bridge between the two," Lawrence said. "College must be a time to critically analyze society, not in spite of the fact that we are not directly involved in it, but because of this fact."

Lawrence was elected speaker by the student members of the Williams Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa. He is student vice-president of that honorary society. At Williams he served as a junior advisor, president of the Williams College Jewish Association, co-senior manager of the Choral Society and co-student leader of the Marching Band. The political economy major graduated magna cum laude. He plans to study law and economics at Yale University.

Before the speeches, Lawrence received the William Bradford Turner Citizenship Prize. The prize of $300 "is awarded to the member of the graduating class who, in the judgment of the faculty and of the graduating class, has best fulfilled one's obligation to the College, to fellow students, and to self." It is often considered the highest honor a Williams student can receive.

Anthony P. Spaeth delivered the class speech entitled "Work in Progress" with wit and abandon. Spaeth added the subtitle "Parade of Platitudes" to his speech, which attacked every Williams cliche known to man. The Class Speaker is elected by the senior class at the close of last semester classes.

Spaeth graduated cum laude with a double major in English and philosophy. He has served as a contributing editor and regular columnist for the Record for the past year. Postgraduate plans are uncertain, although he hopes to secure a position with a Tokyo-based newspaper.

All three speakers were eligible for the Dewey Prize. Founded by Francis Henshaw Dewey of the Class of 1840, the $75 prize is awarded to the member of the graduating class who presents the most creditable oration in point of composition and delivery. The judges this year were Williams trustee Martha R. Wallace, David M. Pynchon '50, and John Hawley Roberts Professor of English, Don C. Gifford.

Chandler questions growth potential

by Nick Cristiano

President John W. Chandler told graduates at Baccalaureate yesterday that "the large question before you now is whether the powers you enjoy will be directed by personal and tribal self-interest or by sympathies, commitments, and concerns that range outward to include all classes and conditions of people."

Asserting that "life for you has been, by any objective measure, a triumphal affair," Chandler said that "your graduation from Williams is a personal achievement that the great majority of your contemporaries can only envy."

But as graduates move away from Williams, he added, "it will become increasingly apparent to you that life for most people on this planet contains more tragedy than triumph, more failure than success, many more problems than answers."

Chandler told the graduates that he had no doubt they would continue to grow intellectually. "Williams has prepared you well to cope with change, to solve problems, to express yourself clearly and forcefully," he said.

"The crucial question is whether your moral life will undergo similar growth," Chandler cautioned. "Will your sympathies become deeper and broader? Will your comprehension of the unity of human destiny and the interdependence of all life become fuller? Life for you will almost certainly contain many pleasures. But will you also know the joy which comes from sharing the sufferings, hopes and victories of others?"

Chandler concluded: "I hope you will continue to see in Williams a steady beacon when you need a sure sense of direction and a place to which you will return often and in which you will always feel at home."

Small college handles national big-time press

In preparing for press coverage of the graduation events this weekend, the College tried to "preserve the dignity of the events" while recognizing that national figures would be on campus, acting news director Ray Boyer said.

Reporters covered last night's Baccalaureate sermon delivered in Chapin Hall from Baxter Hall where the speech was transmitted by closed circuit television.

The College provided a video pool feed of the address for television stations covering the speech. Photographers and cameramen were not permitted inside Chapin Hall during the ceremony. News office photographers provided newspapers with rolls of unprocessed film immediately following Andrew Young's sermon . . .

In an advisory note to editors, the College explained its reason for keeping reporters out of Chapin Hall: "There is limited seating in Chapin and the college feels that it is important that parents be able to accompany graduating students during the ceremony." Chapin Hall normally seats 1100 persons. Each of the graduates was provided with two tickets to the Baccalaureate sermon.

This morning's commencement exercises were open to the press.

Before the weekend, Boyer said he expected local newspapers to cover commencement but that Channel 22 in Springfield was the only television station to confirm its intent to cover the weekend's events. Boyer said he would be providing other area stations with filmed reports of the graduation activity.

Boyer said his office had been in touch with the national news media and that he expected that there would be some national coverage of the Baccalaureate sermon and the awarding of honorary degrees.

Boyer said the College's attempt to get news coverage of commencement events would focus on spreading material out rather than drawing reporters to Williams.

He provided New England and Albany area radio stations with radio reports of last night's activities.

Prior to the weekend, Boyer said he hoped national radio and press services would also pick up news from Williams.

In addition, the News Office sends releases to the hometown newspapers of graduating seniors.

Fewer Williams students this fall

The College will open with fewer students next September than it opened with last September, Dean of the College Peter Berek predicted.

Berek said his office is monitoring more closely student plans to take a year or two away from Williams than it has in the past.

Last year "two few" students withdrew and "too many" decided to return, leading to a larger student body than the College desired.

Berek said that although he would like to get more accurate estimates of the size of the College earlier, the College wants to preserve students' freedom to withdraw from the College and to return when they are ready to do so.

Too few students at Williams as well as too many students can cause problems, Berek noted. When the College is under enrolled potential revenue is lost.

Class Day recognizes prominent seniors

Over fifty members of the Class of 1977 of Williams College received prizes or recognition for receiving graduate fellowships at Class Day exercises yesterday.

The prizes covered all academic fields offered at the College and were awarded for speaking, writing and overall excellence.

Class President Claudia Lindsey presided over the ceremonies from the East Entrance of the Sawyer Library. She then stepped from the podium for the traditional planting of an ivy vine along the side of the Library.

The Class History was presented by two historians, Andrew B. O'Donnell and Holland S. Prentice. Their leisurely anecdotal account of the class's four years was halted by frequent laughter and applause.

Steven White, winner of the 1977 Academy of American Poets Contest at Williams, read the Class Poem, entitled "Farewell to Ivy." The poem, in which White continually confused his alma mater with his mistress, declared plaintively at one point: "She says I have to move out - She says I'll only hear from her when she needs money."

White, O'Donnell and Prentice had been selected by the Class Officers.

The Class Day exercises ended as Lindsey dropped a pocket watch off the tower of the Thompson Memorial Chapel. Tradition has it that if the watch breaks the graduating class can expect good luck ahead. Reliable sources close to the watch affirmed that the watch did indeed break.

Archer, Compton, Jordan retire from Williams faculty

H. Richard Archer

Charles Compton

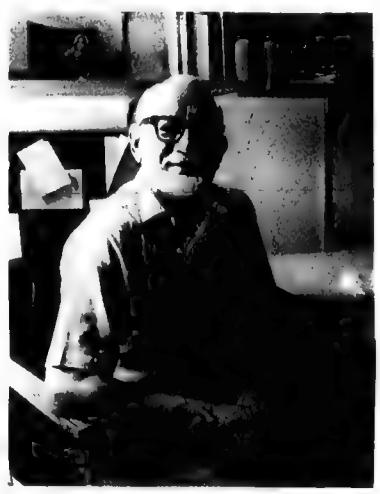
Faculty members H. Richard Archer, Charles Compton and C. Wallace Jordan, Jr. have announced their retirements from the Williams College faculty effective June 30.

Archer has been Custodian of the Chapin Library—a collection of rare books, prints and manuscripts—since joining the faculty in 1957. Compton, Ebenezer Fitch Professor of Chemistry, came to Williams in 1946 and has served as chairman of the chemistry department and of the Premedical Committee. Jordan '37 has taught mathematics and computer science here since 1946.

Archer, born in New Mexico in 1911, received a B.A. degree in 1940 from the University of California at Berkeley, and a Ph.D. in 1954 from the University of Chicago Graduate Library School. He was a research assistant at the University of Chicago Graduate Library School, bibliographer and curator of graphic arts at the University of California (at Los Angeles) Clark Memorial Library and librarian for R. R. Donnelly & Sons before coming to Williams.

Archer has operated a private printing service, the Hippogryph Press, as a hobby since 1951. He said he has printed many brochures and posters for Chapin Library exhibits.

After retiring, Archer said he may revise "Rare Book Collections" and begin a study on private presses in America in addition to lecturing, writing articles, and printing.



Compton, born in 1915 in New Jersey, attended Princeton University (B.A. 1940) and Yale University (Ph.D. 1943). Before joining the College as an Instructor in Chemistry, he was a research associate with the Manhattan District Project and a chemist at American Cyanamid Corp. Compton was promoted to Professor of Chemistry in 1957 and held the title of Halford R. Clark Professor of Natural Science from 1967 until 1972, when he was named Ebenezer Fitch Professor of Chemistry.

Compton was chairman of the chemistry department from 1964 until 1974 and was acting chairman this year. He has served as secretary to the faculty and as a member of the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) and the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP).

Compton's first book, "Introduction to Chemistry," (1958) received special commendation from the American Association for the Advancement of Science. He is currently working on a book tentatively entitled "Inside Chemistry," to be published by McGraw-Hill. Compton's investigations in molecular spectroscopy have been supported by grants from the Research Corporation.

A native of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Jordan graduated from Williams in 1937 and joined the actuarial staff at the Connecticut General Life Insurance Company. Jordan was appointed to the Williams faculty in 1946.

Jordan has served as director of data processing, director of computer services and acting registrar.

Eleven on faculty resign

Eleven faculty members announced resignations this spring according to a list of names released by President John W. Chandler after the spring meeting of the Trustees. Of these resignations, four will come from the economics department while the remaining seven are distributed throughout the College's staff.

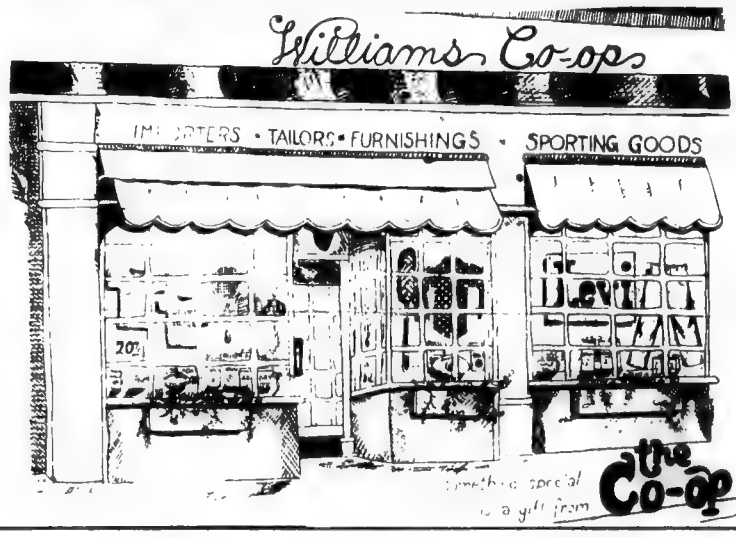
Thomas H. Tietenberg will leave his position as Assistant Professor of Economics at Williams to teach at Colby College in Maine. Tietenberg will continue to specialize in urban, environmental and legal economics.

Randall Bartlett, Bettina Berch, and Andrew T. Williams also Assistant Professors in the economics department will not return to the College next fall. Both Bartlett and Williams spent this year on leave.

Assistant Professor William H. Exum, acting chairman of the Sociology Department and Program Director of Afro-American Studies at Williams, accepted an offer to teach at Northwestern University next year and consequently announced his resignation.

Assistant Professor of Mathematics, William L. Green will return to the Georgia Institute of Technology where he taught for a year before coming to Williams in 1975. Green will be involved in both teaching and research in functional analysis.

Janice L. Smith, Assistant Director of Admissions, also announced her resignation this spring. Smith said she was unsure what she would be doing next fall but noted that she planned to work with Operation Cross Roads Africa this summer on a project in Antigua.



Other resignations included that of Andrea L. Diehl, former News Director who assumed an editing job with the Philadelphia Daily News, and James C. Rodgers, Instructor in Physical Education, who accepted a teaching and coaching position at a high school outside of Philadelphia. David Rice, Assistant Professor of Classics, left Williams at the end of Winter Study to teach in the history department of Davidson College in North Carolina, and Kathleen A. Foster resigned from her position as Assistant Professor of Art at the close of the spring semester.

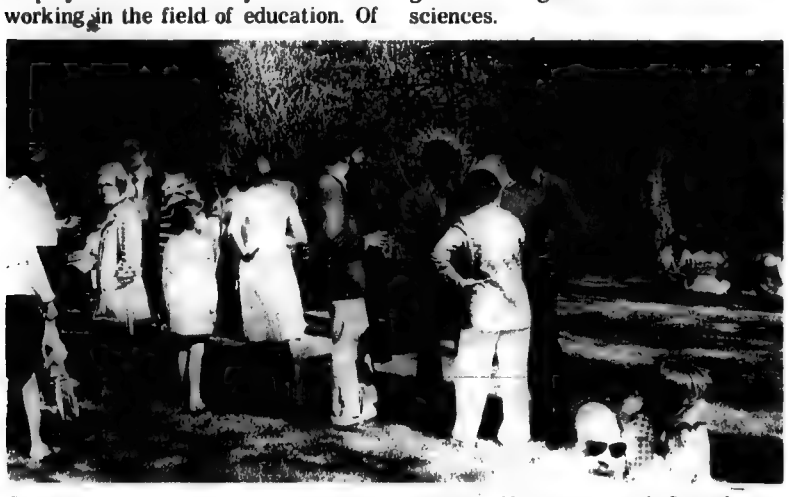
Seniors' plans vary

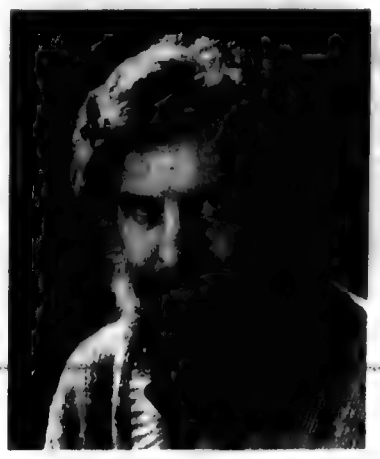
The Office of Career Counseling presented a preliminary report to President Chandler Thursday which outlined the career plans of this year's graduating class. According to the report and the projections of Director of Career Counseling, Mary Margaret Sloane, approximately one-third of the Class of 1977 will enter employment and another third will be enrolled in graduate study programs. The final third of the class remains unsure of their career plans or still awaits decisions on job or graduate school applications.

Sloane emphasized that OCC's figures were very tentative as they represent information on only 260 of the 441 members of the graduating class. The statistics were compiled from early returns of a survey distributed to all seniors. "More accurate figures should be available next week when all of the questionnaires hopefully will be in," Sloane said.



In the employment category, education drew the largest number of seniors of those responding to the survey. Thirty-two of the 118 seniors listed as being employed or seeking employment for next year will be working in the field of education. Of these 32 graduates, four will be teaching in Japan under the auspices of the Cook Program.

The preliminary figures indicated that 28 seniors will be employed in finance, the second most popular field. Banking in particular accounted for twenty of the graduates pursuing careers in finance.



Employment in government, business and science was also frequently noted on the survey responses.

The OCC report listed 128 seniors as attending graduate schools next year, the majority predictably in medicine and law schools, Sloane noted. Thirty-five seniors will attend medical schools and an additional six will be enrolled in veterinary, dental and health services programs. The preliminary statistics indicated that only 32 graduates will attend law school in the fall but Sloane predicted that the number would almost double during the summer.

Sloane noted that "a surprisingly large number" of seniors intend to pursue graduate study in computer science. Six graduates will attend business school and 22 will seek graduate degrees in the arts and sciences.

Ruggers impressive in two seasons; graduating players open key spots

by Jamie Edwards and John Greer

With impressive showings in both the fall and spring seasons, the Williams Rugby Club ended the year with a 10-3-2 record. Dramatically improved teamwork and a revitalized attitude turned what was expected to be a rebuilding year for the club into one of its strongest ever.

With the momentum of a 6-1-1 fall behind them, the Eph ruggers fared almost as well during their more rigorous spring schedule. Highlighting the spring were come-from-behind victories over Colgate and Harvard, long time Purple nemeses. In both games, the superior play of the scrum, led by Jim Stuart and Bill O'Reilly, was decisive.

The Ephs' two losses of the spring both came in one afternoon; both, unfortunately at the hands of Little Three rivals Amherst and Wesleyan. Despite respectable showings in both games, the Ephs were hampered by rain, mud, and fatigue from the previous day's victory over Albany Law. Amherst was the strongest club the Ephs faced all spring, and held Williams scoreless for the first time in ten meetings. The Williams B-side salvaged what was left of a wet afternoon, edging Wesleyan 6-3, and tying for the Little Three B-side title.

Injuries particularly weakened the line's offensive punch in the last games of the spring season. While the Ephs could depend on superior scrumwork and Dave Levy's kicking to outlast Springfield, 10-6, an uninspired effort resulted in a scoreless tie with Siena in their final match.

After dropping their first match to Columbia, 18-9, the Ephs went undefeated for the remainder of the fall, scoring a total of 89 points to their opponents' 26. Williams was a strong second half team, coming from behind in several contests, and ending the season by blanking its last three opponents, including arch rival Amherst and Boston University, 27-0 Eph victims.

Graduation will open several key positions for next fall. Club Secretary Jamie Edwards, a four year veteran, will be vacating his spot at outside along with hard-hitting Dave Libardi. At wing, Byrne Kelly and Sam Hanchett will bow out. Eph scrum will be without the talents of Marshall Partington and Buzz Inboden, or the talented toes of kicker Dave Levy, the team's leading scorer. Also opening up is the scrum-half position, held this year by team Captain John Greer.

Nevertheless, the Eph ruggers can look forward to promising seasons next year. Many established A-side players will be returning in the fall, and several consistent B-siders will be moving up under the leadership of newly-elected co-captains Dewey Power and Jim Stuart.

Phi Betes honor Stocking

The Williams College chapter of Phi Beta Kappa, the national honor fraternity, initiated 110 graduating seniors and honored Morris Professor of Rhetoric Fred H. Stocking at its June meeting Saturday morning at the Bronfman Science Center.

Students with above a B+ (9.0) average and ranking in the top ten per cent of their class are elected to Phi Beta Kappa at the end of their junior year. To be elected at the end of his senior year, a student must have at least a 9.0 average and rank in the top quarter of his class.

The cutoff point for Phi Beta Kappa this year was a GPA of 9.26 on a scale of 12 this year (3.42 on a 4 point scale).

Because the Williams chapter of Phi Beta Kappa was chartered before the national chapter, Williams is able to set its own standards for election to Phi Beta Kappa. The national standards are more stringent.

The student members of the Williams chapter honored Prof. Stocking as a distinguished member of the Williams faculty. Student President William C. Schmidt cited Stocking for his gifted teaching and service to the College. Last year J. Clay Hunt, retiring John Hawley Roberts Professor of English, was so honored.

Stocking was principal speaker at the initiation ceremonies.

In other business, Schmidt announced that the chapter had voted to donate the remainder of its 1976-1977 treasury to the Robert L. Gaudino Memorial Fund.

The fund was started in 1975 by friends and former students of the late professor of Political Science to promote "experiential and experimental" educational experiences by Williams students, according to Associate Provost David A. Booth.

Booth is secretary of an advisory council of Gaudino's former students which administers the fund. Booth stressed that the goal of the fund was to offer incentives for students and faculty to come up with new educational ideas. This spring, the fund helped to support an urban studies program in New York City sponsored by the Political Science Department.

In addition to President Schmidt, other student officers of the Williams Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa are Vice President Frederick M. Lawrence and Secretary-Treasurer Ann L. Ingerson. They were elected by the 48 students elected to Phi Beta Kappa after their Junior year.

Purple Key awards seniors

Seniors Tom Redden and Joninna Sadoff shared Williams College's highest athletic honors at the annual Purple Key Athletic Banquet held recently at Williams.

Redden won the Purple Key Trophy for men, awarded to the senior letterman who "best exemplifies leadership, team spirit, ability, and character," while Sadoff won the Purple Key trophy for women.

Both seniors had outstanding athletic careers at Williams. Redden was a three-year starter on the football and baseball teams, and captained both squads this past year. A fullback in football, Redden proved a key member of a team that compiled an 18-5-1 record and two Little Three titles in the past three years. He rushed for 954 yards, caught 57 passes for another 584 yards, and scored 10 touchdowns. A catcher in baseball, he batted .390 in 1976, when Williams compiled its best record in 20 years. In 1977 he batted .370 as the only senior on a young team, and earned the Robert W. Johnston Award as most valuable baseball player.

Sadoff has been the No. 1 singles player for three years on a women's tennis team that compiled a glittering 32-2 record and won the New England title last fall.

According to women's tennis coach Curt Tong, "The committee saw in her not only an outstanding athlete but a person who has distinguished herself in other ways too." He cited particularly her strong character, capacity for growth, her leadership and the respect and admiration she has earned from her teammates.

Senior Ken Leinbach received the Willard E. Hoyt, Jr. Memorial Award, presented annually to the senior man who best combines superior athletic performance with academic excellence. A mathematics major, Leinbach holds the Williams record in the outdoor mile, and has qualified for the Division III national championships later this month. He also won the Anthony Plansky Award, given to the top track athlete.

Senior Amy Kindwall won the first-ever Class of 1925 prize, given to the top woman-scholar athlete. Kindwall, an economics major, was a co-captain and one of the leading scorers on last fall's field hockey team, which compiled an 8-3 record.

Other awards included the Belvidere Brooks Memorial Medal in football to senior Dave Libardi; the Michael D. Rakov Memorial Award for the most improved lineman in football to junior Peter Tuttle; the Charles Dewoody Salmon Award to the top sophomore in football to John Thiel; the Fox Memorial Soccer Trophy to senior Jim Hield; and the Franklin F. Olmstead Award in cross country to junior Joe Kolb.

Also, the Oswald Tower Award for the most valuable basketball player to seniors Mike Tanner and Tim Hester; the Young-Jay Hockey Trophy, to senior Ralph "Patch" Mason; the Robert B. Muir Swimming Trophy to senior Dennis O'Shea; the Leonard S. Prince Memorial Award for the outstanding freshman swimmer to Dave Amlicke; the Paul B. Richardson Swimming Trophy for top point-scorer to freshman Todd Piper; the J. Edwin Bullock Wrestling Trophy to senior Jeff May; the Squash Racquets Prize to senior Mark Reinhardt; and the Ralph J. Townsend Ski Trophy to senior Gary James.

Also, the Lacrosse Award for the outstanding player to junior Todd Eckerson; the Golf Trophy, for the winner of the annual tournament, to senior Dave Tomaszek; the Scribner Memorial Tennis Trophy to junior Jim Parsons; the Rockwood Tennis Cup Prize for the winner of the singles tournament, to sophomore Martin Goldberg.

Laxmen named all-stars

Senior captain Jamie Taylor and juniors Todd Eckerson and Peter Unger have been named first team Snively Division All-Stars, varsity lacrosse coach Renzie Lamb has announced. Lamb added that sophomore Peter Thomsen received honorable mention.

Williams finished second in regular season Snively Division competition behind Middlebury. The division consists of most of the better small college teams in New England.

Taylor, a two-time All-New England selection notched 14 goals and six assists, second highest among Williams middies and turned in outstanding defensive play all season. Attackman Eckerson led Purple scoring with 18 goals and 47 assists, did some double duty on midfield runs and faceoffs and was named Most Valuable Player.

Unger, a three year defensive starter, consistently drew the opponent's top attackman and has been elected co-captain for next year along with Eckerson. Thomsen, though injured for nearly a third of the season, poured in 28 goals and 16 assists from his attack slot.

"The 1977 Middlebury team is an outstanding team and 13 goals better than we are," quipped Lamb after the Ephs second 13 point loss to Dennis Daly's Panthers in 10 days. The Middies walloped the Ephs, 25-12 at Middlebury May 14, to snag a third consecutive New England College Division tourney title and complement an 18-5 regular season.

The Panthers rated fifth to Williams tenth in the final New England coaches' poll, clamped down early on the prolific Eph offense and churned up a 17-3 halftime bulge before letting go. Eckerson managed three goals and a pair of assists, while Thomsen totaled one and three and Taylor worked up two scores and a feed.

The Ephs earned their third shot in five years at the tourney title they won in 1973, toppling Colonial Division champion Massachusetts Maritime, 17-5, in first round action in Williamstown. Buccaneer goalie Ralph Helms turned aside 22 shots, but his defense offered him little support and the Eph attackmen were hot all afternoon.

Thomsen stuffed six goals by Helms, Eckerson fed successfully 7 times, and in all 11 Ephs scored or assisted.

The Ephs 6-6 final record reflects five losses to four top ten New England schools, including a one goal nip from number two Dartmouth and a three goal loss to sixth listed Yale. It also includes a fifth straight Little Three championship, an upset win over eighth ranked Connecticut and six wins with an average margin of better than eight goals apiece.

Men's crew set to depart for Royal Henley Regatta

"If you're a Moslem you go to Mecca; if you're an oarsman you go to Henley," says men's crew coach Brian Dawe, and that's exactly what members of the Williams Boat Club are planning to do.

Tomorrow and Tuesday what are basically the varsity heavy and lightweight boats, sprinkled liberally with promising rowers from freshman boats, will depart for England and a month's intensive training for the world famous Royal Henley Regatta. The Henley, the oldest continuous meet in rowing and the top annual event in the sport, was created in the 1840's and usually features the world's best competition.

The Williams strokers will compete in the Lady's Plate and the Thames Cup, ranked second and third in prestige of the four events slated for eight man shells.

"If you have the time, opportunity and ability, you just have to go to Henley," explained Dawe. He noted that a Trinity boat captured the Lady's Plate last year and pointed out that Williams has been extremely competitive with the Bantams this year for the first time ever.

The Henley runs on a gruelling, match race format—a crew races until beaten; finalists race five times in four days over the mile and five-sixteenths course.

The Williams lights settled for third at the Dad Vail Eastern small college championships after qualifying for the finals a commanding first. The paddlers lost five seconds on an early crab, but made up enough water to finish .6 seconds behind LaSalle and only .1 behind Coast Guard.

The heavies failed to make the finals, but won the petite finals handily to finish seventh overall.

Sports Shorts: Williams winds up the year

Baseball

The Ephs took the nightcap of a doubleheader at Wesleyan May 14, ending their season and a losing streak that had been extended to ten games with a one-run loss in the opener.

"It was as good a season as we've ever had, when you consider that the guys refused to give up during that streak," said Williams Coach Jim Briggs, who will be losing only one starter from his young team. The Ephs, with only three regulars returning from last year's 11-5 squad, Williams' best in 20 years, had raced out to a 6-1 record before disaster struck.

The Ephs earned their long-awaited victory, a 6-1 decision, on the strength of seven-hit pitching by sophomore Tony Stall who raised his record to 3-2. Stall did not allow the Cardinals a run until their last at-bat in the seventh.

In the nine-inning opening game, Williams ace Steve Maier suffered his second one-run loss in Little Three play when Wesleyan pushed across a run in the bottom of the ninth to edge the Ephs, 8-7. The Ephs, who during the losing streak often found themselves playing catch-up ball, this time found themselves with leads of 5-1 and 7-5, but couldn't hold them.

In the Williams victory, Frank Kreutz and catcher Tom Redden, the team captain and only senior, each had two hits to cap outstanding seasons. Kreutz, a sophomore, batted a phenomenal .492 (sixth in NCAA Division III) and had 23 r.b.i.'s (seventh). He walked 13 times and struck out only once. Redden, recently voted Williams' top male senior athlete, finished at .370 with six r.b.i.'s.

The doubleheader split at Wesleyan leaves Williams with a 2-4 record in Little Three play. Wesleyan finished at 2-3, while Amherst won the title with a 4-1 mark.

Golf

The Williams golfers completed an outstanding 9-4 season May 12 when they routed both Union and A.I.C. at the Taconic Golf Course. The Ephmen, at an even 400, finished 26 strokes ahead of Union and 80 in front of the Yellowjackets. Senior Dave Tomaszek and freshman Charles Oudin paced Williams with 79s.

The match marked the Williams finale for Tomaszek and fellow seniors Steve Saunders, Chris Vogelsang, and Barney Ireland.

Tennis

The Williams tennis team lost its final match to Colgate last Tuesday, 8-1, ending the team's chances for a better-than-.500 season and spoiling the farewell of Williams Coach Dave Johnson, whose two-year stint as interim tennis and squash coach ended with the match.

"I knew when we started that we would have a tought time finishing over .500, so we actually did all right," said Johnson. "And this team should be stronger next year because everyone will be returning."

Johnson's original pessimism stemmed from the loss just prior to the start of the season of his No. 1 doubles player and Nos. 2 and 3 singles players. But after losing their first two matches to opponents they had beaten last year, the Ephs fought back to a 5-5 record before the Colgate match, and finished a surprising sixth at the New England championships.

No. 1 singles player Martin Goldberg and No. 4 Tad Roach led the Ephs with 7-4 marks. The doubles teams of Goldberg and Bill Whelan and Roach and Evan Bash each had six victories.

Women's crew

The women's lightweight eight overhauled boats from MIT and Notre Dame over the last 500 meters of the finals to nab third place at the Eastern Championships on Lake Quinsigimond in Worcester on May 15. Their heavyweight teammates knocked off seventh seeded Mount Holyoke in the trials to qualify for the petite (consolation) finals, finishing fifth there and eleventh overall.

The lights, a young crew including four freshmen and an inexperienced junior exchange, clicked better than they had all spring, rowing smoothly by Penn and Radcliffe B in the early going. They passed the Engineers and Irish in a powerful final sprint, but couldn't overtake first place Radcliffe A or the runner-up Boston University boat.

The heavies upset the Lyons with a top performance in the trials and held a sharp and smooth third place behind Rutgers and Connecticut College through the first 1000 meters of the petite finals. Disaster struck in the closing sprint as the boat floundered through a series of mis-strokes. Massachusetts and Brown sped by but the Ephwomen held off Virginia to salvage their eleventh place.

Yale nipped Radcliffe to capture the heavyweight title.

Women's rugby

Sophomores Tricia Beckwith and Judy Dayton each scored fast break tries as the newly formed women's rugby squad parlayed just two weeks of practise into an 8-3 victory over another first year side from Siena.

Beckwith broke six Siena tackles in a 75 yard run late in the first half to open the Eph scoring. Dayton's try resulted from expert line passing from Fullback Linda Collins, prop Roslyn Sareyan and second row Cindy Tuft in a play that men's captain John Greer said "made the men's team envious because of its superior team work."

Women's captain Ginny Doherty cited particularly alert play by Tufts and Sareyan, two scrum players who would normally not be involved in a line pass play.

The ruggers stiffened defensively after allowing a successful drop kick early in the game. Early jitters disappeared and the women put together an impressive, organized team performance.

Track

Junior weightman Larry Tanner finished sixth in the hammer throw at the NCAA Division III Track and Field Championships held last weekend at Calvin College in Grand Rapids, Michigan. Tanner's 173 foot heave left him just short of his own College record, but landed him recognition as a Division III All-American. Tanner, Little Three hammer titlist, also placed sixth at the Easterns in early May.

Senior Captain Ken Leinbach competed at 1500 meters, turning in a 3:54.8 clocking, exactly the metric equivalent of his College record 4:12.8 time for the mile. Leinbach, winner of the Little Three mile and third place finisher at the Easterns, as well as winner of the Hoyt Scholar-Athlete Award, did not advance beyond the trials in the stiffly competitive National meet.

Track coach Dick Farley has also announced that junior Frank Carr has been elected captain of next spring's squad. Carr, a middle-distance runner, is also president of Gar-Wood House and co-sports editor of The Record.

Williams welcomes 480 frosh to Class of '81

Ann Ingerson's valedictory address 'Fear and Loathing'

President Chandler, Trustees, onored Guests, Members of the aculty, Fellow Seniors, Parents and riends: Commencement is a time to elebrate the achievements of our ollege years and to look forward to iture successes. But I'll bet very few us feel that gleeful confidence hich this occasion is supposed to spire. My failures, at least, seem uch more important than my chievements. So at the risk of being ought a pessimist, I'd like to tell you bout my own major failure at illiams. It is a failure which could

Ann Ingerson '77 addressed her classmates last June on "Fear and Trembling and the Stagnation of Learning." Ann, the class valedictorian, told of her failures. Her speech, which is reprinted here, has a message for the Class of 81. (photo by Tague)

46% of freshmen are women, yields closest ratio ever

Four hundred eighty new faces will arrive from forty-three states and around the world will descend on the Village Beautiful to form Williams' Class of '81.

The coincidence of Labor Day Weekend and the start of Freshman Days, the traditional social and academic orientation period for freshmen, has meant the postponement of the start of classes to Thursday, September 8 and forced most College offices to remain open on Labor Day.

The 258 men arriving represent a 10 per cent drop from last year's entering class, while the 222 women represent a 5 per cent increase. The class is the most evenly matched in the short history of coeducation at Williams with 54 per cent men and 46 per cent women. Nineteen and one-tenth per cent of the male applicants and 20.4 per cent of the female applicants received letters of admission. Forty-eight per cent of the men and forty-seven per cent of the women accepted elected to attend this fall.

Philip F. Smith, director of admissions at Williams, says the new class is "slightly more diverse" than in past years in that they come from a wider variety of school backgrounds. "Places that never popped up before," says Smith, have contributed students to the new freshman class. Sixty-two per cent of the new students are from 244 different high schools across the nation, while 38 per cent hail from either independent day schools or private boarding schools.

While most of the students, about 65 per cent, come from the Middle Atlantic and New England states, as opposed to 72 per cent last year, more than one-third of the new class comes from other parts of the country and from foreign nations.

According to Smith, interest in Williams by students from the West, Mid-West and South seems to be increasing. "Challenge is often the word they use to describe what they are looking for in a school," says Smith, adding that the school's size, the quality of its programs and a sense of community apparently influence decisions to apply to Williams.

A guide to getting things done at Williams

When you enter your room on the rst day of college and discover here's no bed, what do you do? When ou find yourself registered in linear lgebra after barely struggling hrough last year's trigonometry, hat do you do? When you want to tart a Chinese Pottery Club, what do ou do? When you want a Singapore ling that glows in the dark, what do ou do?

While it's true that one man with ith can move mountains, finding a iend with a bulldozer is faster. To very question there is an answer; nd you'll save yourself a lot of grief if ou find someone who's already assled through to it.

Don't think your complaint or uggestion isn't justified—it probably . Don't think it will automatically be ealt with—it undoubtedly won't.

Stoic endurance won't ruffle any athers. Neither will it get you a bed. xplosive tantrums will be equally effective. Hardly anyone does ings out of malice here, although ere is no known limit to stupidity.

Junior Advisers are usually the best arting point for complaints, queries nd diatribes. While they have taken tests to prove their knowledge of illiams ("How many steps to the top Hopkins Hall?"), or necessarily een chosen for their incisive inllects, JA's have the decided adntage of having gone through the st's equivalent of the days ahead—he best years of your life."

A caution: One of the advantages of JA over the information sheets blished under the College's aegis is at he gives you a straight answer as "This stinker" or "You shouldn't iss that" or "You can get it cheaper ." The danger is that you might ke what he says as gospel. Keep in ind that negative comments about a ath course may effect more his or r lack of ability in the subject than y evil in the course.

A simple cure to such over pendence is getting to know as any people as possible. Upclassmen are easier to get to know an in the past, what with freshman using extending well away from the reshman Quad, and are usually ite friendly—maybe too friendly.

Academically, the college has signed you a faculty adviser to tell u everything you never want to ow about the Williams curriculum. theory, he teaches courses in an ea that interests you. He can come a valuable ally at Williams d even more valuable when you ed references for grad school and b applications. Certainly he is your st hope in getting officialdom to cognize your desires.

On the other hand, he might teach a mpletely different subject and know le of the courses you want to take. Don't let him force you into any decisions you don't want to make. There is nothing to restrict you to the wisdom of this one adviser.

Usually the best source of information on a course is the professor teaching it. See him. Don't be scared away by the course description. An amazing revelation occurs when you read that description after you've finished the course.

Many professors hesitate to take the initiative in developing relations with students. They sit in their offices and wonder why no one visits them other than around exams. The reason they do so is a reluctance to intrude.

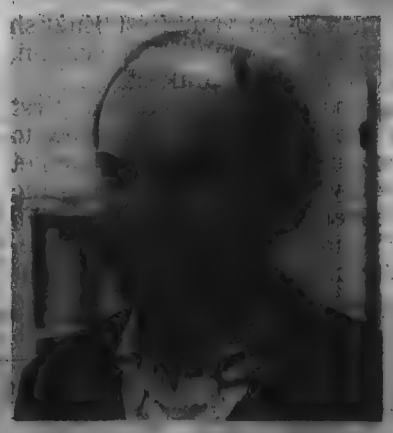
You have to do the intruding. The results are usually rewarding. For one, a professor can handle your questions much more effectively before the exam time crunch. Beyond supplying recommendations later on, friends on the faculty can often steer you into summer job and study opportunities, particularly in the sciences. On a less selfish plane, faculty members tend to be interesting people, especially when removed from the classroom.

The power of the administration (what there is of it) is centralized in the Dean's office. Here you're likely to find a quick and authoritative answer to your queries, even if it's "I don't know." The point is that if they don't know the answer, they are expected to know where to look for it.

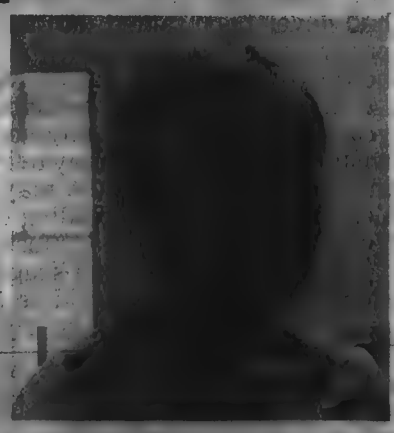
As a freshman, you'll have the most contact with Dean Stevens. Hardly a disciplinarian (they don't survive long at Williams) he tends to expend much energy making sure personal apple carts are not upset. Although what rules exist here are highly flexible, it's easy to feel trapped in a given course load or living situation. Stevens has the power to miraculously untrap you.

Williams is a haven for individuals. Treat the whole thing as an experiment. Ask questions. If you need a favor, ask someone for it. He'll probably surprise you by doing it.

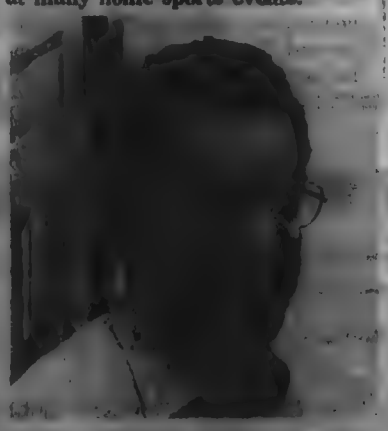
All of this assumes that you get off your butt and take the first step.



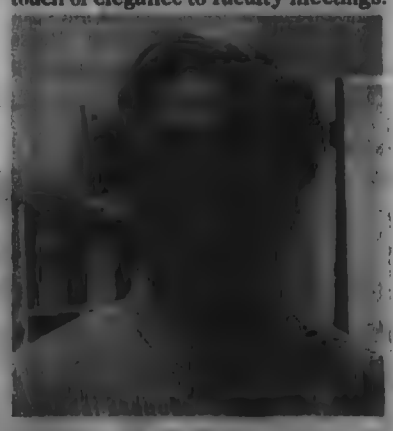
The dean's team: who's what in Hopkins Hall



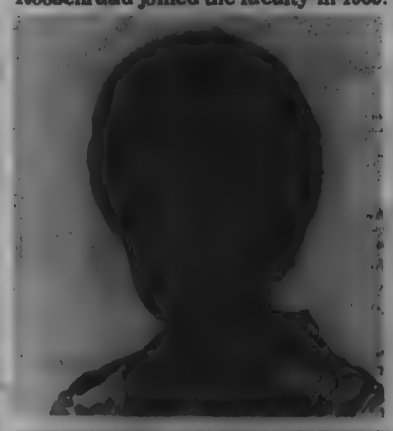
PRESIDENT JOHN W. CHANDLER will meet freshmen during receptions at his house this week. The president over-sees both the academic and financial aspects of the College, often meeting with alumni groups in efforts to raise money to support the College. He is an avid sports fan seen at many home sports events.



DEAN OF THE FACULTY FRANCIS C. OAKLEY represents faculty viewpoints in administrative circles and has an important role in the hiring, firing and promoting of Williams faculty. A professor of history, Oakley attended Oxford and Yale. His soft English accent adds a touch of elegance to faculty meetings.



ASSOCIATE DEAN CRIS T. ROOSENRAAD handles relations with the residential houses as well as disciplinary problems. Admired by many for his frankness, Roosenraad is perhaps more radical than most of the student body. There is no more tireless worker in the administration. Roosenraad joined the faculty in 1969.



ASSOCIATE DEAN NANCY J. McINTIRE'S interests are exchange and transfer students and women's affairs. Appointed in 1970, McIntire was the first woman to occupy the position of associate dean. She graduated from New Hampshire and Harvard and is a member of Phi Beta Kappa.

PETER BEREK, DEAN OF THE COLLEGE, is responsible for the day to day operation of the school. For an Amherst lad (class of '61), he shows unusual perception, subtlety, and sensitivity. Berek is a flexible administrator, but touches of the English professor come through in his articulate if turgid letters.

LAUREN R. STEVENS, DEAN OF FRESHMEN, is the person whom freshmen deal with most. Hardly the disciplinarian, Stevens is a compassionate administrator whose goal is the elimination of hassles. A faculty member since 1963, Stevens is beginning his eighth year as dean of freshmen.

ASSISTANT DEAN EILEEN JULIEN is the administrative liaison with the College Council and Finance Committee and has a special interest in minority affairs. Starting her third year at Williams, Julien attended Xavier College and the University of Wisconsin. She has served as an instructor in English.

HENRY N. FLYNT, ASSOCIATE DEAN AND DIRECTOR OF FINANCIAL AID coaches freshman soccer for twenty years at Williams, leading his teams to seven Little Three titles. A 1967 Williams graduate, Flynt has the thankless responsibility of making decisions on financial aid.

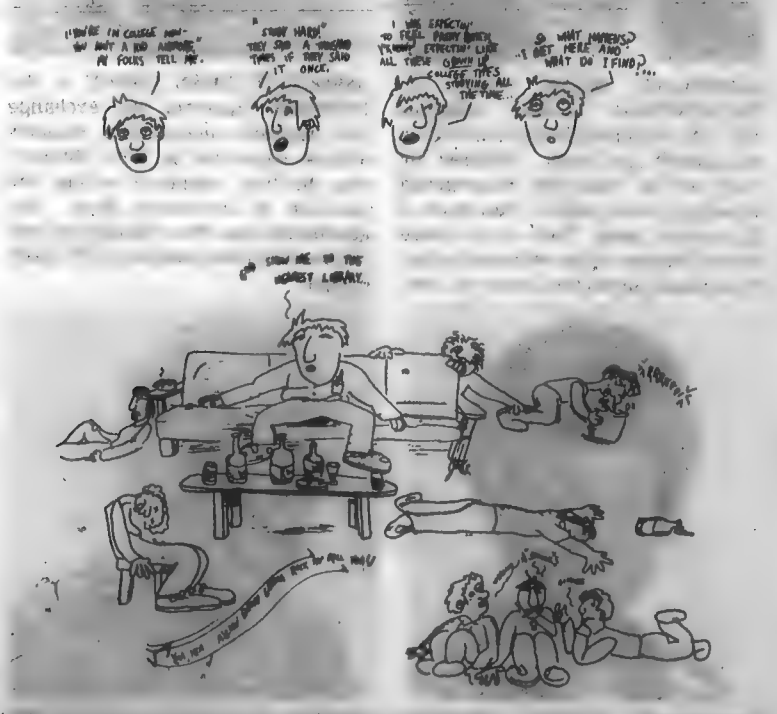
In The Beginning

To readers new to Williams and The Williams Record, welcome! We are the campus newspaper of Williams College, publishing on Tuesdays and Fridays throughout the academic year. This introductory issue seeks to hint at the variety that is Williams. We hope its somewhat opinionated contents will prove informative and occasionally useful.

Freshmen will quickly note that this editorial is yet another pompous greeting. Nevertheless, our wish for good luck and a productive four years is sincere.

Freshmen parents will probably find more time to read this issue than their offspring, who are certainly finding more than enough to keep them busy. We hope we can count parents among our readers in the future. The Record often becomes the only source of news from the campus when letters falter.

Parents and freshmen (not to mention even more confused College officials) are already caught in the madness of Freshman Days—that time warp in which Williams suddenly evolves from a map and catalog reference into a world that never ceases to touch those who have once entered it. A confusion of activities, faces, annoyances and too little sleep overwhelm everyone until individuals suddenly find themselves cast in the role of college students.



It gets quieter, but probably no saner.

Go Your Own Way

Freshman year at Williams is an experience. It can consist of waterfights in the quad, hikes up Pine Cobble, roadtripping, and midnight trips for pizza at Constantine's. It can also consist of a roommate that you can't stand, a class that you wish you had never been talked into taking, a C- on your first English paper and long nights in the library. One thing is certain, however, your freshman year will be what you make it.

Lots of people will be telling you how to spend your first year here soon. Your professors may tell you to learn how to write. Your roommate may tell you to study hard so you can get into med school. Your JA may tell you to relax and go to the Log. Organizations, including the Record, will tell you to join. You may justifiably be confused as to who you should believe.

We humbly offer one suggestion. Rather than doing what someone else thinks would be good for you, why not set some goals and go your own way. You'll never have a better chance.

The Record returns triumphantly for yet another year of journalistic prostitution! The next issue will appear Friday, Sept. 9. Deadline for that issue will be Wednesday at 2:00 p.m. The following week, the Record will commence regular publication on its semi-weekly schedule. Issues will appear at all dining halls before dinner on Tuesdays and Fridays. Deadlines will be Sunday and Wednesday at 2:00 p.m. respectively. Letters, comments and unsolicited work are welcome, but editing rights are reserved.

Shopping in Billsville

It's not quite Bloomingdales

If your pushy mother made you pore over the Yale Daily News' Insider's Guide to the College, you have undoubtedly been prepared for the fact that the 300 yard-long row of stores that line Spring Street is the nucleus of the shopping district here. But the people from New Haven neglected to elaborate on the delights of a Williamstown shopping spree.

Downtown Williamstown, (the college is the suburban area) has something for everyone. You just have to keep looking.

After all, a small town does have its advantages. You can cash a check from Peoria, Illinois almost anywhere and the shopkeepers are, for the most part, incredibly friendly and helpful.

Unfortunately, after examining the town's commercial offerings, many students feel they are being "ripped-off." Often accustomed to a much wider selection of goods and variety of establishments, they claim that store owners charge overly-high prices for goods simply because they are in a monopoly situation.

A year ago, the Record did a series of comparison surveys of Spring Street stores with stores outside the immediate college area. The finding was generally that, while prices may be a bit higher than usual at some of the student-frequented establishments, it seems to be more a function of the size and type of stores than an effort by Williamstown merchants to capitalize on the student trade.

According to the survey, it is profitable for students to buy health items and school supplies at supermarkets or discount stores before coming to school.

Health items at Hart's Pharmacists on Spring Street, for example, may sell for as much as 50 per cent over supermarket prices but are comparable in cost to those at a North Adams drugstore.

Edward N. Conroy, a part owner and pharmacist at Hart's, said that the greater volume of business done at larger stores makes it possible for them to have lower mark-ups on goods than at small pharmacies.

Also, he explained, under Massachusetts law a pharmacist must be present at all times when a drugstore is open. According to Conroy, paying this professional, along with privding delivery service, allowing charges, and maintaining an adequate staff to provide good service, raises the overhead of a small business and forces prices up.

A similar situation exists concerning school supplies. While prices at Spring Street's McClelland Press may seem high when compared to those at Zayre's, they are not any higher than at Lamb's Stationery Store in North Adams.

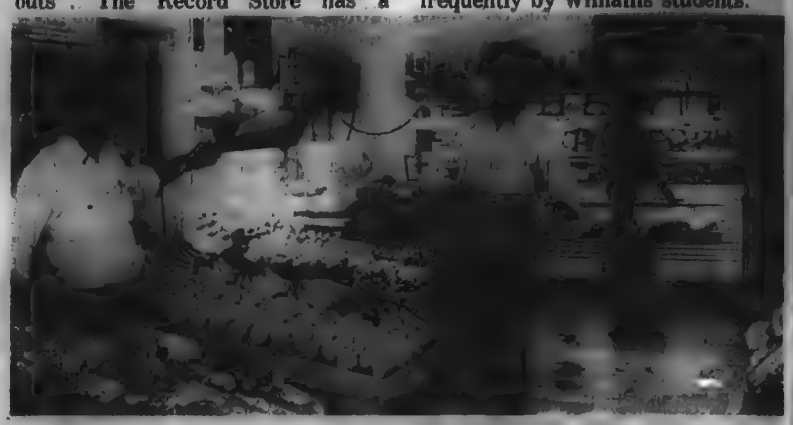
Again, high overhead costs and an inability to buy in large quantities were cited as reasons.

"We might buy a couple of dozen of some item," explained employee Marion Jammalo, "while Zayre's will buy a couple of hundred dozen of this item."

However, while a student may save $.06 on a Bic pen by shopping at Zayre's, he will be unable to find a 10-octave music notebook at the discount store. Because there is little public demand for this item, Zayre's does not carry it while McClelland Press stocks the item for the small group who uses it.

A comparison of liquor prices showed that, while wine prices vary somewhat from store to store, those of beer and hard liquor are pretty much standardized.

Ray Smith, owner of King's Liquor Store on Spring Street, said that prices are based on a "Suggested Minimum Consumer Resale Price List" published bimonthly by the State of Massachusetts. This publication gives the current minimum price that a store owner must charge.



According to Smith, most liquor stores have their prices near this baseline. He admitted that King's has an advantage over other nearby liquor stores because of its Spring Street location. In general, King's prices are somewhat higher than the other stores'.

A more significant difference lies between Massachusetts and Vermont liquor prices. In Vermont, liquor stores are state-owned and prices are standardized. Under this system, Vermont liquor prices are significantly lower than those in Massachusetts. Cigarettes are priced similarly.

Last year, three new record stores opened in Williamstown and all provide good buys for the shopper who is willing to take the time to go through their discount racks. Toonerville Trolley, which is located on Water Street features an extensive collection of manufacturers' "cut-outs". The Record Store has a "Bargain Bin," and a "Budget Classical Selection" section and Discoveries offers "Super-Savings" on many albums. It should be noted that Discoveries also sells used LP's and that the management will buy used records from students.

As far as food prices are concerned, the limited amount that is sold in Williamstown compares favorably with the larger supermarkets which are located further down Route 2. The Slippery Banana has fresh fruits and vegetables, lots of cheese and crackers and Hagen-Dazs ice cream. Nearby, the bakery has good, inexpensive cookies and cakes and homemade bread.

There is a smattering of a few other types of stores around. Goffs' and the Arcadian Shop feature sporting goods and clothing. Clothing boutiques include Penny's Place, House of Walsh, The Cottage Boutique, and Country Casuals. The Women's Exchange on Cole Avenue is Williamstown's exclusive thrift shop. The Williams Co-op offers all kinds of Williams memorabilia in addition to its regular stock. The Potter's Wheel has nice jewelry, pottery and hand-blown glass pieces. The Country Peddler offers used furniture, however, it is located on Route 2, a couple of miles down towards North Adams. Salvatore's has shoes. The book stores, and the News Room and McClelland's stationery store are all visited frequently by Williams students.

Tom Herwitz stocks up on fruit at the Slippery Banana. The Spring Street health food stores also carries cheese, and lots of esoteric natural foods.

The arts in Williamstown

Culture comes to the country

by Tom Herwitz

A long time ago, Williams College decided that it would not let its geographical isolation from a cultural center thwart its desire for cultural enrichment. Since that time, the arts have become more and more prominent and substantial in Williamstown.

World renowned is the Clark Art Institute—just a short walk out South Street. The scope of the museums holding is great, though the Clark's specialty is its collection of French impressionist paintings. In fact, the centermost room in the old building is like a giant bon-bon box full of Renoir's. A side hallway is covered with Toulouse-Lautrec, Monet, Sisley, Pissaro, and Degas. There are other rooms with the French Salon artists, the old Masters, the Americans and gallerys for the many visiting exhibitions which the Clark brings in.

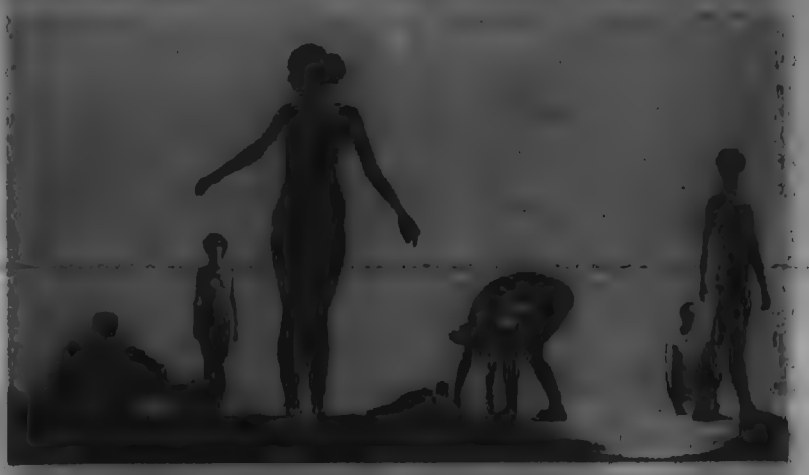
But the Clark is not only a fine museum because of its superb collection—it is also a living museum always bustling with activity. The Clark sponsors throughout the year (and mostly free to students) a number of lectures, performing groups, and films. Music from Marlboro will be at the Clark again this year to offer some of the finest Chamber music in the country. The Clark will also sponsor (among other things this fall) a weekly film series of Kenneth Clark's Civilization.

The strength of Williams' own Lawrence Museum lies not in the excellence of individual pieces but in its eclecticism. In the museum there are one or two pieces to illustrate a wide range of period or medium. To illustrate a trend in art it is not necessary to use the best but the representative. Lawrence has pieces from the Ibo tribe of Nigeria to Winslow Homer watercolors; from a patchwork silk priest robe of the Shinshu sect to Claus Oldenburg soft sculpture. Many of these are in hidden nooks, often a search is necessary. The museum along with the Art department also sponsors lectures, films, and visiting exhibitions. This fall the museum will host an exhibition of Charles Moore's architectural plans, photographs by Ben Shahn, the Mass. Arts and Humanities competition winners, and a video installation, among other exhibits. The Student Art Gallery in Dodd House is a small area where student artwork can usually be found on display.

The performing arts at Williams offer the opportunity to be both audience and participant. The Theater department produces several mainstage productions each year at the Adams Memorial Theater (AMT). With the Theater major now a reality, the department's production wing is in full swing. Four main productions will be staged this year directed by members of the department. The Comedy of Errors, Waiting for Godot, Chekhov's Three Sisters, and Behan's The Hostage.

In addition about a dozen student productions are staged in the Studio Theater of the AMT. And, of course, there is the Freshman Revue to start off the year.

Music is another active area here. The Berkshire Symphony (based at Williams) performs several times a year as does the Music in the Round series of chamber music in Thompson Chapel. The Choral Society and student organized performances take place fairly regularly throughout the year. Outside performers are also brought in through the auspices of the Thompson Concert Series.



Popular music can be heard almost as often with a number of major concerts and a Jazz series during Winter Study. Last year saw Arlo Guthrie, J. Geils, Charlie Mingus, and David Sancious among others. Folk and blues singers can be seen almost every weekend in the Rathskellar at the Williams Coffee House and student performers take over at the Log, the British Maid, the Williams Inn and other local nightspots.

One of the finest concert series at the college is sponsored each year by the Williams Dance Society. Each year renowned dance troupes spend two or three days in residence at Williams. They give master classes, lecture-demonstrations, open rehearsals, and full performances allowing the dance enthusiast to become totally absorbed in the individual company's theories, techniques, and repertoire. These residencies are also a perfect way to introduce the glory of dance to the newcomer.

This year, the Society brings Meredith Mark - The House (next week), Merce Cunningham and Dance Company in March, and Don Waganer and Dancers in May. The Society will also present, in conjunction, with Kenneth Roberts and the Williams Choral Society, Franz Lehar's The Merry Widow— auditions are being held this week.

Movies are varied and abundant in the area with the Williams Film Society showing popular second runs every Friday in Bronfman (this year some highlights include Play It Again Sam, Scenes from a Marriage, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?, That's Entertainment, Peter Pan, Nashville, and Fritz the Cat.)

There is a classic film festival on Saturday nights sponsored by the Williams Film Group with films of the great masters Truffaut, Bergman, Fellini, Antonioni, Da Sica and others. The Nickelodeon is an arts-repertory theater on Spring Street with three different classic movies a week (monthly listings available at the theater) and popular films are always available in North Adams and Pittsfield. Movies have become a big activity for many houses and organizations on campus, so often there is a film every night of the week.

Merce Cunningham and Dance Company performing their work of 1969 entitled CANFIELD. This troupe is scheduled to appear here in March as part of the Williams College Dance Society concert series. Many musicians, films, plays and art exhibitions will also be featured in Williamstown this year. See the Arts preview on this page.

Big Mac

And if the urge comes to hit the true urbs culturae—New York City, or the Cambridge-Boston area—it is not too difficult. Either one is about the same distance—three hours—and either holds a tremendous amount in store for those not familiar with the cities.

But never mind New York and Boston. You'll find that as the year starts rolling along, and the arts in Williamstown start moving into high gear, that the options right here at your doorstep are out of this world.

AMERICAN CANCER SOCIETY

Eating your heart out in the Purple Valley

If Williams holds true to tradition, you will soon be or just have been audience to Whitney Stoddard's legendary lecture "A Sense of Where You Are" in which he tells a little bit about the Williamstown area. Unfortunately, he doesn't tell you anything practical, like where the good places to eat are.

Well the good places to eat, if you're game to knowing, are in Paris and New York. These places being somewhat out of walking distance and more than a healthy drive away (particularly Paris), Williams students are forced to remain satisfied with the lesser local fare.

Any assessment of the local restaurants must be made with the vital "sense of where you are" in mind. You are in Williamstown, Mass., a small, backwoods town of pop. 5000. You are in the sticks, the boondocks. That is where you are. And as a result, you are unlikely to find very much of what in more metropolitan areas carries the label of "true class."

What you find instead are smaller, quieter places which have good though not exotic food, friendly service and very agreeable prices. You won't, in short, find anything as ritzy as Paris' Tour D'Argent here, but neither must you spend a tour d'argent (tower of money) to find a worthwhile diversion from the campus dining halls.

HIGH BUDGET APPROACH

MILL ON THE FLOSS—8 miles south of Williamstown on Route 7. Billed as an Old New England Inn with a French accent, the Mill has excellent food and service. One of the best restaurants in the area. If you're a seafood fan, don't miss the Coquilles Saint Jacques. The place to go when Mom and Dad are in town.

THE RAIN BARREL—In Bennington, it provides excellent dining with a Continental flair. Dress is casual and the atmosphere not particularly attractive, but the food and service more than compensate for this. Well worth the trip.

THE SPRINGS—Route 7 south, about 15 minutes from Williams towards Pittsfield—Another restaurant to save for a time when someone else is picking up the tab, preferably a rich aunt or a roommate's parents. Good but predictable food. Dinner includes a procession of complimentary extras including a tasty clam appetizer, cheese bread and an extensive relish tray. The atmosphere leaves a bit to be desired—the one large room doesn't lend itself well to intimate dining.

THE 1896 HOUSE—Route 2 south of Williams by about three miles—Entering their second year under new ownership, the steak house image seems to have gotten this old-timer back on its feet again. Nice rustic atmosphere, salad bar, sour hours and occasional live music.

LE COUNTRY RESTAURANT—Perhaps its biggest plus is its location, across from the Greylock Quad—Outdoes all its competitors with its long and varied menu of enticing entres but expect long waits and high prices. Favorites include Chicken Divan and Veal Cazadora, two of the medium priced dishes. When money and calories are no object, the meal inevitably begins with a half dozen escargots and concludes with a luscious kahlua parfait.

LE JARDIN—For elegant dining not many local restaurants can surpass Le Jardin. Located 3 miles south of Williams on Rt. 7, this lovely restaurant commands a lofty view of the surrounding countryside while providing delicious food, and higher prices accordingly. A Sunday brunch is the specialty.

THE BLACKFRIAR'S TAVERN—For enterprising diners willing to make the trek past Bennington, Vermont, this little restaurant located in an old New England house is a great spot. It's ideal for a kidnapping party, because the person will never know where he is being taken, and the home-cooked food is moderately priced.

THE PUBLICK HOUSE—In North Bennington, call for directions. The best steak and salad place in the area. Good steaks and fresh bread.

THE BRITISH MAID—On Route 2 just east of the College, it's a favorite for Williams people. It's a combination bar, restaurant and night club establishment. Unfortunately this quaint country restaurant has fallen in my estimation due to repeated cases of horrendous service.) The crepes, omelettes, salads and sandwiches remain excellent, however, and nothing is served that isn't fresh. Open for Breakfast.

THE WILLIAMS INN—The food and service do not match up to the local competition. Drinks are expensive in the bar, but the sound of the music played in the bar may be more damaging than the dent drinks put in one's wallet. We prefer the Maid.

LE BRASSERIE—In Bennington. A classy British Maid, better food and more expensive. A French flavor. Worth the trip.

GOURMET EAST—Route 2, five minutes east of Williams—As close as you'll come to Chinatown in the Purple Valley—the owners speak English but only the basics. Unfortunately, the prices are more typically Williamstown than Chinese but the food is certainly not your ordinary Baxter Hall fare.

THE TACONIC PARK—West of the College, at the intersection of Routes 2 and 7—Rarely discussed among the finer diners in the Williams set except for its Friday night, an all you can eat smorgasbord which is raved about.

THE RIVER HOUSE—just a few minutes walk out Water Street, this brand new restaurant offers a home style atmosphere and cooking to go with it. A salad bowl is brought to the table, just like home. Also caters to vegetarians. Staff members who have dined there give it good ratings.

MEDIUM BUDGET APPROACH

THE CAPTAIN'S TABLE—Just south of the College on Route 7. Seafood 180 miles from the sea; the food is carefully defrosted. Not our favorite.

COZY CORNERS RESTAURANT—North of the College on Route 7. Good for beer, spaghetti and reasonably priced pizza. Not a place to take a date or Mom and Dad, but an interesting escape from Baxter.

DOLPH'S INFERNO—Cafeteria style steak and salad bar. Reasonably cheap. Informal. East of the College on Route 2.

FOUR ACRES—Good food. Not the place to go for Parents' Weekend, but on most other occasions, it is worthy of a visit.

HOWARD JOHNSON'S—Despite the national reputation of Howard Johnson's, this is a restaurant that will actually be highly recommended by the local townspeople. The national reputation of course is as a place that was so bad that not even the roaches would go there for a meal, a place where if you left a tip it was only out of sympathy for the chef, who you knew had to be handicapped. The Williamstown Howard Johnson's belies all of this. One need not be a starving motorist on a lonely turnpike to have an excuse for eating there. It is clean, friendly, fast and most surprisingly, good. Ask for the "Pine Cobble" room.

STRONG STOMACH APPROACH

C&E—First za house on Spring Street. Overpriced, undersized Greek zas. Tasty grinders. Owned by Constantine.

COLONIAL PIZZA—Original home of Constantine. Listen, if you want Pizza, you've got no choice. Also, look for the peculiar colonial pizza trademark—which is almost worth ordering a pizza to see. It is picture of a colonial soldier on a horse delivering a pizza. Unfortunately, neither pizza shop will deliver on horseback or otherwise.

DIAU'S—Spring Street—A little high priced for a deli but unbeatable for convenience especially when it comes to combatting the post library or, better yet, post Log munchies. You name it, they'll make it but make sure to allow plenty of time for them to do it. Stresses quality and variety. One specialty is the feade smoothie—avacado and cream cheese on a bagel.

DUNKIN' DONUTS—On Route 2 in North Adams. Now here's a way to fend off the munchies 24 hours a day.

BURGER CHEF—On Route 2 two minutes closer than McDonald's. Only for those who cannot travel the extra five minutes.

McDONALD'S—In North Adams. If you've been to one, you've been to them all.

KENTUCKY FRIED CHICKEN— They use the Colonel's recipe with a little more than the usual amount of grease. Also fried ribs. On Route 2, east of the College. Seldom a crowd.

FRIENDLY'S—More expensive than the fast food joints, but much more satisfying. Good ice cream. Closes at midnight. On Route 2, east of town.

THE PURPLE PUB—On Bank St. For an evening snack, their sandwich is varied.

WEST END DELI—Definitely the home of the best cold sandwiches in the area. On Route 2 just east of town.

Transportation

A practical guide to escaping from school

Every year, hundreds of thousands of tourists "get away from it all" by coming to the Berkshires.

Thoreau referred to Williams when he said, "It would be no small advantage if every college were thus located at the base of a mountain."

Williams comes fairly close to Thoreau's ideal. Inevitably, though, everyone reaches a point where they have to get out of here, whether for a reassuring whiff of smog or to see how Bud tastes in Northampton.

Herewith some notations on the major transportation options.

Foot: Given that the College tends to encompass the heart of Williamstown, walking is actually not a bad option for daily transportation needs. The campus is within easy walking distance of three shopping areas—Spring St., Cole Ave. (by the railroad tracks) and the Colonial Shopping Center (about 15 minutes east on Rt. 2). However, in terms of getting to Boston, it's definitely unattractive.

Hitching: Granted that hitching is vaguely illegal in many towns and some states, many "young people" consider it the most viable way of getting from one point to another. Opponents point to the dangers: instances of rape, robbery and murder by drivers and hitchhikers alike; the fact that you know nothing about the driving ability of a random driver; and a possible run-in with the local constabulary.

Train: Occasionally of an evening, when the wind is right, you might hear a freight train rumble away to the north. So much for the rebirth of the railroad in Williamstown.

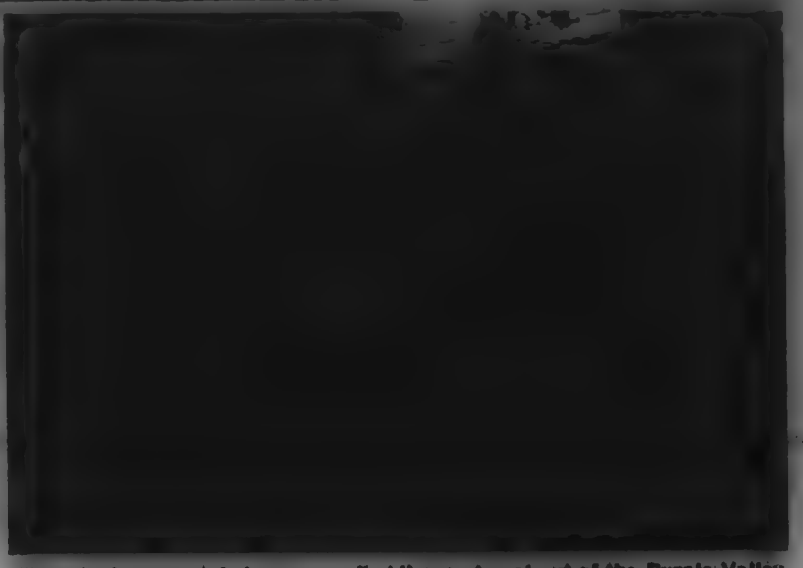
But if you like train travel and can get to Pittsfield or Albany, you may be able to catch a train. A train leaves Pittsfield each morning at 11:45 for points east arriving in Boston at 3:40 p.m. The 6:32 p.m. train from Pittsfield stops in Albany at 9:00, then Utica, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Erie, Cleveland, Toledo, South Bend and Chicago. You're better off if you catch it in Albany because the train must back into the Albany-Rensselaer station making it a two hour ride.

Seven trains run from Albany to Grand Central Station, New York, each day.

For more information, Call Amtrak: 800-523-5720.

Bus: Lest you despair that public transportation has totally ignored the Purple Valley, it is always possible to leave the driving to them and take the bus. You can thank Williamstown's location—the narrow cartermost town in Massachusetts, situated on two vaguely major routes (2 and 7)—for what service there is. Interstate Commerce Commission rules make it more profitable for a busline not to cross statelines. Hence, New Englander runs buses at dreadfully inconvenient hours to Boston. These buses as well as Vermont Transit's New York-Burlington line stop on Route 2 east of Currier Hall. Tickets and schedules are available at the sporting goods store at the corner of Routes 2 and 43.

As of September 7 Vermont Transit and Greyhound bus lines will have simplified their schedules. They eliminate half of the buses leaving town. The remainder depart for Pittsfield at 7:30 a.m. and 12:05 p.m. From Pittsfield a rider may make connections for virtually anywhere. Check a schedule.



In the afternoon Boston is six hours via Worcester or five by way of Springfield. The morning bus makes the trip in four and a half or six hours, respectively. The second bus, "the slowboat to China" seems to stop in every hick town in Connecticut at least six hours after leaving Williamstown.

Plane: Most Williams students fly from Albany but there are two other options. Bradley International Airport, located between Hartford and Springfield, does not close as often because of snow. Command Airways (499-0421) has four flights each day from Pittsfield to New York.

Unless you've got your own plane, Harriman Airport, in North Adams is almost useless.

Car: By far the most convenient and quickest way of getting anywhere is by car. If you own a car, congratulations. Although the College does much to discourage it, you've made the right decision.

First, freshmen are forbidden cars for the first semester. Thereafter, you may keep your car here, but must pay high registration fees and a propensity of both the town and College to ticket you for parking anywhere but in your assigned lot—in the case of freshmen, ridiculously stuck behind the tennis courts. Most drivers still feel that the convenience of driving the car offsets the costs.

Those lucky enough to have a car find it easy to get out of the Purple Valley. Others must brave the local train and bus service—and they don't get the girl.

Ingerson: failure through footnoting stifle a lot of healthy curiosity and turn education into a dull, repetitious task. And it is that very failure which has made me your valedictorian.

My first hint that I might have missed something valuable in my four years here came while I was preparing this speech. I had gone through eight or ten drafts, all carefully buttressed with impressive quotations, and following my paper-writing habits of at least ten footnotes per page. But a concerned friend warned me that if I insisted on being so "footnoty" I'd bore you all to tears. With that comment, I felt the ground crumble beneath my feet. What in the world could I manage to say without relying on the words of venerable authorities?

The next hint came the following day when my room-mate casually inquired, "Ann, do you think the will is the center of the self?". Never having faced that question quite so directly before, I was at a loss for words. But falling back on my philosophy courses, I could answer, "Well, that depends on who you listen to. Now, Neitzsche would say ..." But she wouldn't buy that. "I'm not interested in what different philosophers said. What do you think?" You can imagine, I was somewhat bewildered. Once again, left speechless without footnotes.

Those two events suggested to me that maybe my academic life at Williams wasn't all it could have been. Even my thesis, an ideal opportunity for expressing my own creative ideas, was massively documented, historically accurate—"safe"—as my advisor put it. There you have my confession of failure.

I have tried to be objective, to remain open to all viewpoints. Conscious of my ignorance, I have refrained from drawing premature conclusions. Organizing my non-thoughts into orderly essays, carefully worded and double-spaced, has contributed to my delusions of scholarly excellence. But at some point, the avoidance of premature conclusions developed into an avoidance of any conclusions at all. In short, I have spent my four years at Williams becoming extremely well-documented, but little more.

Perhaps my real reason for refusing to express personal opinions was not my supposed fairness and objectivity. I hesitated more out of intellectual cowardice; avoiding any opinions that could possibly be refuted. Rather than be brilliant and original, I chose to be safe. Imagine if all of us were in such a state of fear and trembling. Scholars pouring carefully over each others' words; collecting, annotating, sorting, and synthesizing—busily running in intellectual circles. Good exercise, perhaps. But when the exercise becomes an end in itself, learning stagnates; turns in on itself, and ceases to grow. We merely stuff more and more potentially valuable information into brains that have no creative use for it. I'm sure everyone would agree that the ideal scholar is imaginative and personally involved in his work. Yet here I am, apparently an academic success, because of a peculiar knack for manipulating footnotes. Isn't something confused here?

Fellow classmates: Williams has given us a chance to discover new possibilities by seeking the opinions of the most diverse authors. But it has also given us a chance to think for ourselves—to be radical, fanatical, and eccentric; the worst consequences of a mistake being a C or two on our transcripts. I truly envy all of you who accepted the risk that comes with creativity; maybe lost an occasional argument and the chance to be valedictorian; but still came back with a challenge next time 'round. For my fellow victims of fear and trembling, all is not lost. After all, I've actually gotten through this entire speech without recourse to a single impressive quotation. I hope we can all muster the courage to join our radical, fanatical, and eccentric classmates in taking those intellectual risks that make education so exciting.

Williams: an unlikely college in an unlikely place

The Hoosic River valley of the Northern Berkshires, "the middle of no where," even today seems an unlikely place for a town, let alone a "prestigious liberal arts college." It was far more unlikely in the 1700s, when access to the valley was limited to an arduous trek over the Mohawk Trail.

A survey of transportation options in the Purple Valley (see page 5) indicates that things haven't evolved all that much in 200 years. Now, only the scenic beauty of the area justifies settling here. During the early 1700s, the area was something of a frontier and, lying across the Indian Path from Lake Champlain to the Connecticut River valley, was strategic militarily. A settlement in West Hoosic (as the township was then called) also served to assert Massachusetts' claims against Dutch settlers and later New York.

The area was first surveyed in 1739 by Ephraim Williams Sr. and under the impetus of Fort Massachusetts (located where the Price Chopper on Route 2 now stands) a settlement began to grow in 1752. As far as the College is concerned, Ephraim Sr's. real claim to fame was fathering Ephraim Jr. and getting him appointed commander of the string of Western Massachusetts forts including Fort Massachusetts. Although Ephraim Jr. was apparently well-regarded militarily, he goes down in history for his defeats. In 1746, Fort Massachusetts was captured and burned while supposedly under his command. On September 8, 1755, having led his men into an ambush at Lake George, N.Y., he ended up getting himself killed for his troubles.

Shortly before, he had written a will providing funds for a "free school" to be set up in West Hoosic on condition that the name of the town be changed to Williamstown. The will was not quickly executed. In 1765, the town was officially incorporated as "Williams Town," although the boundary dispute with New York was not settled until 1787.

The General Court of Massachusetts incorporated "The Trustees of the Donation of Ephraim Williams, Esq. for Maintaining a Free School in Williamstown" on March 8, 1785 to use the $9157 that had accumulated in the estate. Yet, even this massive sum wasn't sufficient for the task and a lottery was required before construction of West College could begin in 1790. The opening of school was delayed until Oct. 20, 1791 by a failure to discover water on the land around the building. (In fact, the school had to rely on two springs at the lower end of Spring St. for its supply.) Despite local opposition, Ephraim Williams' free school became Williams College on June 22, 1793; as the ambitions of the school's trustees and first president, Ebenezer Fitch, grew to exceed those of the "founder."

The first Commencement was held (curiously enough) on Sept. 2, 1795. Of the four men receiving degrees, two became lawyers and two doctors (percentages Career Counseling has been unable to equal since.)

The free school consisted of an Academy, with a yearly tuition of 35 shillings, and an English free school. The free school did not survive the formation of the College, although the Academy continued as a prep school for a few years.

The early trustees of the college were heavily influenced by Yale and were strict Congregationalists. To them, Williamstowns' isolation was ideal for defending young minds from Unitarianism, which from its base at Harvard was having a profound effect on American higher education.

The trustees called for the following curriculum for their new college: "In the first year,—the English, Latin, Greek, and French languages. In the second,—the several languages in part, Arithmetic, Geography, Algebra, Geometry, Mensurations, Comic Sections, Rhetoric and Logic. In the third, —Trigonometry, Navigation, Surveying, Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Chemistry. In the fourth year,—Metaphysics, Ethics, History, National Law, Civil Polity and Theology."

In Dec. 1799, President Fitch wrote in his diary, "The college is in a prosperous state, The students continue to be diligent and orderly. We admitted twenty-four freshmen, and have in all eighty-one members of college."

However, this rosy picture was not long lasting. The College was perpetually in need of funds. The by and large well educated faculty was disgusted by the country bumpkins Williams tended to attract. Williamstown was viewed as a hopeless location for a college and, by the second decade of the nineteenth century, the trustees devoted most of their time to seeking a suitable location in the Connecticut River valley to move the College. In 1821, after failing to obtain permission from the state to move, Williams' second president, Zephaniah Swift Moore, with half the students and faculty marched over the Mohawk Trail to found Amherst College and spawn one of the oldest collegiate sports rivalry. That Williams had a Commencement that year is due in no small part to the stirring speeches of two seniors, Emerson Davis and Erastus C. Benedict, who urged their classmates to "uphold the honor and reputation" of the College.

Moore's successor at Williams, Edward Dorr Griffin, succeeded in developing an infusion of funds and an expansion of the enrollment. Although the College did not achieve financial security until the twentieth century, it was able to fall back on state aid and fortunate if occasional donations to the conservative religious (if non-sectarian) institution.

Change has come slowly to the College, yet, if at any point in the College's history a student could be catapaulted forward two generations, he would find the place barely recognizable. (It is difficult to believe that Williams was the incubator of religious fervor that brought the American missionary movement to life.)

Although Williams has always attracted talented educators (witness President Mark Hopkins), it wasn't until the presidency of James Phinney Baxter (1937-61) that the College's academic reputation really began to grow. Since World War II, admissions have become progressively more selective.

The vocations and avocations of alumni have varied greatly. Far fewer graduates go into teaching and the ministry than in the past. A recent study indicates that Williams has the highest ratio of graduates in executive positions to enrollment of any other undergraduate college. Yet, an increasing number of students are seeking alternative job opportunities in such areas as graphics and the arts.

As elsewhere, the 1960s were a traumatic period for Williams. They witnessed the largest building program in the College's history. The abolition of fraternities was a bitter issue on campus and among alumni. The result was the development of an almost unique residential "house" system.

Student "activism" came late and was short lived. The Afro-American Society (forerunner of the Black Student Union) took over Hopkins Hall to present a list of demands and the College joined in the Cambodia strike.

The most revolutionary change was reserved for the 1970s. In 1971, the College admitted its first freshman class containing women. The repercussions are still being felt, although a student-faculty committee concluded that the transition had been made surprisingly smoothly.

The town has changed as much as the college, although it has grown more slowly. In 1776, the population of Williamstown was 1081. Today it stands at 8247. The four graduates of 1795 compare with the 471 who received degrees last June.

By and large relations between the town and College have been good, although the College has never completely lost "aristocratic" and "egg-head" labels. At the College's founding, many townspeople were angered at losing their "free-school." During the 1950s bitter debate centered on the College's supposedly "left wing" faculty and a proposal to flouridate the town's water supported by the College.

Williams is the single largest employer and landowner in the town. With its tremendous economic power, the College has been forced to bend over backwards to avoid seeming to paternistically rape the region. Few College or town decisions are made without a discussion of the impact on the other.

While town-gown relations are always in flux, the decision of the College to halt expansion of enrollment and the present lull in construction would seem to usher in a more stable period.

No this is not a church, it's Lasell gymnasium. Don't miss Whitney Stoddard's lecture "A Sense of Where You Are" to learn more about this and other campus marvels.

Photo essay: Bits of your future at Williams

When the waitress comes with your order of Baconburger, french fries and a large root beer, she doesn't put it on the table in front of you—she hangs it on your window. No, you're [illegible] You're at Papa Charlie's Drive In which may become as much a part of your Williams experience as final exams and Art 101 floor plan. There are quite a few purple valley curiosities which you will undoubtably come to know and love, and here's a quick introduction to a few of them.

Constantine (right going clockwise)—Za Czar . . . brings a little bit of Greece (grease) to Spring Street. A devoted entrepreneur, he diligently keeps pace with the rising cost of living and we believe that he is waging a personal vendetta against the American free enterprise system. We like him and his personal jukebox selection, anyway. Besides, he has a monopoly on the pizza and grinder market here, so we like to stay on his good side.

Liquor-or "traditional refreshments" as they are called here. It comes in all shapes and sizes—ranging from Mogen-David Mad-dog (20 per cent Alcohol, 80 per cent unknown) for $1.98 to the most expensive champagnes. Bars and liquor stores litter the countryside in Massachusetts, New York and Vermont.

Freihofers-Unless you live in Western Massachusetts or in some portions of upstate New York and Vermont, you have probably never tried this definitive chocolate-chip cookie. Unfortunately, Freihofers are only in abundant supply at the Grand Union which is about a fifteen minute walk down Route 2. Those in the know get them at Tash's, a small grocery store on Water Street.

Mrs. Charlotte Marlowe-The matriarch of the mailroom. She supervises mail distribution, collects phone bills and coordinates the student typing service. She has been at Williams for seventeen years and she's really nice and funny even though her advice to freshman isn't. "Keep your phone bill current," she advises, "and don't forget your mailbox combination or lose your key." "And have a good year," she [illegible]

Papa Charlie-Proprietor of the drive-in of the same name which is located on Route 2 next to the Grand Union. He recommends the hamburgers and the home-made baklava and comes to talk to you while you wait for your food. In his fifteen years in the business, he reports, he's had only good experiences with college students. Unfortunately, he's only open from March through October, callously leaving the area without a french-fried mushroom supply during the winter.

Campus politics

All quiet on the Williams front

Williams has never had a highly political reputation and probably never will. It is fair to generalize that Williams students are largely sympathetic to the causes, and yet, too content and otherwise occupied to involve themselves. Nine years ago The Underground Guide to Colleges rated the Williams SDS chapter as virtually nonexistent. From that high-point the student body has followed the national lead and sunk into the political doldrums.

Even last year's presidential election failed to generate much political enthusiasm. On campus, a mock election spurred little visible campaigning, attracted few voters, and revealed a mixed political preference. (Carter beat Ford by thirty-six votes.) Off campus, the Americans for Democratic Action worked for the Massachusetts referenda while the Republicans campaigned in New York.

The following list contains some of the political organizations that surfaced last year and-or show promise of appearing during the next academic year.

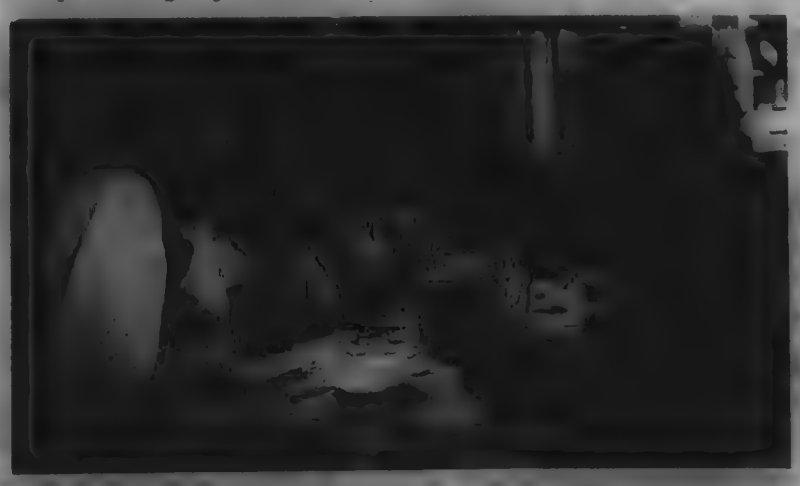
YOUNG AMERICANS FOR FREEDOM: The small Williams chapter sponsored a speaker and a movie early last year. They vanished shortly thereafter.



TUESDAY FORUM: After the GOP club split, two of the officers formed a discussion group which meets at the Log on Tuesday nights (hence the name.) They invite knowledgeable students, professors and townspeople to discuss and drink over political and economic events of current interest. Though the group is conservative, the discussions vary over a wide range. Two of last year's presentations were: Michael McPherson—Milton Friedman and the Ideas that won the Noble Prize, and Kurt Tauber—Why Socialism has Failed in the United States.

WILLIAMS REPUBLICAN CLUB: The club worked hard in a mock election on campus last November, and came close to pulling an upset victory for former President Ford. In the spring they sponsored panel discussions on Prostitution and Nuclear Energy, using recognized authorities to represent all sides. Accusations of lethargy and rumors of financial problems led to resignations and schism. A new activist executive board may get the group moving again.

WILLIAMS DEMOCRATIC CLUB: Rumors that this will form circulate every spring. Check it out.

WILLIAMS AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION: This is a non-partisan group interested in liberal ideas. Although they endorsed Jimmy Carter's presidential candidacy, the ADA is primarily cause-oriented. The group initiated an anti-B1 bomber petition drive, and spent time lobbying for the ERA, the Massachusetts bottle bill and an assortment of other causes. Various personalities, including ADA National Director Leon Shull, spoke at the Williams chapter last year under the sponsorship of the local chapter.

STUDENTS FOR RADICAL ALTERNATIVES: Members of the apparently defunct Williams Hunger Action Project and-or the Williams Action Coalition are reported to have formed this group. They maintain a low profile, yet try to influence people by introducing radical ideas rather than through direct electoral influence.

The Log, the College pub, opened Friday for those students and faculty who arrived early. The Log serves beer and wine to "members of The Williams College community" and their invited guests. Manager Claudia Lindsey '77 announced that it will remain open from 9 PM to 1 AM throughout the week and until 1:30 AM on Saturday.

The name "Log" comes from alumni James Garfield's observation that the perfect teaching situation would be Mark Hopkins sitting on one end of a log, and a student on the other. Hopkins and Garfield are gone, but the student and the Log are doing fine.

This year the Log is installing an Advent large-screen television for sports and special events. Lindsey expects to have it operational within the week, and will post a list of viewing times and programs (so get your suggestions in). Also on the agenda this year are more "Special Nights" on which the Log offers reduced prices to various groups. The first of these, "Senior Night", offers reduced prices to members of the class of '78.

Buying books eats bucks

Comfortable shoes are a necessity this week, as standing in lines to buy books are a tradition as old as Whitney Stoddard's lecture on local architecture. No matter how you've schemed to beat the rush, 50-to 100 people will have come up with the same plan and arrived at Dewey's, Renzi's or the Pooh Perplex before you did.

Neither Dewey's nor Renzi's, both located on Spring Street, carry texts for all courses, so many shoppers will have to visit both stores to complete their book collections. If you strategy is to arrive early, please note that the stores open at 9 a.m. Renzi's allows students to place orders in advance and pick them up several days later.

Be ready for a shock when you reach the cashier's desk. Those thin paperbacks and article reprints have a habit of adding up to frightening sums. According to a source quoted by Ralph Renzi, the average American student spends $180 per year on books. In response to accusations that they gouge students, both Renzi and Joe Dewey claimed last year that they have no control over book prices. The prices on most textbooks are marked up 20 to 25 per cent.

Purchasing used texts saves a bundle. Although used books occasionally crop up in the pile you bought at Renzi's, the best place to look is the Pooh Perplex. This student-operated enterprise, located in the basement of Jessup Hall, buys books from students for one-third the cost and resells them at one-half the original price. Since many students keep their books and many courses change their reading lists from year to year, don't expect Pooh to fill your entire order. Pooh keeps irregular hours, so watch bulletin boards closely, and don't wear heavy clothing when you go over to Jessup since temperatures in the basement are hellish.

People who don't mind waiting several weeks to buy books can post want ads in Baxter Hall in hopes of obtaining used books from upperclassmen. Industrious upperclassmen frequently post "for sale" lists on the same bulletin boards.

The condition of used books varies widely. Some look unopened (and frequently are) while others abound with highlighted passages and notes in the margins. These can be a bonus if you are in a hurry to get through with the reading assignment and head for the Log.

Eph sports: What to expect from a Little Three team

by Tim Layden and Jim Cohen

Welcome freshmen! Welcome to Williams College, home of the purple mountains (which always appear to be green), Ephmen and Ephwomen (which is what you are, like it or not), and one of the top small-college athletic programs around (which the NCAA hasn't figured out yet.)

Finding yourself now in the midst of unpacking yourselves from a seemingly endless succession of suitcases, think back on any non-essentials you might have left behind before making the trek to Williams.

Perhaps your string of garlic bulbs, used to ward off overly demanding Philosophy professors. Or maybe your magnifying glass, which you understand will be necessary after 10,000 pages of a 15,000-page week. Or worse yet, could be you've left your three-year-old topsiders at home, and how can anyone get by with just two pair of topsiders?

Well, put all these frivolous worries aside, for you have no doubt forgotten many trifles of greater value than those mentioned on the above list.

For instance, very few freshmen enter Williams College with a raccoon coat and a Williams pennant; which are, of course, necessary for attendance at all home football games. (Not to mention a shoe horn for squeezing people into Weston Field for the Amherst or Wesleyan game.)

Another frequent absentee among the belongings of an incoming freshman is a set of earmuffs, vital for retaining one's hearing and sanity when sitting through a basketball game in Lasell gym.

Starting to get the message? Good, let's continue the checklist. How about your construction worker's hard hat to protect yourself from flying hockey pucks (and perhaps a few flying hockey fans) during home hockey contests in Chapman Rink? Didn't think so.

All right, any unsuspecting freshman could be forgiven for not realizing that Williams actually does possess an athletic program, with real live teams and full schedules, but the following items should not be missing from any footlocker, suitcase, or other travelling implement.

Sneakers, for use in playing every intramural sport on campus, other than hockey, and probably that, too, at times. Williams boasts an IM program ranging from football to ping pong, and most of the student body gets involved. Sneakers are needed for most sports. Sorry preppies, Walabee don't count.

A willingness to try and master the use of a lacrosse stick. A sport which few Williams students play before arriving on campus, lacrosse (or lax, as it is more commonly referred to) is nearly as prevalent a time-killer as baseball or football in most places.

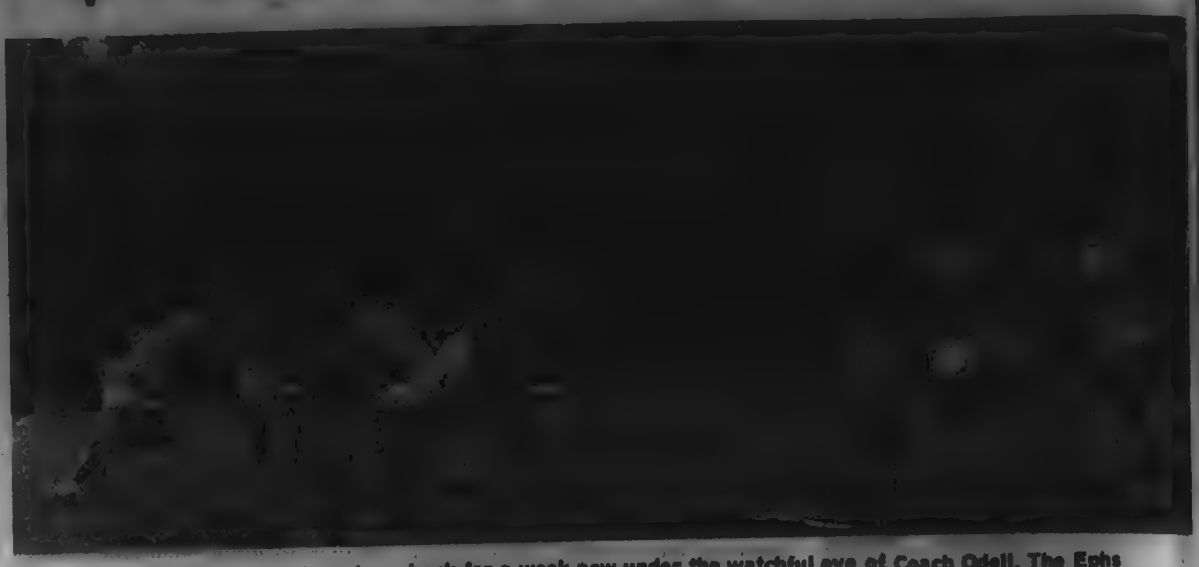
A frisbee, or the ability to throw one. Williams draws only a small portion of its student body from California, but one wouldn't know it to see the expertise with which some ersatz beachcombers toss the frisbee around. Have no fear, it's a technique easily mastered.

Williams, contrary to the frightening descriptions rendered forth in many of the publications received by high school seniors (highly competitive atmosphere, etc.), is not merely a breeding ground for future Einsteins. Oh, of course, the academic load is there, but so are many other things, and athletics are something which cannot help but become apart of any Williams student's life.

Beginning with the fall, the Williams football program stands on its own merit, especially since the arrival of head coach Bob Odell six years ago. In his first five seasons the football team snagged five straight Little Three titles, an unprecedented feat. Following a 7-0-1 1975 season, several students reminded Sports Illustrated that Williams could claim a No. 1 national ranking based on indirect wins over all teams except Oklahoma.

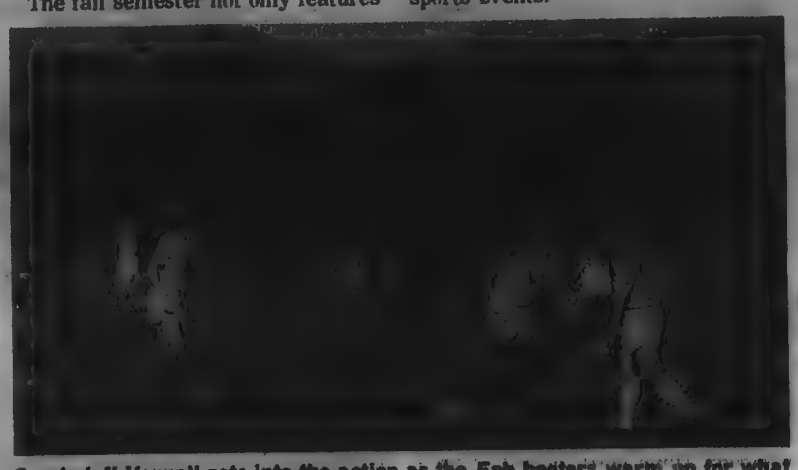
A 16-0 whitewash at the hands of Amherst last November dashed the Eph's hopes of a sixth crown; they had to settle for a three-way tie and a 4-4 overall record.

Although the Amherst game is over 2 months away, upperclassmen have begun rehearsing verbal abuse intended to spur the Lord Jeffs on to defeat.



Football is unquestionably the number one spectator sport at Williams, but if contact of the bone-crushing type isn't your bag, soccer is also a popular activity. Coach Jeff Vennell's squads have been consistent winners capable of giving nationally ranked teams like UConn a run for their money. The varsity team seeks revenge against Amherst for six year's worth of defeats.

Cross-country runners pride themselves on having won seven consecutive Little Three titles and for receiving a deafening round of applause from the Wellesley girls when they pass by the school during the Boston marathon.



Other sports available to men this fall are golf, which boasts one of the best college golf courses in the nation, and rugby football, famous for its parties and eating its dead.

Although Williams men still outnumber Williams women, the fall sports schedule shows more women's sports activities than men's. Women compete against northeastern schools in cross-country, field hockey, tennis, swimming, soccer and volleyball. Over the last three years, women's teams have rolled up incredible won-lost percentages and are slowly receiving more and more coverage in the Record sports pages.

The fall semester not only features intercollegiate activity of some sort on almost every day of the week, but also clogs the athletic fields with intramurals. Williams touch football rules bears a striking resemblance to rugby; tennis, cross-country and golf bring closet athletes out into the open. "Winter" sports start regular season play as early as Thanksgiving, (winter itself usually arrives much sooner) so the breather between the two seasons is brief. The break allows sports fans to watch the Ohio State-Michigan football game without feeling guilty about missing campus sports events.

The purple gridders have been back for a week now under the watchful eye of Coach Odell. The Ephs are out to avenge their 16-0 defeat at the hands of the Lord Jeffs last season. (photo by Read)

VOL. 91, NO. 2 WILLIAMS COLLEGE

New Honor Code guidelines to be d

This fall, instructors will distribute guidelines on academic honesty to students in most courses. These regulations result from an amended proposal of the student-faculty Honor Code Committee approved by the faculty last spring.

The faculty's plan requires all instructors to distribute written guidelines reminding students of their obligation to abide by the principles of the Honor Code set forth in the Student Handbook to each student in all their courses and to the student chairman of the Honor Code Committee at the beginning of each semester. These instructions will also deal with the manner in which the Honor Code applies to specific courses.

Guidelines will not be necessary for regularly scheduled examinations given in the conventional classroom setting, or for papers and laboratory exercises done individually, provided that the usual rules governing academic honesty are observed.

According to Professor Anson C. Piper, faculty chairman of the Honor Code committee, the proposal is intended to remove the confusion which existed last year on the part of both students and faculty concerning the Honor Code. He noted that widespread proliferation of exam options, especially those involving take-home exams, has led to confusion about the nature and application of the Honor Code.

"The faculty have been as remiss as students" in many instances of Honor Code violations, said Piper, since some faculty have not made Code requirements clear to students. Faculty will not be required to give a copy of their Code requirements to the Deans Office. "We assume that when a professor gives his guidelines to the dean, he will also distribute them to his students," said Piper.

Student Honor Committee Chairman Dan Sullivan said he expected some professors to refuse to follow give out honor guidelines, despite the large majority who approved the plan at last May's faculty meeting. If a professor refuses to issue honor code requirements to students, Sullivan said he would talk to the professor and attempt to find out his reasons.

The faculty also decided last spring to require all students to reaffirm their commitment to the Statement of Academic Honesty by signing an Honor Code pledge at the beginning of each academic year.

Worldwatch president addresses co

"Food—Worldwide Prospects" will be the theme of the Fall Convocation at Williams College, formally opening the 1977-78 academic year tomorrow at 11 a.m. in Chapin Hall.

Lester R. Brown, president and a senior researcher with Worldwatch Institute of Washington, D.C., will be the Convocation speaker and one of four persons who will receive honorary degrees during the ceremony. Williams College President John W. Chandler will award honorary Doctor of Laws degrees to Brown, R. Hal Dean, and Esther Peterson and an honorary Doctor of Science degree to Dr. George M. Woodwell.

Tonight at 8 p.m. in Jesup Hall, the four will participate in a panel discussion concerning the world food problem. Norris Phelps, a Williamstown dairy farmer who will talk about the small farmer and his future in the context of the dominance of agribusiness, will join the panel as a special member. Prof. Gordon C. Winston of the Williams Economics Department will moderate the discussion.

Lester Brown is the author of several books and numerous articles about global environmental concerns, including a book to be published soon as "The Twenty-Ninth Day: Accommodating Human Needs and Numbers to the Earth's Resources." The Worldwatch Institute is a private, non-profit Washington-based research institute devoted to the analysis of emerging global issues. Recognized as a leading authority on world food problems, Brown holds degrees in agriculture, economics and public administration from Rutgers, Maryland and Harvard. He is a member of numerous organizations concerned with global problems, has been a Guest Scholar at the Aspen Institute and delivered the Nobel Symposium address in Stockholm in 1974. His speech will, according to Chandler, "bring into sharp focus a topic that is attracting a growing interest at Williams." This fall the college will begin a series of agricultural courses, one of which will involve the problem of world food supplies.

WOOLF replaces Frosh Days for '84

Another orientation hike by the Williams Organization for Outdoor Living for Freshmen (WOOLF) will head into the Berkshire wilds after Convocation tomorrow, encouraged by praise given two previous trips.

Following months of planning, twenty freshmen—led by six upperclassmen—split into three groups last weekend for three days of hiking in the Berkshire, Taconic and Green Mountains.

Despite bee stings and twisted ankles, chill dawns and meatless meals, freshmen and leaders were unanimous in their praise for the infant program.

Two groups left Tuesday afternoon for a one-nighter. Tomorrow's hikers will return Sunday. The final trip, next weekend, is a two-night hike.

The idea for WOOLF was born last spring, when seven freshmen dissatisfied with their Freshman Days developed an alternative.

They first went to the Rev. John Cusden, then to Lauren Stevens, Dean of Freshmen. The two agreed with the idea, but told the seven to ask Peter Berek, Dean of the College, for final approval.

"That's where we met a lot of opposition," said Tom Black '80. Compromise and approval from the Committee for Undergraduate Life persuaded Berek.

"One hundred people applied," Black said, "84 were accepted." Some 17 upperclassmen are serving as leaders, he reported, about half of them sophomores.

WOOLF received no funds from the College, Black said, but did get $50 from last year's Freshman Council. The three-night trip last weekend cost each freshman $12.50, the one-nighters $7 and the two-nighters $10.

The cost of the trip included food, shelter and a $4 membership in the Williams Outing Club, which supplied some equipment.

Leaders identified several weaknesses in the program after the first trips. Since deposits were not required, some freshmen dropped out the day of the trip. Dropouts forced consolidation of this week's trip, from three to two groups.

The Board of Trustees has hired or promoted 35 faculty members this fall, including 17 new assistant professors and ten visiting professors.

College renovates residential buildings

The College renovated several residential buildings this summer. The observant eye will spot previously non-existent paint, landscaping, and even some outdoor sculpture between Dodd and the library.

Woodbridge House, on the path to Greylock, and Chadbourne House, near Bascom, now house students. Chadbourne, formerly Keck, is now occupied by 45 men from Perry-Bascom.

Gar-Wood women moved into Woodbridge while the men reside in Wood and Garfield. Garfield House is to be converted next semester to house 34 occupants instead of the present 20. In order to expand the size of rooms, bedrooms will be installed on the first floor, doing away with much of the entertaining room. To replace this lost space, Gar-Wood has been told the basement will be renovated. So far only lights have been installed; however, the College plans to solve the moisture problem by putting a sealant over the tile to keep out moisture and then adding a layer of concrete. The girls in Woodbridge will receive door knobs and phones sometime next week.

A new lounge, as yet unfurnished, has replaced two bedrooms in Currier. Also in the Berkshire Quad, the east entry of Prospect has been carpeted as a possible remedy to the house's noise problem. If this addition diminishes sound, the whole house will be carpeted.

Upon entering Mission Park's main doors, a huge sign saying "Mission Park" is visible. In the background of the sign are the last names of everyone who lived in the Park last year (up to the letter "S"). The individual houses also have supergraphics of their names on the walls, the work of Penny Brewer '76.

One of the many changes a carp Park.

Boyer heads News Office

Ray Boyer, acting Director of the Williams News Office since Andrea Diehl's resignation last April, has assumed permanent responsibility for the position.

Boyer, previously a radio and TV publicity consultant for the College, was News Director of WBEC Radio in Pittsfield for two years before beginning a news filming and distributing business in Berkshire County. He is a 1969 graduate of the University of Delaware and received his masters' degree in journalism from Penn State in 1972.

According to Boyer, the duties of the News Director involve correlating College events and general sports announcements, analyzing them for their newsworthiness, and releasing them in press-ready form to the appropriate news agencies outside Williams. Boyer himself writes many of the articles available through the News Office.

Boyer said that he intends to broaden the scope of the Williams News Office by releasing articles to a variety of media. "It is especially important that we make the effort to publicize the things that are going around on campus because Williams is so isolated. I intend to pass news on through radio, television, and the [illegible].

"This will be the key difference between this and previous years' work, which focused mainly on print releases," he concluded.

Boyer's official duties as News Director commenced last July.

Ray Boyer was recently appointed permanent College News Director. He has been acting News Director since Andrea Diehl's resignation in April.

Danforth Graduate Fellowships

Inquiries about the Danforth Graduate Fellowships, to be awarded by the Danforth Foundation of St. Louis, Missouri in April 1978, are invited, according to the local campus representative, Prof. Victor E. Hill, Department of Mathematics, 205 Bronfman.

The Fellowships are open to all qualified persons who have serious interest in careers of teaching in colleges and universities, and who plan to study for a Ph.D. in any field of study common to the undergraduate liberal arts curriculum in the United States.

Approximately 60-65 Fellowships will be awarded to college seniors who are nominated by campus Liaison Officers. Another 35-40 awards will be made to postbaccalaureate persons who apply directly to the Foundation.

Applicants for the baccalaureate awards must be college seniors and may not have undertaken graduate level programs of study beyond their college-level work. Williams seniors should contact their Department or Program chairman if they would like to be considered for a nomination. The deadline for the receipt of Williams candidacies by the local committee is October 1.

The Danforth Foundation, established by the late Mr. and Mrs. William H. Danforth in 1927, is a national, educational, philanthropic organization, dedicated to enhancing the humane dimensions of life. Activities of the Foundation emphasize the theme of improving the quality of teaching and learning.

A faculty selection committee will nominate four Williams candidates for the Watson travelling fellowship by September 30 and three candidates for the Luce fellowship by October 14. Informal meetings concerning the fellowships will take place on Monday, September 12, at 2:30 p.m. in Jesup for the Watson and Monday, September 19 at 4:00 p.m. in Jesup for the Luce. Interested students should see Dean McIntyre.

Candidates for a Luce fellowship may include Williams seniors, graduate students, recent graduates or junior faculty. The Fellowship is intended to provide internships and job placements in East and Southeast Asia (excluding India) for candidates with defined career interests.

The new $2500 large television screen installed in the Log Sunday has caused Log manager Claudia Lindsey '77 to change some of the traditional methods of operation. The stage area will be closed to patrons, since a special silver film coats the screen and would be destroyed by finger prints.

Lindsey said she hopes the television will bring new people to the Log, and increase business among the regulars.

She announced that the Log will open Sunday afternoons for televised sporting events. Times and events will be posted at the Log.

Theatre auditions

Auditions for the first Williams College Theater productions—Shakespeare's The Comedy of Errors and Beckett's Waiting for Godot (which will play in repertory in mid-November)—will be held this Sunday, and Monday from 7 to 11 p.m. on the mainstage of the Adams Memorial Theater. Scripts and audition times (you must be scheduled) are available in the theater office in the lobby of the AMT.

Chapin exhibition

"Facade," an exhibition which opened in the Chapin Library this Monday is based on the 10 names inscribed on the facade of Stetson Hall, the building which houses Chapin Library.

The names are those of ten of history's most creative writers and thinkers. Robert Volz, Custodian of the collection of rare books, manuscripts and prints which make up Chapin Library, says the names were chosen for the facade because of the "creative depth" of the men and "their ability to influence future writers and thinkers."

The exhibition includes great books representative of each of the ten names. Volz says the rest of works of the writers will be on display in either first editions or other significant form.

Merry Widow

Auditions will be held for dancing and singing roles for the Williams College Choral Society and Dance Society production of Franz Lehar's The Merry Widow. The operetta will be presented November 17, 18, 19 at Chapin Hall and will be directed and choreographed by Joe Anne Dewey and John K. Savacool. The musical director will be Kenneth Roberts. Auditions for dancers continue tonight at 7 p.m. in Chapin Hall. Singing roles will be auditioned in Chapin Hall on Wednesday at 7:00 p.m. Scores and scripts are available from Jean Donati in Currier Hall, Williams College.

Meridith Monk performing one of the many dance-theatre works she will bring to Williamstown next week as the 1977-1978 Williams College Dance Society Concert Series gets under way.

Dance Society begins with Monk residency

The Williams College Dance Society will open its concert series this year with a residency by Meredith Monk - The House beginning on September 15. Dance Instructor Joy Ann Dewey explains that "this is a most unusual company, led by one of the most idiosyncratic and compelling performers and choreographers in the theater today."

THE HOUSE residency includes a Master Class workshop on Thursday in Lasell Gym at 3:30 p.m., an open rehearsal on Friday at 1 p.m. in the AMT, and performances Friday and Saturday evenings at the AMT. Monk will present a vocal concert on Thursday evening at 8:30 at the Clark Art Institute. Ticket information for all events is available at the AMT box office.

Meredith Monk is a talented performer who is at once an accomplished dancer, choreographer, composer and singer. A graduate of Sarah Lawrence, she has created more than forty dance-theater-music works since 1964.

In 1968 Monk founded THE HOUSE, a company of performers dedicated to an interdisciplinary approach to performance. The company's members come from varying backgrounds in all of the arts.

As Deborah Jowitt of the Village Voice wrote, "It is impossible to describe the richness of Monk's conception—visually, aurally and intellectually. So much happens in depth as well as in a linear manner that the printed word cannot in any way convey the experience. The layers of subject matter are astonishing."

Achtung! Achtung! Hot gossip from German newspapers

The Record did not plan to establish a Munich bureau this summer, but decided to temporarily when one of its reporters spent his summer working there. He filed this report on the state of the journalistic art there.

France is more famous for its wines, but the grapevine is nowhere healthier than in Germany. Gossip, scandal, violence and sex fill many of their daily newspapers, newspapers which make the New York Daily News look like a Ford foundation report. The legendary German efficiency extends to seeing that anyone who wants a good dose of "inside information" on murders, orgies and the private lives of celebrities is never disappointed.

Munich, where I spent three months this summer, has an impressive five daily newspapers. Three of them are scandal sheets. A very unscientific sampling of people on Munich's subways makes it appear that half to three quarters of Munich's newspaper reading public reads them. As a result, they are frequently euphemistically dignified in American newspapers as "mass circulation dailies," a label which is none too kind to the masses.

Out of fairness, it must be pointed out that the other two Munich dailies very dutifully report important events around the world and fill their editorial pages with much erudite commentary.

Unlike "news" newspapers, scandal sheets have to go out of their way to make their lead stories look important for the simple reason that they are not. German layout editors have made this a high art.

The best way to see this is to stroll past the Hofbrauhaus on a typical day, where all five Munich dailies are displayed in metal bins, meeting in head to head competition. The two "news" newspapers have their standard layouts in which the lead story is located in the middle columns. A modest headline quietly announces its contents, typically about the Middle East or new tax proposals from Bonn.

Scandal sheet headlines are, on the other hand, far from quiet. If newspapers could talk, these would be shouting.

The headlines typically occupy a half page of a normal size (not tabloid) newspaper sheet. But the German editors, apparently concerned that big print alone is not sufficient to grab readers attention, will underline the headline, usually in red ink. Worked into a passion, an editor has been known to use three inch high red block lettering in a black background. Another of their favorite devices is to enclose subheadlines in black arrows pointing at the main headline.

If the New York Times adopted this layout style, you might see in tomorrow's newspaper a headline like: (white block print in a large black arrow) Pressure on OMB Chief Increases; (Large black print, occupying half of front page and underlined in red) New calls for Lances resignation. In Germany, however, the story is invariably about a murder, rape or somebody's love life.

The total irrelevancy of the scandal sheet stories makes all this drum beating all the more impressive. Typical was the treatment of the trial of an aging actress, Ingrid van Bergen, who shot her younger jet set lover. It was the biggest sensation of the summer in Munich and the story virtually camped on the front pages of the scandal sheets for better than two weeks.

A more or less typical headline from the Bild newspaper of ("The Lost Honor of Katherina Blum" fame) during the trial ran: Ingrid van Bergen's Daughter: (underlined in black) Herr Judge, I want my mommy back! (underlined in red).

On the day of the long awaited verdict, the Bild hurled the following headline at its readers in white block letters on a black background Ingrid van Bergen - 7 long years - She closed her eyes—her daughter cried.

The story of the trial is a masterpiece of dime store melodramatic prose.

"The judge looked at Ingrid van Bergen over the border of his gold glasses. Then he said in a determined voice:

" 'In the name of the people: The accused is, on account of the death blow, sentenced to seven years imprisonment.'

"It was 10:05 a.m. Ingrid van Bergen in her black dress stared blankly forward. She closed her eyes, her little daughter cried. Through the window of the courtroom rays of sun fell from a bright blue sky, covered with clouds."

My German is not perfect and that last sentence could be wrong, but that is what it appears to say. My theory is that we are not supposed to understand what it means or in particular what it's doing there. Irrelevancy is no problem to a German editor. In fact, I think it's his goal.

The Bild does make some concessions to readers interested in events of more lasting significance. There is a small box in the lower left-hand corner of the front page under the heading "News." On the day of the van Bergen verdict, it was reported that:

—1. More babies were born in Germany this year than last.

—2. Finance ministers from several countries were planning to meet in Paris about the fall of the dollar.

—3. Miniskirts are the new rage in mainland China.

—4. Eleven people were killed by terrorists in Israel the day before.

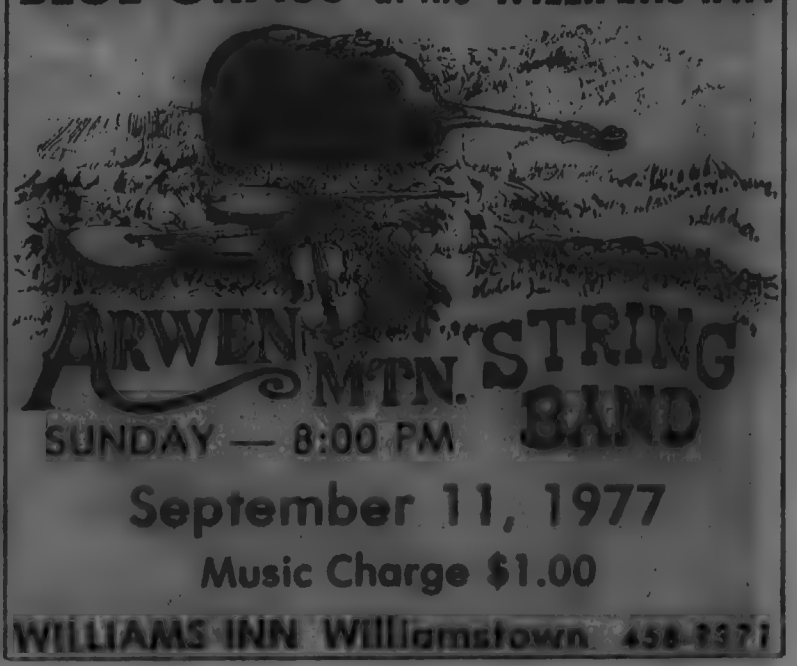
—5. The Pope spoke out for unity among believers the day before.

—6. "Toma" should be watched on television that evening.

No "news" item gets more than a sentence. Apparently the news isn't important enough.

Summer in Munich is usually a slow time for the scandal sheets, the Ingrid van Bergen trial being an exception. Editors call it the sauergurkel or "sour pickle" time.

A tour of the front page of the Abendzeitung, another German scandal daily on a typical sour pickle day yields the following information: (main headline) 14 year old girl murdered on first day of vacation (subhead) brother in law strangled her because she would not sleep with him; 57 per cent of the Germans think that the van Bergen sentence is too low; a new two Mark coin will appear; There was a 90 km long traffic jam on the Autobahn; There was a sex orgy in a jail (details page 5); finally there is a report and large picture of the winner of an Abendzeitung sponsored beauty contest.



A few scattered ads complete the publication.

Foreign news is not completely neglected. In the middle of August, the Abendzeitung hit the streets with the banner headline "President Carter throws his son out of the house." The story got half of the front page with more detail promised inside.

The International Herald Tribune, the Paris-based American newspaper, didn't mention the story until its back page, where it got a paragraph in a small society section.

I can forgive the German scandal sheet, for clouding the facts since their stories are so irrelevant anyway. One thing can be said in their favor: one is never the worse off for not having read them.

Optimism prevails

Eph gridders prepare for '77 season

by Tim Layden

The reign of King Eph I has finally come to an end and the doomsayers of New England small college football. After five years on the top of the heap, Bob Odell's juggernaut slipped to 4-4 last season and the total collapse into the lower echelon is expected to come in 1977.

Well, hold back your doberman pinschers, Middlebury, call off those vultures circling overhead Amherst. Barring a plague of injuries like those of a year ago and aided by the development of eager freshmen and sophomores, things should take a turn for the better on Weston Field this fall.

"Everybody's attitude has been great," says head coach Bob Odell, "we've got competition at almost every position and lots of depth." Odell hopes to return to the type of success which marked his first five years at the helm, in which his teams compiled a glittering 34-5-1 record.

Eight starters return to an offense which was riddled by early-season injuries in 1976, yet only two, co-captains Scott Harrington and Herb McCormick seem assured of emerging from pre-season battles with their jobs still intact.

McCormick is a glue-fingered split end who set a modern-day Williams record last year with 40 catches. The 6'1", 180-pounder will also see duty at swingback. The quick and durable Harrington will run from the tailback spot in the I formation which Odell hopes to use often this campaign.

Junior Ken Hollingsworth nailed down a starting spot late last season by virtue of a pair of "are you kidding me?" grabs in a barnburner against Union, and brings his talents back to a split end spot, giving the Ephs a pair of formidable receivers. Senior Bill Miller is the club's third split end.

Junior Kurt Anderson struggled through a bout with mono during the summer, and lost some 30 pounds in the process. Senior lacrosseman Todd Ackerson is battling Anderson for the final receiver spot, along with frosh Dave Greaney.

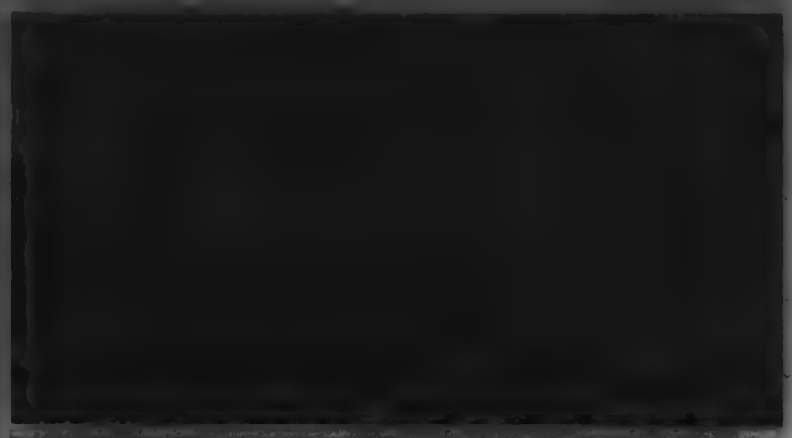
Certainly not suffering from a paucity of men to catch passes, all that remains is for someone to get the pigskin to them. Graduation claimed Williams' all-time leading passer, Don Wallace, leaving oft-injured senior Bill Whelan and junior Greg Collins in a dogfight for the job.

"A good quarterback is a necessity, and I'm concerned about the situation," says Odell. Whelan and Collins, however, are both exceptional athletes, playing more varsity sports between them at Williams than existed in the days of Benny Boynton. It seems certain that whoever wins the job will be more than adequate.

Freshmen Tim Connelly, Bob Lutz, and Kevin Hinchey were also brought back as quarterbacks, but seem slightly green to take over immediately. "The experience of being up with the varsity every day should be good for them in the future," remarked Odell, "they're all going to be good quarterbacks."

Joining Harrington in the backfield will be a runaway freight train in Riddells named Gus Nuzzolese. A bruising 200-pounder, Nuzzolese started five games last year at tailback, but moves back to his natural fullback slot for his sophomore season. "Our opponents will have to respect Gus," said Odell, "he's a heckuva back."

Behind Nuzzolese is freshman Jack Clary, along with junior John Dell'Errario and frosh Bill Novicki. Sophomore speedster Vernon Davis is rapidly improving at tailback and should effectively spell Harrington when necessary, along with Dave Masucco and Charlie Thurston.



The offensive line, victims of a gang mugging in last year's loss to Amherst, represents the fiercest competition on the squad. Joe Maguire replaced injured veteran Lew Kitchin last year, and now finds himself fighting sophomore Mike Curran for his spot. Fellow soph Tom Keller rounds out the center corps.

Junior Bruce Wilson returns to the starting guard spot, but must knock off senior Brian Fales, who also started a year ago. Ken Schoetz should handle the other side, backed by Ted Tucci. Sophomore Dave Johnson is the final guard.

265-pound sophomore Jack Spound is working to take Dave Mallozzi's tackle spot, a step ahead of sophomore Jim DeSimone. Juniors Steve Rogers, a convert from defense, is fighting Mark Tercek for the other tackle spot.

Junior defense backs Greg McAleenan and Mark Eckert return to anchor what should be a strong defensive secondary. McAleenan, according to Odell, "has all the moves of (Cincinnati Bengal and ex-Williams star) Scott Perry, and lacks only his speed." Eckert, says the coach, is like a small Libardi." Mike Walker and Tony Turi back up the corners.

Mark Gerry, a talented ball-carrier as a freshman, but injured a year ago, moves to the defensive secondary, and appears to have a corner job nailed down. Sophomores Dave Monich and John McGovern round out the rover candidates. Junior Long Ellis and hard-hitting sophomore

Coach O'Dell and an optimistic squad have spent two weeks preparing for the fall season. The team plans to improve upon last year's disappointing 4-4 season. photo by Joe McClellan

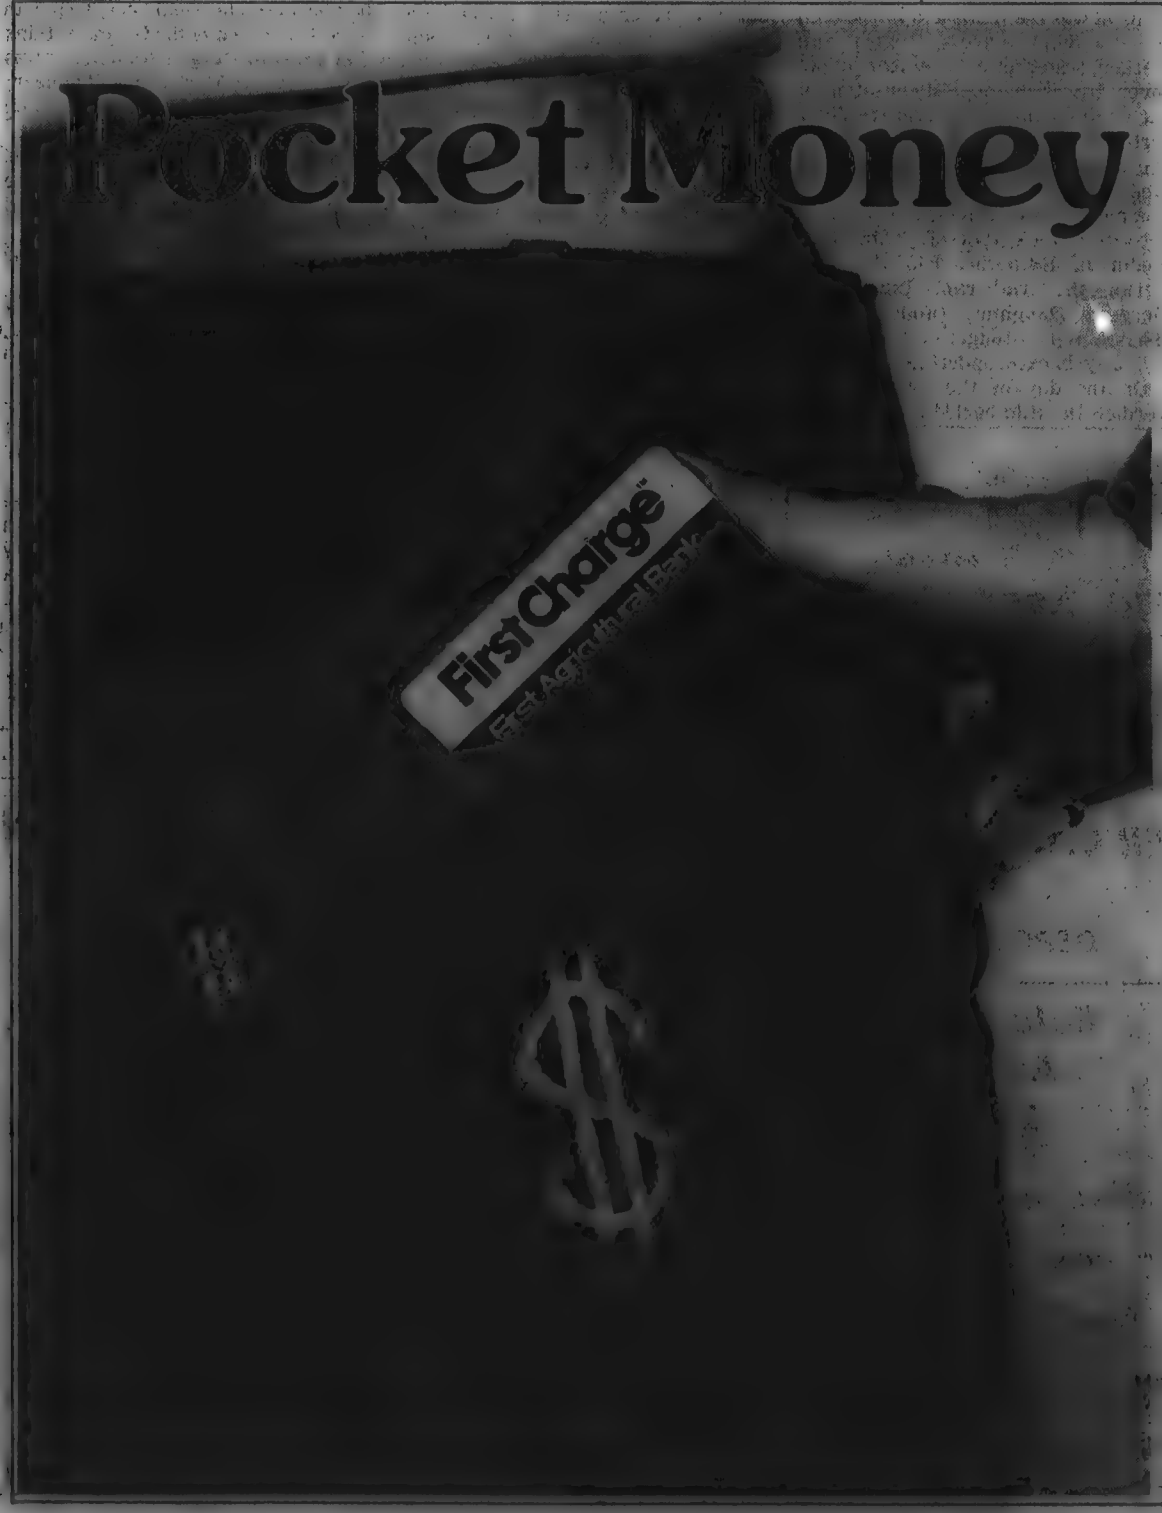
Andy Krakauer are battling for the starting safety spot under coach Dick Farley.

Junior John Thiel, "an excellent football player" according to O'Dell, was the club's leading tackler last season, and brings a year's maturity to one linebacker spot. Phil Shuman returns from a semester among the women of Wellesley to earn the other starting spot.

Senior Frank Pergolizzi and junior Jack Mortell join frosh Brian Beneker and Mark Doucette to round out the linebacking corps. Linebacking has been an integral part of the Williams defensive scheme since Odell arrived and replacing Jim Spaulding, lost to graduation, seems the key here.

Co-captain Pete Tuttle and Bill Couch both return to starting tackle positions, flanking junior Colin Hart, who will attempt to fill the gap left by last year's "do-it-all" co-captain Emmett Creahan. "You can't fill Emmett's shoes," lamented Odell, "but Colin's very tough."

Rapidly-improving senior Mike Bernay has found a home at defensive tackle behind Couch, while senior Larry Tanner is out for the first time.



Sophomore Dan Van Allmen, backs Tuttle, while Ralph Spooner and Bruce Kneuer back Hart.

Odell seems to have found three solid defensive ends in senior Mike Masi, and sophomores Russ Gee and Dan Towle. Jim Homes, Jim Namnoum, and Mark Bowne are also fighting for end spots.

Odell and fellow coaches Farley, Clarence Thomas, Joe Dailey, Renzie Lamb and Rich Turi get a chance to see just how well the preseason is going Saturday when they entertain New Haven College in a scrimmage in Williamstown.

"We really need an outside foe," comments Odell. The New Haven squad carries some 90 players and should be a physically big group. Certainly mistakes will be numerous in the contest, but Odell will be looking to settle some of the battles which have been taking place on the practice field, a big step toward establishing a starting lineup.

So pessimists, hold your fire for a few weeks at least; let the new system sink in and watch what happens. The Ephs travel to Hamilton September 24, and then Middlebury comes to town. Should prove interesting.

Panel opens Convocation weekend

by Nancy Richman

"It's difficult to separate the food problem from the challenge of conservation in general and government in general," began Dr. George Woodwell, Director of the Ecosystems Center of the Woods Hole Marine Biological Laboratory and one of the five panelists at Friday's panel discussion of "Food: World-Wide Prospects." As Moderator Gordon Winston explained, the panel members were "ideally suited" to express both "the global and the local dimensions of the food problem."

The panel consisted of a local dairy farmer named Morris Phelps, and the four honorary degree recipients at Saturday's convocation ceremony: Esther Peterson, Special Adviser to the President on Consumer Affairs, Lester Brown, President of Worldwatch Institute, Hal Dean, Board Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of Ralston-Purina, and Woodwell.

Brown opened the discussion, outlining the history of the world food supply during the past half century. He observed that "in the seventies, we have seen, significantly, a deterioration in that supply." He also pointed out what he perceived to be an increasingly regular cyclical movement from food shortages and high prices to surpluses and depressed prices. "We have to be careful," he warned, "not to let this boom-bust situation continue." "We should take some land out of production now," Brown advised. Finally, Brown noted, "You can't separate the food economy from the energy problem." "High productivity is an energy intensive process," he said, "and we can clearly produce more . . . But at what price?"

Dean gave the private industry prospective of the problem. "Speaking for agri-business," he began, "there is deep concern about what we can do to help alleviate the world food problem." "I don't think that we can expect to transfer the magnificent American system to third and fourth World countries," Dean said, "because political and economic variances make that impossible. We can feed the peoples of the world, though. There are known methods that can feed us for less cost and provide better nutrition."

"Beans, rice . . . fortification can be put together," Dean continued. "People can eat and be magnificently fit. They won't have steak or beer but they will be better fed than the average American. The problem is exceedingly difficult but it can be beat."

Norris Phelps spoke of the problems confronting the American farmer today. "We'll produce," he said, "but just let us produce at a profit." Phelps gave a short history of his dairy farm.

Brown points to shortages in world food and energy

"The world is in its twenty-ninth day," Lester R. Brown, president and senior researcher with Worldwatch Institute, told a large audience at the Fall Convocation. "We've got to get the brakes on, and soon."

The 1977-78 academic year at Williams opened formally last Saturday in Chapin Hall as Brown addressed a large audience on the prospects of the worldwide food situation.

Brown received an honorary Doctor of Laws degree from College President John W. Chandler, along with R. Hal Dean, and Esther Peterson. Chandler awarded George Masters Woodwell an honorary Doctor of Science degree. Brown drew the theme of his speech from his book, The Twenty-Ninth Day: Accommodating Human Needs and Numbers to the Earth's Resources. The title, Brown explained, comes from a riddle used to teach school children exponential growth.

If the number of lily pads in a pond doubles each day, and it takes thirty days to fill the pond with lily pads, on what day will the pond be half full? According to Brown, "not two national political leaders in 100 understand the arithmetic of population growth."

"Population is an important variable in a changing food situation", Brown pointed out. There has been a tremendous growth in the dependence of the world on North American food. Every country now imports food except those in North America. "The U.S. is indeed the world's bread basket," said Brown.

We cannot turn to the oceans for food, according to Brown, because, "as it turns out, the oceans are in a most difficult situation." We must instead shift our attention to traditional land based supplies, he said. Brown noted that the four key resources used in agriculture—land, water, energy, and fertilizer—would no longer be in abundant supply. In the future, Brown warned, we will have to reduce the enormous energy dependence of American agriculture, while still "increasing the food supply through intense cultivation of existing land resources."

Brown said that, in the future, the country would focus more on social problems, and that there would be a shift in the distribution of resources

College ups energy savings

Shorter hours in science buildings "hopefully" will become a permanent part of the College's expanding energy conservation program, according to John Holden, mechanical engineer for the Buildings and Grounds Department.

Holden, who leads the College's energy conservation efforts, said that turning down thermostats in the Thompson, Clark and Bronfman science buildings to 55 degrees on weekends and from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. on weekdays has produced savings of 10 to 15 per cent on heating costs. The reduction in hours is not effective during the summer, Holden said, when the heating plant closes down.

Holden noted that the exact savings could not be measured, since heat for the buildings comes from the central steam plant. The estimates were deduced from reductions achieved since the shorter hours went into effect last winter.

The biology building was modified this summer to protect animals and plants which cannot tolerate lower temperatures. Separate controls were installed to allow heating of the greenhouse and zoological rooms while offices and classrooms are closed.

Buildings and Grounds also is working on efforts to reduce energy consumed in lighting. New master switches have been installed in Bronfman Library.

Bronfman as it appears after closing. The move is part of a continuing College energy conservation policy.

Chandler awards 50 seniors Phi Beta Kappa membership

President of the College John W. Chandler announced the names of fifty seniors elected to the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Convocation ceremonies Saturday.

The highest ten per cent of the class of 1978 became eligible for membership last May when they met the requirements for early admission to the honor society in their junior years. All students elected to Phi Beta Kappa this fall are candidates for a Bachelor of Arts degree in '78 and have accumulated a grade point average of higher than 9.75.

Although the size of the senior class would warrant the election of only 47 students to the society, 3 more seniors received the honor because of a tie at the GPA cut-off point, according to Registrar George Howard.

At the end of the senior year, a second election takes place, in which all those students both in the top quarter of their class and having a grade point average of 9.0 or above become members of Phi Beta Kappa.

Herwitz cites major council issues

by Ray DeMeo

"The biggest task that faces the council right now is to continue and carry further some of the more successful policies and programs that we started last spring," according to Tom Herwitz, president of the College Council.

Herwitz will conduct the council's first meeting of the year tomorrow night at 9 p.m. in Room 3 of Griffin Hall. The agenda will include the election of representatives to several committees and a review of the council's funding process.

Last Spring, Herwitz stressed the need for "streamlining" the budgeting process for student organizations. This year he hopes to begin surveying the budgets of council-funded organizations as soon as the allocation process has been completed this fall. Herwitz admitted that the idea of preliminary budgeting might produce some opposition from organization heads, but added, "a lot of money will be saved if we can encourage organizations to cut out some of their unnecessary spending."

Herwitz said he favors the holding of student forums by school committees and offices for the purpose of familiarizing the student body with some of the College's operations and encouraging feedback on specific issues of concern. Last year the ACEC, the CAP, the Housing Committee and the Faculty Steering Committee all held individual forums, and Gladden House sponsored a general forum. With the exception of the Gladden event, all of the forums were poorly attended.

Nevertheless, Herwitz plans to organize several more in the fall, possibly involving the CUL and the offices of the Provost and Treasurer. "If students have particular questions about a student-faculty committee or a College office, a forum is the place to ask them," he said. And even a poorly attended forum is useful to some extent, he added.

Herwitz cited the tenure evaluation questionnaire as another valuable source of student input. He blamed the poor student response to the questionnaire distributed last spring to the newness of such an approach, and on the limited success of the methods of distributing the questionnaire. Herwitz eventually hopes to create a council file of tenure evaluation questionnaires to be used for long-term purposes.

Herwitz said the election of parallel committee representatives was an issue of immediate concern to the council. The committees, composed entirely of students and student members of student-faculty committees, will facilitate communication between student-faculty committees and the student body.

According to Herwitz, the parallel committees will serve a number of functions. Primarily, they would promote interaction between student representatives on student-faculty committees and their constituency. "Representatives have sometimes emphasized their own personal ideas over the desires of the students," he claimed.

Herwitz also called the parallel committees a "valuable source of ideas." He criticized students on student-faculty committees for "reacting" to issues introduced at meetings, but "seldom coming up with their own ideas for changes." "Interaction between the representatives of student-faculty and parallel committees will make the representatives more prepared to

Competence

Getting through the hassles that often mark the beginning of a college year can be a traumatic experience. Ask anyone who has returned from the summer to find that "there was no room at the inn" as happened to students from Boston College, M.I.T., Tufts and other New England colleges this year. In view of the virtually unlimited possibility for screw-ups, Williams administrators are to be congratulated on starting things off right.

Registration this semester could only be characterized as painless. Apparently the only students who suffered from the experience were those who couldn't stop laughing at the pithy jokes contained in their registration instructions.

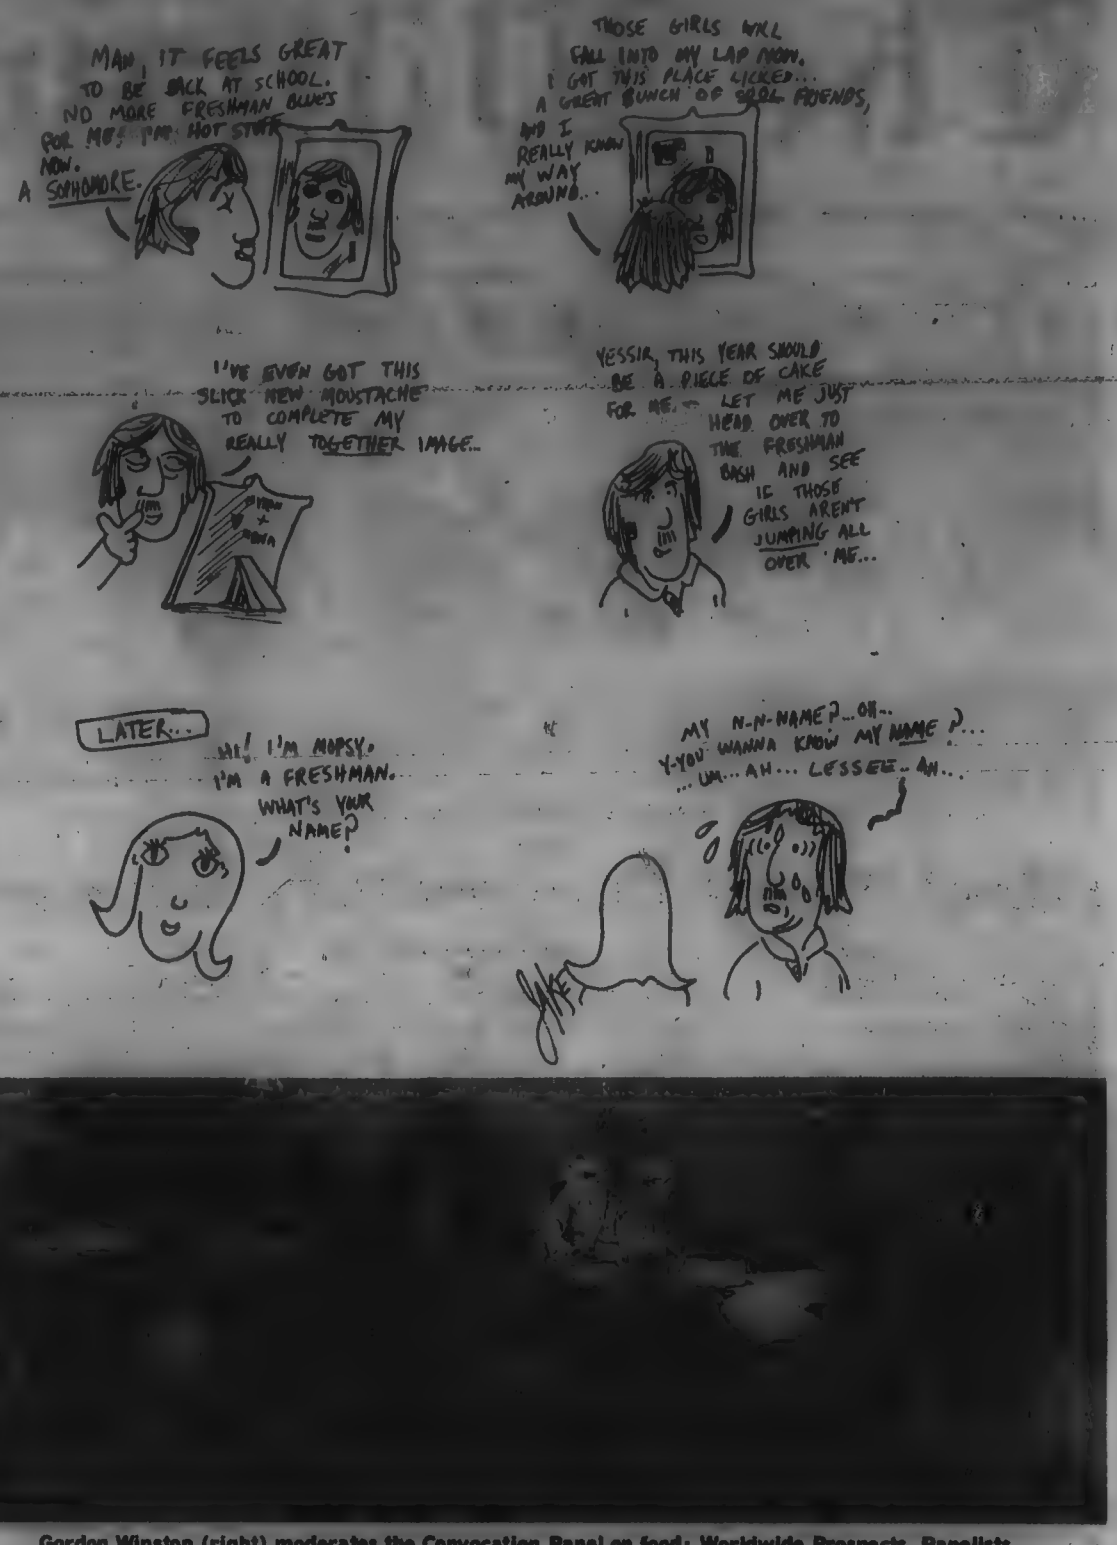
Likewise, Food Services has managed to avoid some of the perennial problems which have plagued the opening of campus dining halls in the past. Long lines have remained scarce with the exception of Sunday dinner, where the decision not to allow row house cookouts has caused crowding at some major dining halls. In addition, long overdue structural improvements have been made in some row house kitchens.

Convocation came off without a hitch. Not only was Lester Brown's address well received by students and faculty, but President Chandler's remarks about energy conservation, elm trees and the renovation of Chapin showed a willingness to confront important campus problems. Someone even had the foresight to order enough robes for the entire senior class this year.

Administrative competence isn't easy. Too often, even at a relatively small college like Williams, the right hand hasn't got any idea what the left hand is doing. To college administrators and staff whose efforts made our first week at Williams bearable, we say thank-you.

Food for thought

Rarely has a Convocation address been so well attended and received as Lester Brown's speech on worldwide food prospects. Students and faculty alike seemed to show more than a polite interest in Brown's warnings about the limitations of the earth's carrying capacity and the dangers embodied in exponential growth rates. Heads nodded in agreement, rather than boredom, as he noted that the world fish catch was declining and that the amount of irrigated land would decrease over the last quarter of this century. Few seemed surprised when he attacked the American meat oriented diet and extolled the virtues of cereal grains, fruits and vegetables.



When it was over, most observers agreed that they had heard a fine speech by a distinguished scholar on an important topic. We agree. Unfortunately, we suspect that Brown's message, like too many aspects of a Williams education, may remain an intellectual exercise. As the honorary degree recipients, faculty and a few students lunched at the Chandlers' on roast beef, salmon and sherbet, it was hard to see the impact. As students devoured "cube" steaks for dinner that night it was once again hard to imagine that they remembered Brown's words.

It seems that we're all guilty, to some extent, of intellectual hypocrisy. We award Lester Brown an honorary degree for what he says, but we're not willing to listen to his advice. Let's just hope that the man we've honored as a scholar with a message doesn't know a damn thing about worldwide food prospects. Otherwise the 30th day may be upon us before we realize that he was right.

Children's Museum

The Children's Museum of Williamstown located on School Street in Grant School, has started an "After School Program" led by Williams College students. According to Kate Wood, coordinator for the outreach program, the Children's Museum is a perfect environment for Williams College students to work directly with local children in an environment conducive to creativity.

The museum welcomes students who enjoy directing outdoor science workshops or coaching sports. College art students can give workshops on collage, doll-making, carpentry and puppet-making. Architecture students are already planning to build their own exhibit at the Children's Museum under the sponsorship of Lee Hirsche. Child psychology students working with professor Phoebe Cramer are going to use the museum as a child observation center. French, Spanish, and German are going to be taught twice a week for ten weeks starting October 3. Computer and-or calculator workshops could be given by math buffs. Performers are welcome to plan a dance recital, small concert or cabaret for kids right in the museum's exhibit space. Interested students can call the Children's Museum at 458-1160.

Letter: Munich

To the editor:

We hardly need such a superficial commentary upon a major West German newspaper after the appearance of "The Lost Honor of Katherina Blum." The Williams Record journalist enjoying himself in fashionable Munich certainly gave an adequate description of the BILD-Zeitung's layout. To concentrate merely on the layout, however, shows a dangerous lack of perception on the part of the Munich bureau chief. Instead of emphasizing the graphics of the BILD-Zeitung, perhaps the author should have dealt with the underlying editorial policy of the paper, and condemned its unquestioning support of reactionary politics. Should we assume that the Williams Record editors are simply ignorant of the political realities inherent in journalism—or are they refraining from discussing this more important aspect as a consequence of what has been up to now their well-hidden political stance?

Corrections:

In the September 9 issue of the Record, it was erroneously reported that the faculty decided to require students to sign an Honor Code pledge each year. This decision actually came from the Honor and Discipline Committee and was not subject to faculty approval.

A typographical error in that story resulted in the sentence "Faculty will not be required to give a copy of their code requirements to the Dean's Office." The statement should have read "Faculty will now be required . . ."

The headline "WOOLF replaces Frosh Days for '84" should have read "WOOLF replaces Frosh Days for 84," referring to the number of freshmen involved in the program.

Peterson, who has served in three administrations as well as in private industry, spoke of the growing public awareness of the food problem. "There is most definitely a growing awareness," she noted, "that what we do as individuals has an effect."

Norris Phelps illustrated the drastic changes that New England farm operators have been forced to make in order to survive. His cow herd has increased in size significantly over the years as well as in productivity.

Woodwell described the ecological side of the world food problem. "We have to determine," he said, "what is happening to the total supply of carbon fixed on earth. We must maintain an environment that is wholesome for living systems. That is the problem of agriculture. If we're going to preserve our resources, we're going to have to begin to modify our methods."

from the city to the country. We must turn, Brown urged, to ecologists, not economists, for guidance, as ecologists have "a better understanding of the overall situation."

The Fall Convocation began with a prayer led by the Reverend John Eusden. President Chandler then announced the names of the seniors who were elected to the Phi Beta Kappa Society.

Honorary Doctor of Laws degrees went also to Esther Peterson, Special Assistant to the President for Consumer Affairs, and to R. Hal Dean, Chairman of the Board and Chief Executive Officer of the Ralston Purina Company.

deal with issues effectively," he added.

Herwitz called the concept of parity between faculty and students on student-faculty committees, "symbolic of student power," but was not as concerned with numerical parity as he was with ensuring a strong student voice in College policy. He cited the need for increased student input into the committees of the various academic departments, which he claimed have been "sheltered from student concern." He added, "As the council begins to look into the situation in student-faculty committees, some changes may be made."

Convocation 1977

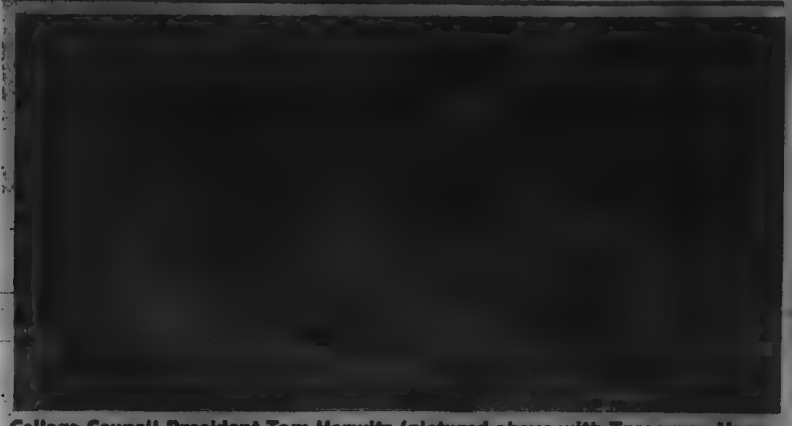
Hill announces Concert series

Ten performances of seven programs have been announced for the 1977-78 season of Griffin Hall Concerts at Williams College by Victor Hill, harpsichordist and director of the series.

Hill's three solo harpsichord programs will include the complete first book of Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavier," with eight preludes and fugues being given on the opening concerts (Sept. 17 and 18) and the remainder divided between January and February recitals. The opening nights also include the first performances in the Northern Berkshires of the Bach "Fourteen Canons," which only came to light in 1974.



Violinist George Green who is chairman of the music department at Skidmore College, will make his first appearance at Williams on Oct. 15 and 16. He and Hill will play music by Italian, French, and German composers on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of Freshman Parents Weekend.

Soprano Judith Reichert and baritone Daniel O'Connor return to the series in an all-Schumann program in April, including the complete song-cycles "Frauenliebe und Leben" and "Dichterliebe" with Victor Hill at the piano. This concert will be given at Weston Language Center.

At St. John's Episcopal Church in November, Polly Mattson joins Hill for a concert of music for two harpsichords. Flutist Janet Geroux returns to Griffin in April for a program of music for flute and harpsichord, individually and combined.

Griffin Hall Concerts was established in 1968 by Victor Hill, who is also associate professor of mathematics at Williams and organist-choirmaster of St. John's Episcopal Church in Williamstown.

All Griffin Hall Concerts begin at 8 p.m. except for the Sunday matinee on Oct. 16 at 3 p.m. The series is sponsored by Williams College, and the public is invited to attend free of charge.

College Council President Tom Herwitz (pictured above with Treasurer Harry Kelly) invites freshmen to attend a special meeting with him and other CC executive officers at 8 pm tomorrow in Griffin Hall to discuss current issues and gain insight into the functions of the CC.

There will be an opportunity to see some of the land-use history of the northern Berkshires in an exhibit at the Hopkins Forest Farm Museum during September and October. The Farm Museum is run through the Center for Environmental Studies. The exhibit, "People of the Hopkins Forest," runs through Nov. 1. There will be no admission charge. Sunday, Oct. 2 will be Crafts Day at the museum. Visitors between noon and 4 p.m. will see demonstrations of traditional and modern crafts as well as cider pressing. The Hopkins Forest Farm Museum is on Northwest Hill Road in Williamstown at the top of Bulkley Hill.

Composer's life is film

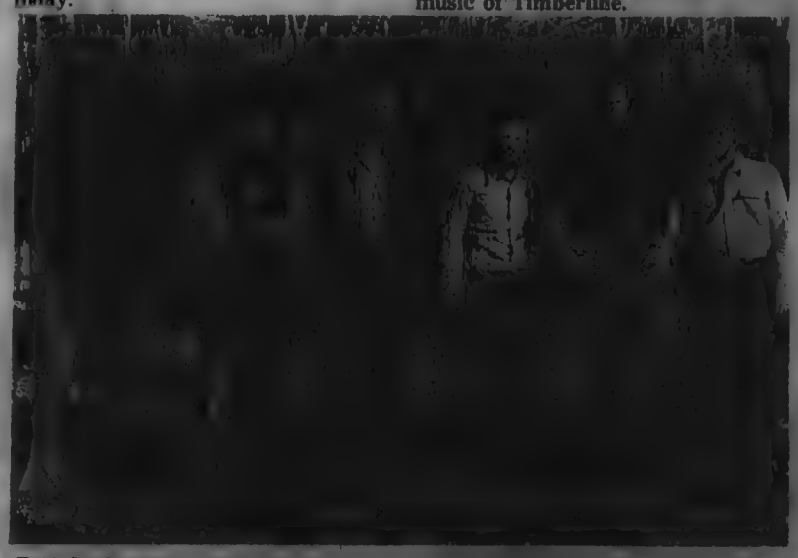
"A Good Dissonance Like A Man," a filmed story of the life of American composer Charles Ives, will be shown at 4:00 p.m. and again at 8:00 p.m. this Thursday in Bronfman Auditorium. Sponsored by the Department of Music, the shows are open to the public without charge. In a review of the movie, the New York Times called it "a serious, realistic motion picture about Charles Ives, the maverick American ... but the hour-long, color, 16 mm. film is not a dry documentary, either." Members of the Ives family and some of the people who touched his life are portrayed by professional actors, and the scenes were shot at many actual locations. There are taped interviews with people who knew Ives, drawn from the oral history that Vivian Perlis made for the Yale School of Music. In addition, some of Ives' music is played in complete sections during the film.

Charles Ives was born in 1874 in Danbury, Connecticut, the son of town bandleader George Ives, an original and eccentric musical innovator. Ives' music grew out of his environment, his father's experiments in music, and his emotional involvement in his New England life, eventually evolving into the complex tonalities for which he is so honored today.

Clark Art to show "Civilisation" series

An evening of mime, fine chamber music for woodwinds, a concert by a troubadour, two film series, and several lectures on art are planned for this fall at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute, Williamstown. Kenneth Clark's famous and highly praised film series "Civilisation: A Personal View" will be the major film offering for the fall. All thirteen episodes will be shown twice, on Fridays at 1:00 and repeated on Sundays at 4:00, beginning Friday, September 16. Besides the major auditorium events there will also be a new exhibit opening on November 1, "One Hundred American Drawings from the J. D. Hatch Collection," which is being shown in this country for the first time.

Two groups kick off concert season combining mellow and rock sounds



The All College Entertainment Committee (ACEC) will open its 1977-78 concert season this Friday at 8 p.m. in Chapin Hall with the country-rock music of Timberline.

Timberline is a Denver based group that has been performing since 1971. After years of touring with larger name acts such as Michael Murphy, Blood Sweat and Tears, Lynard Skynryd, the Ozark Mountain Daredevils and the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, Timberline is releasing their first album under the tutelage of producer Bones Howe. Howe has produced Tom Waits, the Association, the Fifth Dimension, and the Mommas and the Poppas.

The new album has received a tremendous response and they have been called one of the new up and coming groups, destined for glory. "The group sounds very much like the Eagles," said ACEC chairman Steve Case, "and we expect them to be extremely popular here."

Appearing along with Timberline will be the rock sounds of Fast Annie. Based in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, the seven member hot rock and roll group recently released their single "Unsafe at Any Speed."

Tickets to the concert are $3 with a Williams ID and are available at Baxter Hall and The Record Store on Spring Street throughout the week.

Fast Annie brings rock and roll to Chapin this Friday as they open the TIMBERLINE concert for the first ACEC production of the year. Timberline is an Eagle-like country rock group.

Rooming situations

Here, there and everywhere

by John Rindlaub

Williams students should consider themselves lucky to have rooms on campus this fall. Hundreds of Boston area students are housed in motels, nearby apartments, even a YMCA according to United Press International, as college officials who underestimated enrollments scramble to find temporary housing for them.

Now that you have a room at Williams, what do you do with it? Room decoration is a highly personal art, with the only restrictions on your creativity being the ground rules dictated by Buildings and Grounds. (Don't expect to get away with dangling your bed from the ceiling with chains and inch-wide screws). Once you've juggled furniture around the way you want it, the Williamstown area provides items, both functional, decorative or both to help you settle in.

Look past the lawn furniture outside the store, and the chairs, rockers, and tables displayed in the window, and you'll find useful items for dorm rooms at George N. Hopkins Co. on Spring Street. Hopkins has a good supply of desk lamps, extension cords, lamp kits, lamp shades, waste baskets, extension cords, glasses and small appliances such as alarm clocks (essential) and coffee pots (in anticipation of all-nighters). There are larger items available including towels, sheets, rugs, blankets, and arm-rest-less pillows.

For the industrious decorator who wants more elaborate furnishings, there are unfinished bookshelves, chairs and desks. The Pownal View Barn just over the Vermont line has an excellent supply of unfinished tables, desks and shelves, and a showcase of recliners. Across from Phelps General Store on Water Street is Taconic Lumber where you can buy cinder blocks and wood to make the cheapest bookshelves around.

Even if you think your room is perfect, you should pay a visit to The Country Peddlar, located on Route 2 in the red barn just before the North Adams line. Amidst the baby carriages, bowling balls, books, records, and glasses, you'll find some expensive antiques, but there are good buys on rugs, chairs, and beds. Sandy, the owner, will arrange to get you a used refrigerator from $25 to $80.

Bulletin boards are popular and hard to come by. Try Lamb's Stationery in North Adams, where there is one for about $6. The Mount Williams Greenhouse on Route 2 has a vast selection of plants, both hanging and sitting, at reasonable prices.

Neil Young American Stars 'n Bars
(Crazy Horse (MS# 2201)

The "dark star" this summer hasn't been Crosby Stills or Nash, but rather their ex-partner Neil Young. For those who can't help but feel that all the clamor created over the CSN reunion has turned out to be much ado about nothing much, Young's latest album with Crazy Horse, American Stars 'n Bars comes as welcome relief for what has (with the exception of the New York "New Wave") been on the whole a bland, lackluster summer for American music.

On the strength of four truly outstanding songs ("Hey Babe," "Bite The Bullet," "Will To Love," and "Hurricane") backed by an adequate supporting cast, Stars 'n Bars is perhaps Young's best work since After the Gold Rush. It's a wonderfully tough and tender record. The contradiction is what the man with the "scratchy," anguished throat is all about. Young is a singer with two distinct voices. One yearns and aches with insistent romanticism, desperate dreams, starry-eyed poetry. The other bellows and bites like a rough-and-tumble cowhand, a snide, condescending realist, a bar-room rowdy.

Stars 'n Bars opens inauspiciously enough. "The Old Country Waltz" is a standard, though not unpleasing, country-rock ballad complete with steady fiddling. Whimsical but poignant ("Well I loved and I lost and I cried—The day that the two of us died"), the song is Young at his most relaxed, musically and lyrically.

The "peaceful easy feeling" continues. "Saddle Up The Palomino" gives us some of that "dirty" guitar playing Young is so famous for, yet the overall mood is still one of cheerful resignation ("The way I feel this must be real") to ironies and prosaic realities:

If you can't cut it, don't pick up the knife

There ain't no reward in your conscience stored

When you're sleepin' with another man's wife.

Next is "Hey Babe," one of the several gems Young has cut on this album. Here in a simple, pretty melody are the two Youngs in perfect balance, intertwined so completely that it's difficult to distinguish where one ends and the other begins. Depending on our mood, we can laugh or we can cry, and either response would be appropriate.

The title and lyrics suggest high-spirited, good-clean-fun girl chasing in the tradition of "taking it easy" with the Eagles or "getting around" with the Beach Boys ("Hey babe, say your're mine all mine"). However, Young sings so pathetically, so pleadingly and the background harmonies are so overtly sentimental that we start to emphasize. A tension has been created between two opposites. It's the old "double-think." The song is a winner.

Less exciting is "Hold Back The Tears," a calmer ballad in the spirit of "The Old Country Waltz." It's the calm before the storm though; the storm of the high-powered "Bite The Bullet," a rocker that rages with energetic guitar riffs by Frank Sampedro and belligerent singing by Young. This is Young at his toughest. Here he is truly one of the hard-nosed, honky-tonk boys. His best hard rock number since the classic "Cinnamon Girl," the song expouses the theme of the all-woman who "knows what it's all about" with words as vengeful as the raw power of the guitar playing.

Side two features Young at the height of his melancholic romantic intensity. "Star of Bethlehem," another simply-constructed ballad, sets us in the mood with specific references to lost lovers and dreams and a lonely harmonica solo.

"Will To Love" and "Hurricane," however, deliver an unmistakably devastating one-two punch. Back to back we have, with perhaps the exceptions of "Cowgirl In The Sand," and "Southern Man", the two of the best songs Neil Young has ever done. Both are desperate, both are elegant, and both go on and on in haunting Dirge-like fashion.

"Will To Love" is particularly extra-ordinary. Young is alone, in front of a crackling fire. One man, one guitar, and the fire snapping and popping in the background as he whines, "I've got the will to love. Never lose the will to love." Lamenting what will never be ("It has often been my dream—To live with one who wasn't there"), he compares himself to a fish fighting his way up stream whose "fins are aching from the strain."

And yet, despite his exhaustion (Young's voice sounds particularly fatigued and tormented), his resolve to live and feel intensely, to "burn always with a hard, gem-like flame," as Pater once put it, never wanes:

I can be like a fire in the night

Always warm and giving off light

But there comes a time when I shine too bright

I'm just a fire in the night.

Simple, slow, powerful electric guitar chords next follow, as "Hurricane" chillingly begins. The chords beat steadily, hypnotically, and once again Young's lonely voice is equally compelling. The lyrics themselves are a perfect mixture of the poetic and the colloquial, the mixture of which great songs are made:

You are like a hurricane

There's calm in your eye

And I'm getting blown away

It's somewhere safer where the feeling stays

I want to love you but I'm getting blown away.

And ironically, as the persistent guitar carries us away inside ourselves, Young himself implicitly questions the very validity of his pining. Musically and conceptually, "Hurricane" is a true tour de force.

Finally, as if to "snap us out" of his spell, Young closes Stars 'n Bars with an amusing little ditty called "Homegrown" ("Homegrown's all right with me—Homegrown's the way it should be") whose country flavor nicely rounds off the album, returning us to the mood of its beginning.

Yes, Neil Young has recaptured much of his past splendor with American Stars 'n Bars, an album which is proving to be one of the year's best.

Scrimmage uncovers growing grid talent

By Jim Lawler

If there are two things which pre-season football scrimmages nearly always produce, mistakes and surprises would be a pair of likely choices. Saturday's Williams-New Haven encounter gave the smattering of curious onlookers who lounged in the Weston Field stands a heapin' helpin' of both.

For the record, UNH tallied a pair of field goals and two touchdowns to the Ephs' two scores, but no official count was kept in the contest. The invaders had also scrimmaged Thursday, dropping a 20-3 decision to the Yale sub-varsity.

For miscues, Bob Odell's Ephmen fumbled, dropped, and kicked the football throughout much of the real estate of Berkshire County—something which could not have been unexpected from a team which had been practicing for slightly more than a week.

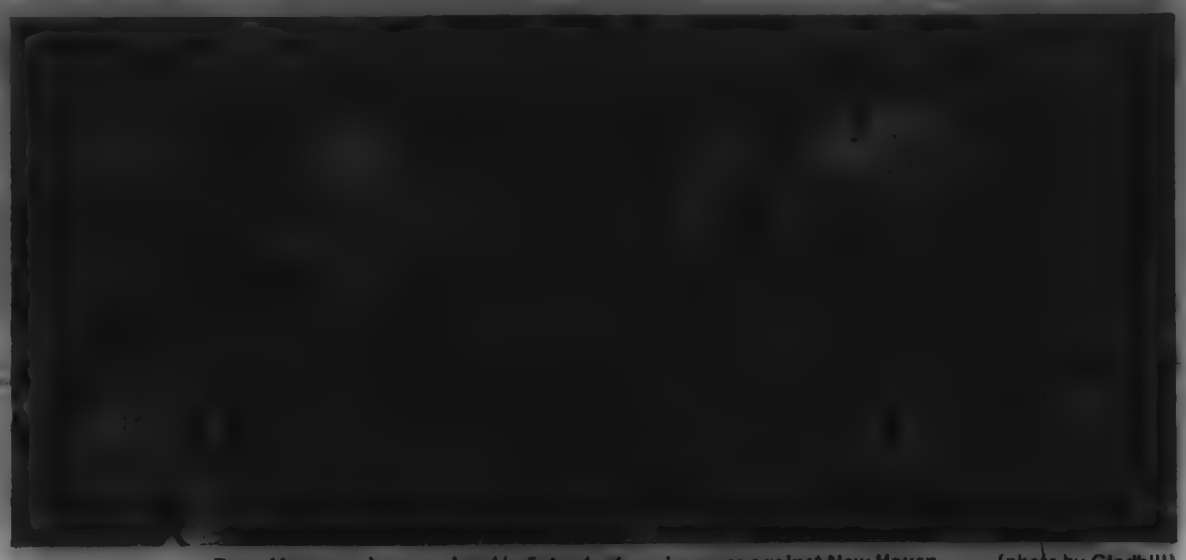
For surprises, start with a pair of freshman quarterbacks, Bob Lutz and Tim Connelly, who showed they're not quite ready for demotion to the playpen by moving the Purple extremely effectively, and continue through some snappy holes opened by a young offensive line stung earlier in the week by the loss of junior Bruce Wilson to a knee injury.

The Chargers from New Haven, winners of just four games in their first four years of varsity competition, but bolstered by nearly twice as much practice this summer as Williams, used the right leg of Mike Bounman, who booted a pair of first-half field goals, for all the scoring in the first half.

With Bill Whelan getting his first-ever start at quarterback, Williams' first pair of series were characterized by slow-developing plays, most of which were probably only a few days out of the playbook. On the third series of the summery afternoon, however, Whelan got the hosts moving with a nine-yard completion to Herb McCormick.

With Guz Nuzzolese leading Scott Harrington through nice holes (courtesy messrs. Maguire and Schoetz) Williams moved its newly-unyielded I formation inside the New Haven 40. The drive stalled five plays later at the 34, but augers well for the future of the I.

First-half defensive kudos are in order for sophomore end Russ Gee, whose kamikaze weak side pressure is reminiscent of Jack Costello '75, and certainly Greg McAleenan, who may not be all-world yet, but certainly knows how to stick people.



Frosh QB Lutz (a Gabrielesque 6'4") looked quite poised in directing the Ephs from their own 30 to the New Haven 17, tossing perfect passes to Bill Miller and Dave Massuco before bogging down. Exciting fellow rookie Connelly, a sneaky southpaw, turned two heavy pass rushes into big gains, completed a key toss to Kurt Anderson, and gave to Jay Skerry for the second Williams tally.

Greg Collins, not to be upstaged, hotfooted a 25-yard gain in the third quarter, leaving Williams in scoring position on the New Haven 18. Senior tri-captain Scott Harrington scooted through a proverbial mack truck hole for the score.

Odell and his fellow coaches got some fine play from sophomore end Dan Towle, perfectly positioned against the wishbone, and Colin Hart continues rapid improvement in the middle of the defensive line. A duo of frosh linebackers, John Deuschle and Brian Benedict worked well together, also.

New Haven's first score of the game came on a high arching prayer over the head of the second-team Eph secondary and the second on the last play of the game, as the New Havenites celebrated a scrimmage win with the type of unnecessary display one comes to expect from a team which has won four times in four years.

Odell and company will certainly begin ironing out the wrinkles this week, and somewhat fewer faces will see the field this Friday afternoon when the Purple tangle with Harvard's B team in Cambridge.

Speed tops list of soccer's skills

By Mark Pogue

The Grim Reaper of Graduation has left a wide swath in the ranks of Williams' 1977 Soccer Squad, but nobody on Cole Field this fall, from Manager Dick Abrams to Coach Jeffrey Vennell, is wearing black. "The attitude out there is fantastic, and the seniors in particular are working very hard," says Vennell of this fall's Ephbooters. "We've got the materials to be very competitive this year."

One of the materials Vennell refers to—and will rely on—is speed. Williams has already played four scrimmages this fall, and in each contest opponents at all points on the field have been observed kicking at after-images and lurching at receding purple jerseys. This quickness is most pronounced along the Ephs' line of attackers, where centerforward John Friborg and trailer Henry Osborne, who together accounted for 60 per cent of Williams' goals in 1976, will return to spark the offense. Look for Osborne, a co-captain this fall, to knock balls right past defenders; watch Friborg catch up to them and deal with the goalie one-on-one.

The Friborg-Osborne factory will be flanked and fed by an equally fleet set of wings, including Peter May, Cameron "Cat" Ferrante, and returning starter Perry Nelson. Junior Henry Lee and sophomores Ben Davidson and Andy Chase will back the trailer and centerforward slots.

Quickness and good individual ball skills will allow the team to hedge some bets and play more aggressively than in past years. A large part of this task will fall to the midfielders, and especially to senior co-captain Teddy Rouse, who will anchor the Purple centerfield and help control its short-passing game. Rouse will team with junior Greg Hartman, who displayed a penchant for cool thinking when the action got hot in 1976. Dave Barra, recovering from a summer knee injury; Dave Corcoran, a reformed football player; and Chick Johnson, who can also play wing, comprise the depth at halfback.

Graduation left the team with just one experienced fullback, sweeper Bruce Camilleri. Providing he rounds into condition soon, "The Tenacious One" should win the sweeper spot, but applications are still being reviewed for all three of the other backfield positions. Peter Thayer could have an edge at right wing, and junior Jan Dembinski looked "very good" in a recent scrimmage, but Billy Kister, Brian Smith, Tad Roach and Marcus Smith (currently injured) are making the final selection process difficult, Vennell says he is "not worried" by the backfield situation, but it may prove to be the weakest cog in the Eph machine.

Senior Jay Loeffler, "The Doctor," has proven himself in two years of play to be a first-rate goalkeeper. Loeffler shut the door on Bates last year in an important away match.

The Ephs are 1-0-3 in pre-season action thus far.

Cross country shoots for no-loss season

by Frank Carr

Coach Tony Plansky's varsity cross country squad will be shooting for an undefeated 1977 season on the strength of a fleet trio of seniors. The threesome of captain Dan Sullivan, Frank Carr and Joe Kolb, have shown a great deal of pre-season confidence in the team's ability to improve upon last year's 10-3 record, as well as the 4th and 15th place finishes at the Easterns and New Englands.

Seniors Larry Wu, Hans Giesecke, Stew Read and Cleve Thayer are back after a fine '76 season, while Doug Greeff and Dave Breuer return to the team after a year sabbatical. Dan Reilly is the only senior rookie on the squad, but he is psyched and ready to go after completing his first Boston Marathon last April.

Junior Tom Schreck is back from a semester in California, but unfortunately, his fellow classmate and roadrunner Steve Polasky is spending a year abroad at the London School of Economics. Jon Miller will join with Schreck to round out the rather meager class of '79 contingent.

There will be eight entrees on the sophomore menu with Coach Plansky's favorite being Roadrunner a la Mike Behrman. Rusty Anderson, Steve St. Clair, Peter Winn, Garrick Leonard, John Duffield and Rick Lane will be vying for spots on the varsity along with an excellent group of freshmen numbering 17 at the organizational meeting.

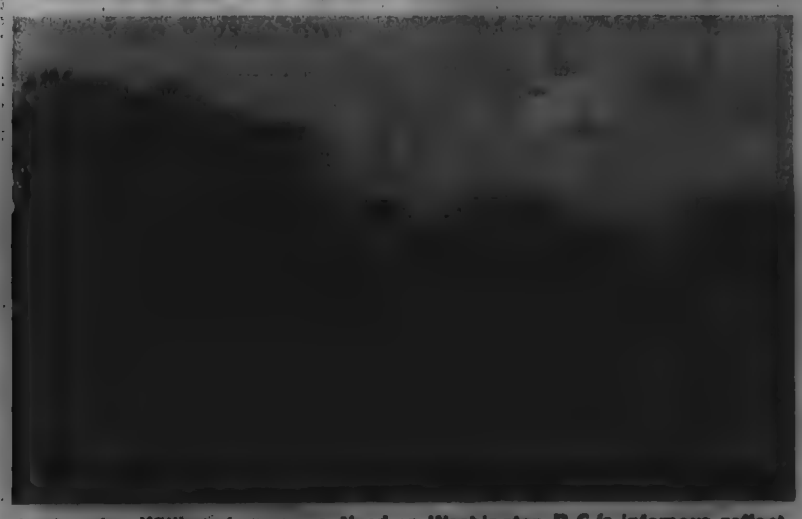
The Ephmen open up the season on September 17 against R.P.I. at home. A week later they face the Alumni at home and then the travelling begins, but unfortunately never stops. The Ephs will have all the rest of their meets away, including stops in Burlington, Vt., New London, Conn. and of course the city of Boston where they will make three separate excursions over Franklin Park.

Peinert becomes new crew coach

John C. Peinert has recently been selected to head the crew program at Williams College. Peinert, a 1970 Williams graduate who coached the freshman crew during the 1976-77 school year, succeeds Brian Dawe who has left Williams to assume a coaching and teaching position at the Brooks School in North Andover.

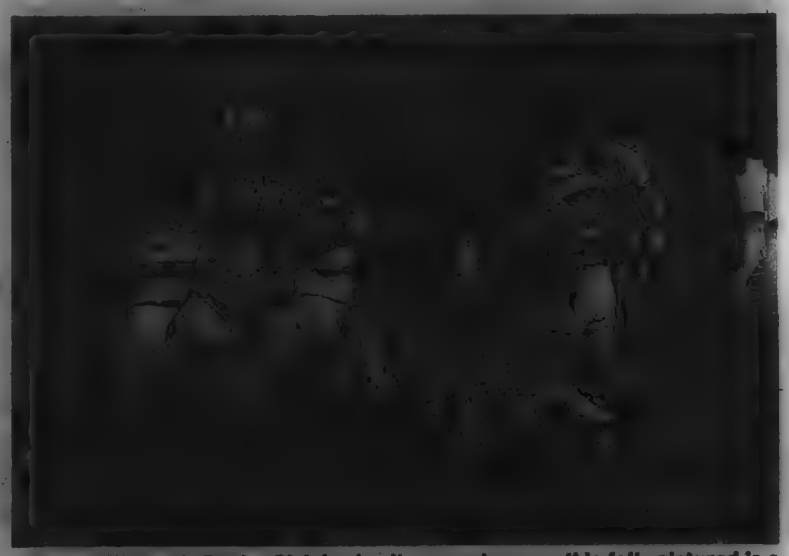
Peinert brings 10 years of rowing experience and three years of coaching experience to the Williams rowing program.

After three years of Williams rowing and summer rowing at Vesper Boat Club in Philadelphia, Peinert spent time in Washington, D.C., rowing for Potomac Boat Club. Eventually he became a lightweight single sculler.



He returned to Williamstown in the fall of 1970 to coach freshman and lightweight crews for the next two years. After a four-year break from coaching, he rejoined the Williams crew staff last fall and boated a freshman crew which rowed to a fourth-place finish in the Dad Vail Regatta, the eastern small college championships.

"I think it's time Williams wins the Saratoga Oar at the Little Three," Peinert replied when asked what the coming season's goals will be. He was referring to the trophy awarded to the winner of the annual heavyweight varsity boat race between traditional rivals Williams, Wesleyan and Amherst. Although Williams freshmen, lightweights and women have all won their contests in the Little Three Regatta for the past two years, the heavyweight championship has eluded the Ephmen since the three-way contest began in 1969.



In addition to coaching crew, Peinert has begun his own business making fiberglass racing shells for competitive rowing and is in the process of developing fiberglass oars and sculls. A native of Wilmington, Del., he now resides in White Creek, N.Y.

Brian Norris, a 1977 graduate who rowed for four years at Williams, will assume Peinert's former position as freshman coach.

Prof. George Marcus will remain as head women's coach; he will be assisted this year by Anne Eisenmenger, a 1976 Williams graduate with four years of rowing experience and some coaching practice gained while coaching lightweight women in the fall of 1976.

Dorm service returns

Drummond will deliver

by Randy Wang

Student complaints have brought about a return to the traditional method of linen delivery starting next week, according to owner of the enterprise, Jay Drummond. Drummond explained Wednesday afternoon, following trial of a central exchange system, that "there were just too many hassles."

Long walks from the Row Houses, Greylock, Mission Park and the Berkshire Quad to the exchange center in front of Chapin Hall were the major complaints. Accustomed to the convenience of dormitory delivery, the approximately 650 users were unenthusiastic about the change. Unable to find a more suitable location, Drummond decided to return to the old system.

Security problems prompted implementation of the "one-on-one" exchange. Last year, many students discovered that their linen had disappeared between the exchange and their retrieval of the box.

In order to minimize theft, Drummond has changed the boxes each year. Last year, several black magic marker labelled boxes turned up among the red labelled ones, an attempt by some students to obtain free linen. This year the service will use bright orange labels.

Despite increased costs, linen rental prices have not risen in the past three years. Drummond surveyed linen services at nearby institutions for ideas on how to meet these costs. Dartmouth University, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, Hamilton College and St. Lawrence University each provide laundry services an on-campus room for weekly exchange. At each of Tufts University's residential houses, a room within the house is provided. The lack of such facilities at Williams College has accentuated the present difficulties, Drummond said.

Other possibilities, such as offering several exchange locations, in effect, an expansion of the unsuccessful system, might be considered during this year, according to Drummond, but not in the near future.

The return to dormitory delivery will lead to higher costs than under the central exchange location. Unless a cheaper alternative is found, Drummond said that a price increase of one or two dollars should be expected next year.

Woodbridge, Chadbourne to get phone service soon

Students in Woodbridge and Chadbourne houses will receive phone service by the beginning of next week, according to Business Manager Shane Riorden, or the College will rebate a portion of their room fees for the time they are deprived.

A spokeswoman for New England Telephone and Telegraph said that engineers should complete changes in the College's switching equipment late this week, which will make it possible to connect phones in both houses early next week, Riorden said Wednesday. "However, we are at the mercy of the telephone company here," he said.

The installation of 29 phones in the Woodbridge and Chadbourne units, addition of phones in Dewey and Seeley and the continued operation of 35 phones in Garfield until January have raised the number of telephones above the capacity of the College's switching equipment. The equipment is able to accommodate 1100 student and 400 faculty phones during the year, according to Riorden.

"Last year, in preparation for what we thought would be a tremendous influx of students, Williams added 140 phones to Mission Park to eliminate problems there," Riorden said. "That eliminated the 5-10 per cent emergency switching capacity we liked to leave on hand for just such situations," he added.

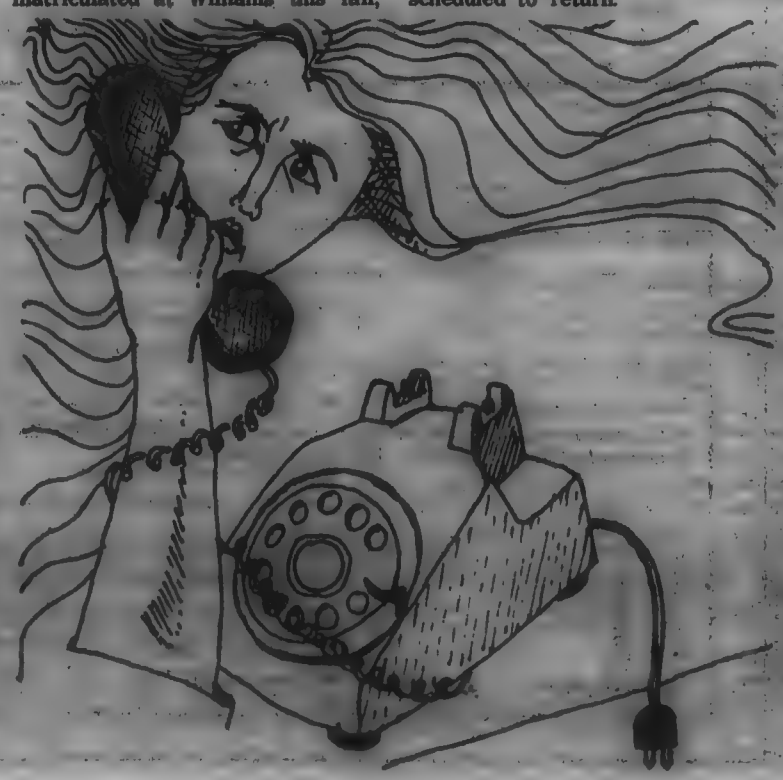
"Unfortunately, we did not see the addition of 29 phones this year as a net addition—which it is, at least in terms of this semester," Riorden said. "Next semester Garfield phones will be disconnected and next year Dewey and Seeley should be closed."

The telephone company will pay for most of the modifications of the college switching system, according to Riorden, because company equipment is involved. The phones for Woodbridge and Chadbourne are presently in boxes, ready to be connected. Numbers have already been assigned.

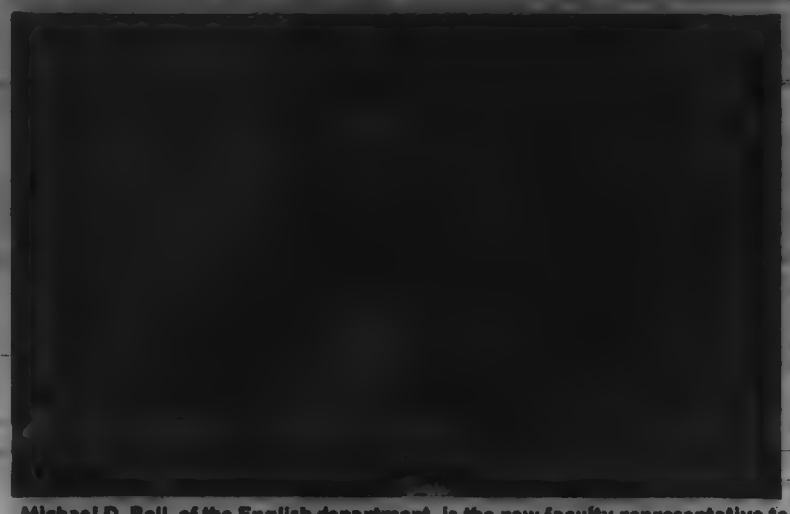
Riorden also said that the College's telephone service consultants have assured him that Williams has "the most luxurious student telephone system in the East." However, he continued, NEPAT has cautioned Williams that present rates do not encourage such a system except for administrative purposes. They have offered to study the system and submit alternatives.

Riorden said that he expects Williams to continue with its present phone service for several years nevertheless.

Student attrition levels rise



Dean of the College Peter Berek said that the number of people who withdrew from Williams last year rose substantially over the number who withdrew in previous years. The number of transfer and exchange students, however, fluctuated within their normal ranges.



Last year 122 students left Williams as compared to the 97 who left during 1975-76. According to Berek, the average sophomore class usually numbers 12 fewer than its freshman total; the average junior class, 27 smaller than its sophomore class; and the average senior class 9 fewer than its previous year. This year's figures, however, remain higher than the averages, Berek said.

Approximately 30 transfers matriculated at Williams this fall, with a higher portion coming from area community colleges than in previous years. Berek explained that, for the past six to seven years, the Admissions Office has aimed to make the opportunities of the College more widely available and to diversify the student body by accepting outstanding transfers from community colleges.

The College deliberately depressed the number of exchanges to 36 to avoid overcrowding, Berek said. Normal figures run into the high forties and fifties.

The number of Williams students on exchange at other schools this fall totals 67, a slight rise over last year. An additional 27 will depart for the second semester, while 15 are scheduled to return.

Michael D. Bell, of the English department, is the new faculty representative to College Council.

CC permits concert bid

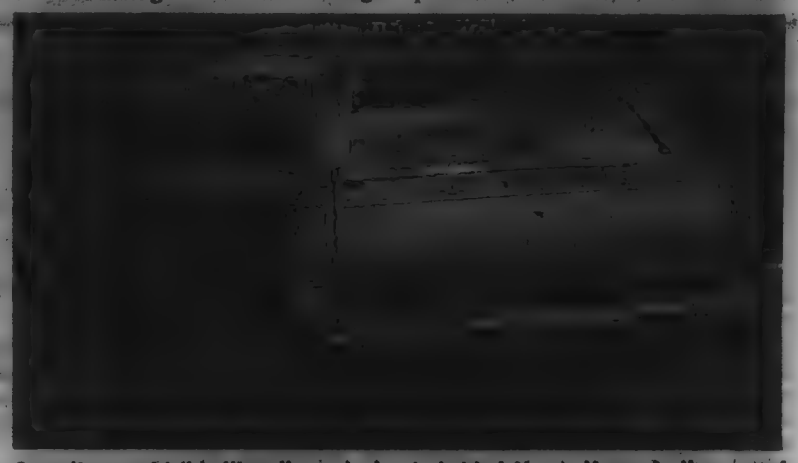
by Ray DeMeo

The College Council granted the All-College Entertainment Committee permission to submit a bid for a major concert act to appear this fall, and elected new members to the Committee on Educational Policy, the Committee on Undergraduate Life, and the Elections Committee, Wednesday night.

The ACEC has tentatively scheduled Oct. 21 as the date for a large-scale concert. Chairman Steve Case announced that the committee has arranged to bid for a national act.

The ACEC plans to stage 8 concerts over the course of the school year, including a dance concert to take place over Homecoming weekend. Case explained that the committee could not schedule a major act during homecoming due to a lack of adequate concert facilities.

The council elected new members to two student-faculty and one council committee. Beth Geismar, Brian McDermott, Joel Smith and Rich Williams will serve on the council's Elections Committee, and Smith will be the new CUL representative. Senior Larry Mitchell will continue on the CEP this year.



Council President Tom Herwitz reaffirmed his desire to "finish up what was left in the halfway stage last year." In addition, he reported on the Wednesday faculty meeting, including the interim report of the Committee on Black Students at Williams. Herwitz also announced that the council will elect members of newly created parallel committees during its next few meetings.

Contributors tour campus this weekend

The main contributors to the Capital Fund For the Seventies and principal fund raisers will visit Williams as guests of the College this weekend. They, and their spouses, will participate in an informal program intended to show the College's appreciation of their efforts and contributions, said College Director of Development Willard Dickerson.

The participants will attend a guest meal at a residential house tonight, and will visit the Log-Alumni House later in the evening. Tomorrow, they will tour various facilities built with money raised in the Capital Fund drive. Later that day, Capital Fund National Chairman and College Trustee Preston S. Parish '41, College President John W. Chandler and Professor of Chemistry J. Hodge Markgraf '52 will address the donors and campaigners in Bronfman.

The Capital Fund has passed the $30,000,000 mark, with a projected goal of $50,000,000 by the end of the decade. According to Dickerson, the funds raised in the campaign will be used for major building projects, or "capital purposes." The Capital Fund, because it deals with large sums of money and major projects, requires outstanding efforts from alumni, friends of the College and parents of students, said Dickerson.

Car registration crackdown begins

by Steve Wassell

The college security department began its annual attack on unregistered motor vehicles parked on campus this week, ending a week-long grace period by mounting a ticketing campaign against owners of "bootleg" cars.

"Bootleggers" across campus attempt to hide unregistered autos to escape the $50 registration fee required by the College. The fee is designed to offset the cost of maintaining lots while discouraging use of cars.

Payment of the registration fee buys a student a parking space, "unscheduled" patrolling by security police, Massachusetts registration and lot maintenance, Director of Security Walter O'Brien said.

"Our big effort now is to see motor vehicles properly registered," the security chief said. Tickets now being issued will be enforced "except for extenuating circumstances," he emphasized, to not encourage registration.

"I think the fee is a very modest charge for the overall cost," commented Shane Riorden, College business manager. "It is a reasonable figure," he said, including the cost of buying and building lots, plowing, repair and patrols.

Almost all students have registered motor vehicles, from cars to mopeds, O'Brien reported, pouring nearly $25,000 into college coffers.

Riorden could not detail disbursement of these monies. The College absorbs car fees and fines, he said, paying for maintenance of parking lots from its total income—including tuition and application fees.

Last year the College took in $23,000 in "fees and fines," the business manager said. The cost to the Buildings and Grounds Department for keeping up "lawns and avenues" and to security for all patrols was $30,285.

Riorden cited these expenses as major car-related outlays, but said he could not estimate how much were facilities for student autos, or whether the income from fees and fines equalled the cost of student vehicles to the College.

The Agenda

Effecting student-oriented reforms at Williams is no easy task. Frequently, of course, students can't agree on what it is that needs to be done. At other times, however, there is a consensus among students about the need for change yet nothing gets done anyway. Part of the problem undoubtedly results from the way "the system" at Williams is structured. Not only do the faculty control a majority of votes on key campus committees, but the leadership of student organizations is subject to a yearly turnover.

We suggest that the key to getting more student reforms instituted, however modest their nature, is to get a number of student organizations to agree on an agenda. Rather than having a dozen different organizations and committees all working on different problems at different times, it sure would be nice to get some coordination.

The College Council would be the ideal vehicle for establishing a list of important issues and coordinating various organizations to work for change. Unfortunately, the CC track record doesn't exactly foster optimism. Last year that organization spent a sizeable chunk of its working year debating its existence. We hope that the new council avoids a similar fate and instead devotes its energies to the issues. Exactly which issues should be dealt with this year is certainly a matter for debate but we believe that any CC agenda should address the following issues.

1.) Co-op housing—This item has been discussed, debated and surveyed to the point of absurdity. It's awfully tough to find students who are against the idea and the administration keeps saying that it is looking into the situation, yet there still isn't any co-op housing alternative at Williams. Why?

2.) Student course guide—Students have made some progress on this front but more could be done. The faculty wants students to participate in their course evaluation procedure, yet students are denied access to the results. Then when students attempt their own version, faculty opposition takes the form of non-recognition (not allowing student course evaluation questionnaires to be filled out in-class as the faculty course evaluations are) and criticism of the validity of the statistics in the student guide. Students should push for access to the faculty questionnaire and official recognition of the student guide.

3.) Tenure—Students are virtually unanimous in agreeing that they should have more input into faculty tenure decisions. The problem is complex and the Record has no solutions but students must do everything possible to prevent further fiascos of the Grudin, Perlin, Tietenberg variety.

4.) The situation of black students—Although it's doubtful that a student consensus exists about the difficulties and problems faced by black students at Williams, this item certainly deserves increased attention from student organizations. Charges of racism surfaced last year. The Committee on Black Students at Williams has published an "Interim Report" which should provide the basis for further discussion and study.

5.) Energy Conservation—Tackling this problem should be relatively easy since presumably student interests will complement faculty and administration goals. The danger lies with apathy. The price, and perhaps even viability, of a Williams education is greatly affected by energy costs. The College has done the preliminary studies but more energy conservation steps could be implemented.

Certainly this list is incomplete. It doesn't even begin to explore the mysteries involved in how Dean Roosenraad decides who to let off-campus or why the Food Services budget is so secret. Nor does it deal with the problems of budget reform for campus political organizations and the need for alternative board plans. Nevertheless, it's a start and we hope that students can get together on these and other issues and push for reform.

First Aid and emergencies

by Jean Rindlaub

One of the reasons cited in the Williams Student Handbook for the eight-quarter Physical Education Requirement is "to provide students the opportunity of developing skills in activities with survival implications, such as swimming, life saving and water safety." With that philosophy in mind, students are required to pass a swim test taken in the fall of their freshman year. Those failing to pass the test must pass a basic swim course. Every year much fuss is made over the requirement, but certainly it is a valid one. All of us are apt to be near a sizable body of water during our stay at Williams. If we can't save someone else's life, we can at least spare our own.

I never gave much thought to the swim test, passed it, and proceeded to take PE courses in tennis, squash and skiing. I had no problem with the requirement which insisted that I take two quarters of a carry-on sport. Presumably, after all these requirements which are burdens to many students, we can swim enough to get ourselves out of deep water. And we will presumably still be looking slim and trim at forty-five.

I had never given the absence of a first-aid course among PE offerings any thought until Wednesday night when a student had a convulsion while eating dinner at Greylock. Fortunately, the head waiter was notified immediately and a doctor arrived within minutes. Luckiest of all, the victim regained consciousness and is now fine.

The incident brought home to me that after two years at Williams, I knew practically nothing about first aid. No one at our table would have known how to handle the situation on [illegible]own. Had the student had a heart attack, an epilectic or diabetic fit, and had no help been available, who knows what might have happened.

It seems logical and humane that the College add a basic first-aid course to its PE offerings, if not its requirements. There already exists a comprehensive water life saving program, and the College should be congratulated for it. Yet students who dislike sports still find themselves taking trail crew or working around requirements. Hopefully, a first aid program would attract many students and provide more important use of our time and opportunity.

The naivete on the part of Williams students about first-aid is not just a college problem. The vast majority of Americans do not know artificial resuscitation; if they once did they have forgotten it—not to mention how to stop choking, or severe bleeding. Hopefully, it won't take many more accidents to illustrate the severity of the problem. You may know about everything from Hegelian dialecticism to why it snows, but can you save your roommate's life (you may not want to), your parent's, or anybody else's?

Committee on Blacks lists interim data

Administration, students, faculty measure progress

"The Williams community, like other American communities, is not immune to prejudices and practices which are so damaging to the relations between blacks and whites," warned the Committee on Black Students at Williams in a recently released memorandum based on a report to the faculty last May.

The committee was formed last spring as a result of "a perception on the part of students, faculty, and the administration that we had not achieved all the goals we had set" for attracting black students to Williams, according to Dean of the College Peter Berek. The investigation was intended to be "a look at our successes and failures" in dealing with black-white relations at Williams, he added.

The report discussed, and in some cases recommended action to improve relations between faculty and black students. It also discussed admissions policy and the need to broaden curriculum.

The committee will discuss five topics this fall in addition to the above issues, said Berek. These will include tutoring services, charges of racism in the Athletics Department, the Black Student Union (BSU) as "a supportive academic resource," relations between the Deans' Office and black students, and social relations between black and white students.

The committee met yesterday for the first time this year to organize and to continue the study begun last year. Berek emphasized that the committee had no legislative function, but would "approach other groups to take appropriate action."

The committee discussed faculty-black student relations at greatest length. The report suggested that black students are reluctant to seek help from white faculty, and, correctly or not, perceive some white faculty as having prejudiced attitudes toward black students. It suggested that this situation existed due to a lack of sensitivity and understanding between the groups.

The report recommended that increased awareness of the problem and increased sensitivity would be a first step in solving the problem. It proposed faculty initiative, department meetings and BSU efforts as further solutions.

A discussion of admissions policy, focusing on the need to maintain social and economic diversity in the black students admitted to Williams also occupied the committee. Their report warned against inadvertently restricting admission to black students from upper or middle-class backgrounds.

A failure of the college curriculum to reflect the black experience where appropriate also concerned the committee. The report promised that the committee would pursue the matter further during this year's study.

The committee also expressed concern over the difficulty of attracting adequate numbers of qualified black faculty.

Berek described the faculty reaction as "extremely attentive and interested," when he presented the report in May. "The faculty was very eager to learn what it could do," he added.

The Board of Trustees discussed the report at its meeting in June, he said. The trustees "perceived it as a matter of concern," according to Berek, and were interested that the College deal with the problem.

"They felt that it was a matter to be dealt with by the students, faculty and administration," said Berek, while they saw their own role in such matters to be one of "general oversight and review." Berek said he knew of no direct action the trustees would normally take, other than to insure that the overall policy of the College is correct.

The following is a memorandum of the Committee on Black Students at Williams which was submitted to the Faculty this fall. The text is derived from an interim report of the committee which was presented at the final faculty meeting last May.

At a Faculty Meeting in May the Committee on Black Students at Williams reported on its work during the spring semester and its plans for continuing discussions this fall. Many members of the Faculty asked the Committee to circulate a summary of the report so they could consider its observations and recommendations more fully, so we are distributing them to you at the start of this new term.

Most of our report concerned two topics: the curriculum (an area where we felt our discussions enabled us to raise some questions but were not far enough advanced to propose answers), and the relations between Faculty and Black students (where we make some recommendations for action that we hope will be helpful).

We also described our discussions with members of the Admissions staff and our recommendation, in response to these discussions, that Williams continue its commitment, affirmed by vote of the faculty in December 1968, to recruit and admit significant numbers of academically qualified black students. We also asked that consideration be given to assuring that the composition of the Black student group at Williams reflect the social and economic diversity of the Black community in America. We recognized that the decline in quality of inner-city high schools and the intense competition for a relatively small pool of talented Black students may make it both difficult and unproductive for Williams to shift its emphasis in recruiting Black candidates to such schools if (because of limitations on Admissions staff travel time) doing so would diminish our chances of attracting Black students from integrated suburban schools and other sources that have proved most fruitful in recent years. To help achieve a desirable diversity in our Black student body the Committee recommended expanding already-existing efforts by the Admissions Office to use Black alumni and current undergraduates to assist in attracting Black applicants. We also encouraged the Admissions Office to develop contacts in organizations within the Black community—churches, fraternal organizations, etc.—as a way of reaching talented potential applicants. Black students on our committee offered their help, both as undergraduates and alumni, in the College's admissions efforts.

Beginning this fall we will discuss the following topics:

We understand the difficulties that the College faces in recruiting and keeping black faculty...

a. Examination of tutoring services

b. Charges of racism in the Athletics Department

c. Discussion of the Black Student Union as a supportive academic resource for black students

d. Discussions of the Dean's Office and its relations with black students

e. Social relations between black and white students

The text of our reports on the curriculum and student-faculty relations follow.

Relations between Faculty and Black Students

The Williams College community, like other American communities, is not immune to the prejudices and practices which are so damaging to relations between blacks and whites. One concern of black students at Williams is that the College encourages them to believe that the faculty, unlike other members of society, are above such prejudices.

The question of relations between faculty, especially white faculty and black students was discussed by the Committee at great length and in more depth than any other subject. One of the principal benefits of this discussion was an extensive exchange of information; the faculty learned a lot about black students' opinions and perceptions; black students learned a lot about the white faculty's opinions and perceptions.

It is clear to the Committee that there are difficulties and errors in the relations between white faculty and black students which present serious obstacles to learning for black students. The sources of these difficulties are various: some are faults of attitude, some of behavior; some, perhaps most, are results of misperceptions. We have tried to identify several of the difficulties, as perceived by black students on the one hand, and by white faculty on the other. Having examined them, we have reason to believe that some improvements can be made which will increase learning opportunities for black students as a whole, and at the end of this report we make some suggestions toward this end.

There is one disturbing fact which stands out from all the other criticisms, opinions, and perceptions: black students are reluctant to seek out white faculty for help, even when they know that they need academic assistance; and they are reluctant to participate in class discussions, even when they feel they have something to contribute. Similar reluctance is felt by many white students, but it seems clear that it is more wide-spread among black students and has different origins. This disturbing educational situation, important in itself, has its causes in a combination of attitudes and perceptions which affect both academic and extracurricular life throughout the campus. A summary of our discussions of these matters follows.

Black students are reluctant to seek out white faculty for help, even when they know that they need academic assistance.

A consensus of black student perceptions of white faculty includes the following criticisms:

1. White faculty think of black students as academically inferior, less intelligent, and unwilling to work. One mark of this viewpoint which has been noted is an indication of surprise by a white instructor when a black student performs well.

2. White faculty sometimes appear to be uncomfortable or uneasy or indifferent or negative in the presence of black students. We as a committee feel that such behavior may be due to lack of contact with blacks and a resultant misunderstanding of black styles, or to a fear of saying or doing something to offend black students.

3. It is felt that sometimes a black dimension or black insight is ignored in a course in which it might appropriately be introduced.

4. White faculty appear to blacks to be unwilling to entertain alternative ideas which reflect black concerns. For example, they may disregard black students' contributions and impose penalties (that is, lower grades) for papers on subjects important to black students with which the instructors may be unfamiliar.

5. The tendency of white faculty to think in stereotypes of black students prevents consideration and treatment as individuals. Because black students are more conspicuous than white students, professors may be more likely to interpret the behavior of a particular student as behavior "typical of blacks" rather than that of an individual. In fact, it does appear that some faculty members feel that Black students frequently sleep late, Black students come late to class, and black students are tardy in turning in their assignments.

Like any set of generalizations, these criticisms are true in some cases and false in others. There are some black students who are chronically late and tardy; there are some who are not. There may be some faculty who feel that a student is academically inferior merely because he is black; there are certainly some faculty whose behavior gives this impression even if they do not hold this view. The effect of behavior of this sort is likely to be increased by the presence in the community of the prejudices referred to at the beginning of this report. The damage is also caused by the perception—or misperception—by the student, regardless the validity of the opinions which he attributes to the instructor.

We believe that awareness of the difficulties just described, that sensitivity to perceptions of others, is an important first step in alleviating the problems and correcting the errors which now exist. We believe that an exchange of information and opinion between all students and faculty, similar to the exchange in our Committee, would help to increase this awareness. Optimism about the outcome of such further exchange varies within the Committee.

Finally, we venture to offer the following specific suggestions as means of initiating the kind of communication we have in mind.

1. Instructors should actively seek out students who are doing poorly, to offer advice and assistance. This initiative would let students know of the instructor's concern. Contact of this sort would be particularly helpful to freshmen, and especially at the time of warnings, if notification were made before warnings were officially issued. (This practice would be beneficial for both black and white students.)

2. Where appropriate, departments should organize meetings with black majors to discuss curricular matters, advising services, and morale of students.

3. The Williams Black Student Union should initiate informal meetings in Mears House with members of specific departments to meet underclassmen. Upperclassmen and majors could be instrumental in organizing and conducting this kind of meeting, which could provide opportunities for informal encounters.

On the Curriculum

The Committee has not yet discussed curricular issues in as much depth as we hope to when we return to this topic in the fall. Nevertheless, some areas of concern have been identified, and we are therefore presenting a preliminary report at this time.

Our major concern is the extent to which the experience of black Americans and other American minorities is incorporated into the college curriculum. There are a number of arguments that favor broadening the curriculum in this dimension through a wider variety of curricular offerings or through the introduction of Afro-American materials in courses focusing on issues, problems, or themes directly relevant to, or exemplified by, the Afro-American experience.

Introducing Afro-American materials in many courses is highly justified wherever the Afro-American experience has been an integral part of the issues examined in the course—for example in American politics, music, art, history, or economics courses—or provides an especially good illustration of major points being made. Such materials, when integrated into the course, may well serve to sensitize white students and introduce them to varied aspects of the Afro-American experience, the role of blacks in American society and culture, and central issues facing blacks and American society as a whole.

This might help the relationship between black and white students, both in and out of the classroom, by reducing the sense of "foreignness" felt by both groups about the other. But of course this would depend heavily on how these materials were introduced, and an improved relationship between black and white students should certainly not be seen as an inevitable outcome.

On the other hand, such increased sensitivity and awareness seems to be very much in spirit with what we mean by the phrase "liberal education," and it can be argued that we are failing to provide our students with the best liberal education if the great majority of them can graduate without this kind of exposure.

Integration of Afro-American materials into courses where they are clearly appropriate might also help make black students feel less isolated and less alienated from many of their courses, and hence from their academic work and experiences at Williams. It might help them perceive white faculty and students, as well as the content of their work, more positively.

Put somewhat differently, the failure to include the experience of blacks in America in courses where it is relevant and would add to the learning experience of all our students reduces the relevance of such courses in the eyes of black students and adversely affects their academic motivation.

It should be emphasized that we are not advocating the indiscriminate introduction of Afro-American materials into courses. Indeed, some black students expressed that they felt embarrassment and discomfort when instructors made apparently ad hoc attempts to introduce such materials or comments into courses where they were not appropriate, simply because there was a black student in the class. As a committee, we are not certain about the best way to pursue what we feel is an educationally valid goal. One possibility that has been suggested as a starting point would be for the faculty of the various departments in the social sciences and humanities to discuss this issue in department meetings, perhaps in consultation with their majors, both black and white, since we have argued that both stand to gain educationally if Afro-American materials are integrated into the appropriate courses.

Finally, we offer a very brief comment on the issue of black faculty at Williams. The comment is brief not because we feel that the issue is unimportant, but precisely because there seems to be unanimity that it is crucial. The committee did not debate the value of having a significant number of black faculty at Williams. Their presence as educators, colleagues, counsellors, and role models is clearly essential to the educational health of the institution. We understand the difficulties that the college faces in recruiting and keeping black faculty, so that all we can do at this point is strongly urge the college to continue to give the highest priority to this area.

White faculty appear to blacks to be unwilling to entertain alternative ideas which reflect black concerns.

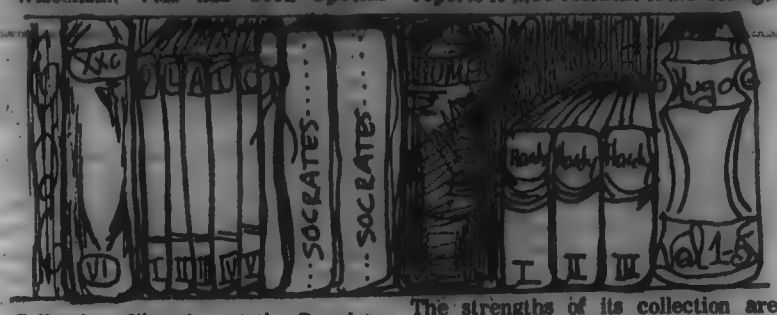
Volz minds Chapin treasures



by Mimi David

Copper keys open the small locks of the inset glass cases on whose shelves are old books with their titles stamped in gold on leather bindings. The elegance of the Chapin Library, the Williams College collection of rare books, is overwhelming. It is a treasure—the books as well as the room—a tribute to the glories of the libraries formerly in Lawrence and Stetson Halls. The aura of the past is preserved, in the books and in the atmosphere, but more importantly—it inspires use today.

With the appointment of a new custodian, Robert L. Volz, Chapin Library will be guided by a new spirit. Volz seems a refined, scholarly man with a reserved yet pervading enthusiasm about rare books. His interests range from opera to architecture and city-planning, and of course—book collecting. He speaks Latin and can use French, German, and Italian in his cataloguing work. Educated in Jesuit schools, he received his Bachelor of Arts at Marquette University and his Masters in Library Science at the University of Wisconsin. Volz has been Special Collections librarian at the Bowdoin College Library and head of the Department of Rare Books, Manuscripts, and Archives at the University of Rochester. As a member of professional societies, Volz is director and treasurer of the Manuscript Society and former president of the Pejepscot Historical Society—among numerous others.

Robert L. Volz

As his first attempt to introduce Williams students to the Chapin Library, Volz sent a hand-signed invitation to each member of the freshman class for a reception held this past Monday to view the current exhibition of works by the men named on the plaques on the outside of the Stetson Hall building. More than 450 invitations were mailed, about 10 reply cards were received. What accounts for this lack of response? If there is such a negligible audience, is the event justified? Does a lack of attendance raise questions about the purpose of such and goals of such an institution? Mr. Volz's response: "It is not the books that are on trial."

Chapin Library is a distinct entity—not part of Sawyer Library and the other college libraries, its custodian reports to the President of the College.

The strengths of its collection are especially in American history from Columbus to 1825, accounts written by botanists and physicians and observers of social customs, as well as in 17th century Mexican materials. However, a major obstacle in many rare books, is language. Much of the material is written in Latin, English, French, German or Dutch. Though this renders the specific content somewhat inaccessible, the wealth of art throughout many of the books is easily appreciated. Illuminated letters and manuscripts, woodcut illustrations, and engravings are often found in such rare books. Many of the books—simply by their existence—provide an incredible thrill. For example, one book currently on exhibition is one of the first publications of Aristotle's works—the second book ever published at Oxford.

One really must visit the Chapin Library to appreciate its collection.

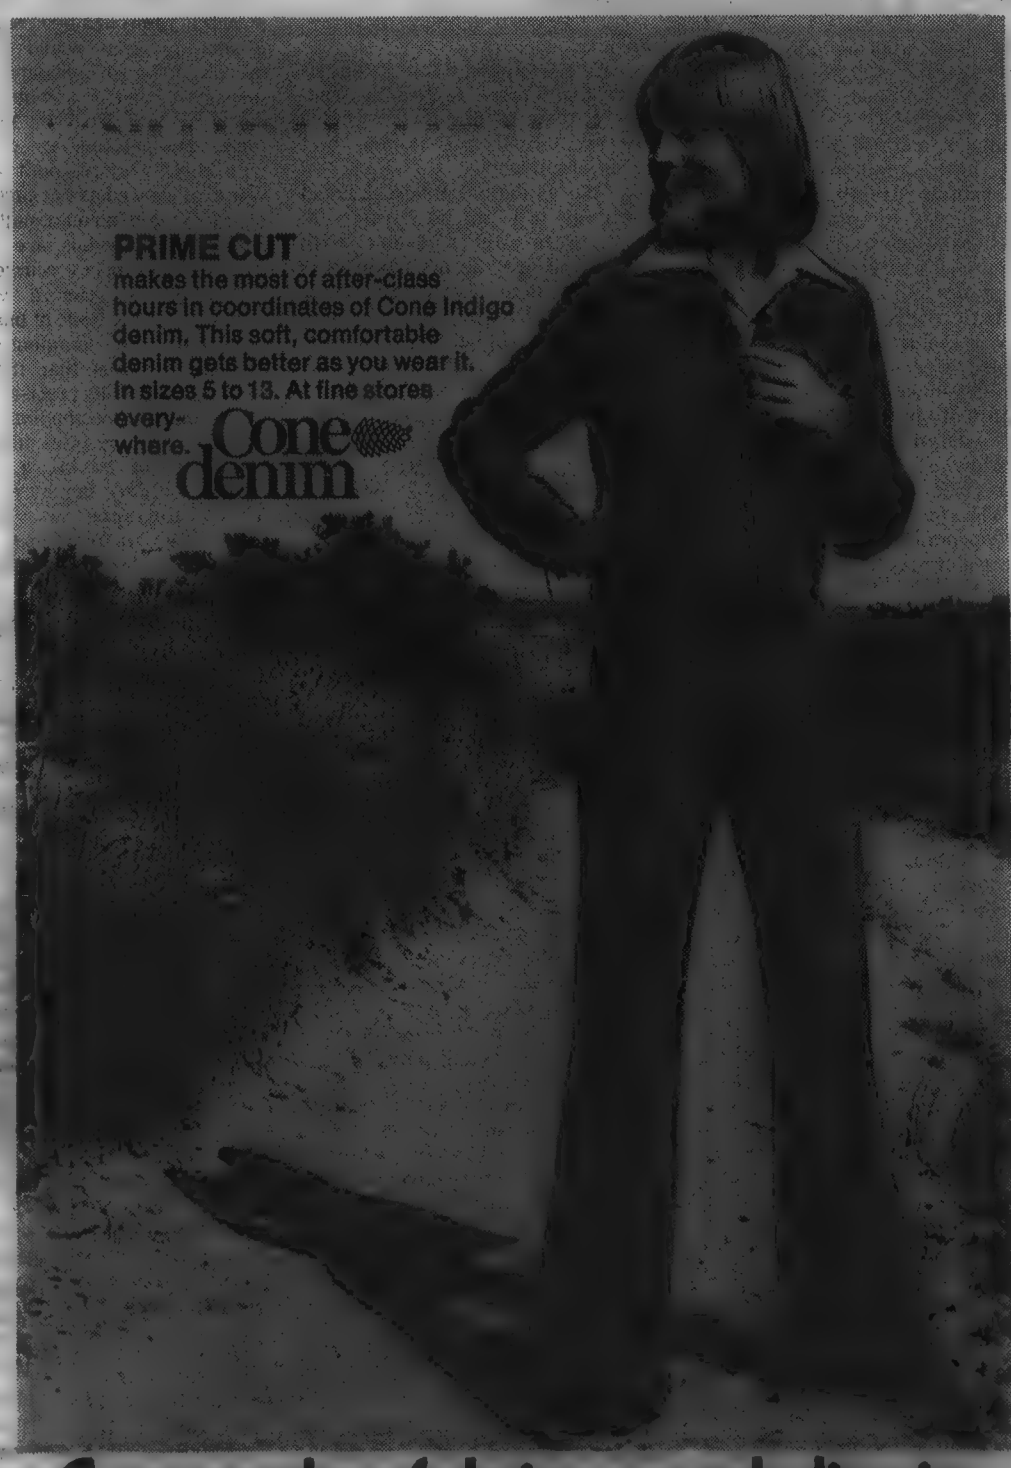
Griffin recital

Victor Hill will open the tenth season of his Griffin Hall Concerts at Williams on Saturday and Sunday, September 17 and 18, with a program of harpsichord music by Bach and Rameau. The public is invited to attend free of charge.



The recital features the Northern Berkshire premiere of the "Fourteen Canons" by Bach, the manuscript of which was only found in 1974 in private ownership in France. These short pieces are based on the first part of the theme that also serves as the basis of the "Goldberg Variations." Hill's arrangement is for two harpsichords; he will be assisted by Polly Mattson.

The program also includes the first eight preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 1."

Victor Hill is associate professor of mathematics at Williams and organist-choirmaster of St. John's Episcopal Church in Williamstown.

From the President's house, this network of paths can look deceptively desolate during class hours.

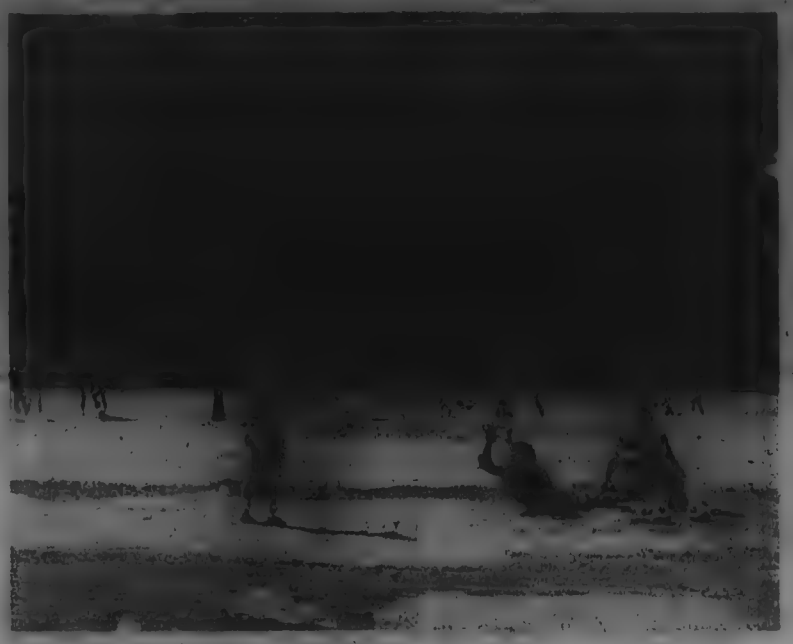
CEP questions WSP, class sizes, and grade differentials



The Committee on Educational Policy opened the academic year Monday by outlining topics for discussion in the coming weeks. Chairman Gordon Winston established two roles for the committee and the issues that fell under each category.

The "passive" duties of the committee entail the review of issues brought before the committee. Included are: a steering committee report investigating Winter Study Projects and student time—whether students should spend four WSP terms at Williams, or just two or three; the possibility of "non-traditional" language instruction—including Italian, Chinese and Arabic; and an International Cultural Association proposal to include Williams in an experiential education program—learning about other places and environments through going and experiencing them.

On the "active" side of committee work, Winston suggested that the CEP investigate class sizes both from the departmental and student perspectives; grading policies—the differentials within and between departments, and the reversing trend of grade inflation; and whether classes should extend into the 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. activity period to allow various activities, particularly varsity sports, to begin before four o'clock.

Winston emphasized that these activities may prove fruitless and that committee time may focus upon unforeseen issues that evolve during the year.

Before outlining the year, the committee debated and elected to admit a Record reporter to the meeting. Last fall the CEP voted to exclude all but committee members but reversed the decision later in the year.

Security seeks evaders

"We wanted not to subsidize student cars while restricting the actual area devoted to parking lots on campus," Provost Neil Grabois said. A previous provost set the present fee rate, with these criteria in mind, Grabois remarked.

Several administrators said the College's major objective in setting the $50 fee is to prevent student demand for parking from covering the Williams campus with blacktop.

O'Brien's campaign for automobile registration extends beyond the bounds of the campus. "Right now we're also very anxious to get off-campus students to register their cars," the security chief said.

"It's required by law that if out-of-state students keep their vehicles in the state they must be registered," he pointed out. O'Brien added that Massachusetts charges no fee for such registration.

Last year, O'Brien noted, his department issued some 530 registration decals. He said he expects about the same number of people to register cars over the course of this year.

Faculty receive Mellon Grant for research, pay

The faculty adopted what Dean of Faculty Francis C. Oakley called "the first explicit description of terms of service for members of the physical education department" at its monthly meeting Wednesday.

The three-page text outlining positions, fringe benefits and review procedures will be incorporated into the faculty handbook. Because physical education is not part of the academic program, the terms of employment in that department differ from those applied to the rest of the faculty. The decision Wednesday codified procedures that had already been in use, Physical Education Chairman Robert R. Peck noted.

During the 70-minute meeting, President of the College John W. Chandler announced that Williams had received a $250,000 grant for faculty development from the Andrew Mellon Foundation. The grant "gives support to faculty to develop courses in areas they are unfamiliar with" and pays for two assistant professor leaves of absence and several colloquia.

The President also noted that results of the College's self-study, dealing with the concept of development without growth, would be ready next week. The study which was conducted last spring is part of the accreditation procedures Williams follows every ten years. The approximately 280-page document discusses student life as well as curricular, and financial aspects of past and future development at Williams.

In other business, the faculty cast ballots to fill five positions on the Panel of Six, which reviews challenged tenure decisions.

Field hockey starts with tourney

by Nancy Rhein

How confident can field hockey coach Linda Watkins be as she takes the core of last year's 8-2 squad: an experienced and poised goalie, a sure-shooting forward line, and a roster which has essentially played together under the veteran coach and heads to Northampton for tomorrow's pre-season tournament? Pretty confident and almost certain of adding another half dozen or so victories to an already impressive three season record of 22-7-1.

The powers that be have been kind to the hockey team, snatching leading scorer Shailah Stewart and her '76 co-captain Amy Kindwall, and sidelining Leigh Wilson but reuniting two midfielders, back from semesters off, with the remainder of the 76's starting line-up.

Strong midfield play, the key to last year's victories, is a certainty again this season as juniors Dawn Bedrosian and Leslie (Flash) Milne return to anchor at halfback. Seniors Betsy Lyman and Priscilla Buckley, back in Williamstown, round out the experienced contingent along with Wellesley exchange Sue Wright.

Defensively, the steady play and control that brought the team five shut-outs last year is back and a year older and wiser as senior Cammie McClellan and sophomores Lee Ash and Mimi Dumouchel remain the defensive circle. DuMouchel returns to the cage for the Ephs, attempting to improve on last season's excellent five regular season goals against.

Despite appearances, the roster is not identical to that of last year, although junior Sandy Kraft will return to open-head the Williams offense. Seniors Anne McClelland and Lizz Olsen will add speed and stick-work to make the crease attack even more threatening. Senior Val Corning and sophomore Monica Grady should be seeing more varsity action this year. Both forwards traveled as subs with the team to the New England Field Hockey Association Tournament at last season's end and were named to the All College squad following their outstanding play.

This superior play and experience should give the squad improved chances against traditional powerhouse Mount Holyoke in the season opener September 22. The hosts have lost their four year varsity goalkeeper to graduation, a bright light for the usually unsuccessful Eph offense. A victory next Thursday will take the team to two easy games against Wesleyan and Trinity, handily defeated 3-0 and 6-0 last year, October 1 is D day for the team as it meets its toughest competition, Yale, for the first time on Williams turf. The Elis are sure to be the season's highlight.

The remainder of the schedule includes traditionals Skidmore, Middlebury and North Adams, with the team packing up Amherst October 15 for the first varsity competition between the two schools. Psychos aside, the Ephs should defeat their inexperienced neighboring hosts, as their own talent and depth should take them to yet another in a series of winning seasons.

Ephs take on Harvard's B

by Tim Layden

"Just like the last exhibition game of the season," is the manner in which Coach Bob Odell describes this afternoon's pre-season football tune-up against the Harvard Crimson's B team. The battle replaces last year's near-useless Albany State struggle and leaves the young Ephs just eight days shy of their first regular-season test.

Odell and his fellow coaches have been spinning their proverbial wheels in quicksand for the early portion of this week, as the films of the New Haven scrimmage, normally available to the staff Sunday afternoon, were stolen, and not viewed by the coaches until Wednesday.

"It was a typical first scrimmage," said Odell of the New Haven tussle, "with a lot of mistakes and few bright spots." The Harvard battle, however, should be slightly different, as Odell plans to "zero in on things little more." Translation: look for the regulars to play substantially more than last week, the reserves having had their look.

Williams escaped from the first pre-season battle of the year relatively unscathed, as only sophomore noseguard Bruce Knuer (lost for at least five weeks with torn ankle ligaments) sustained a serious injury.

The tooth-and-nail position battles which had been raging on Cole Field for nearly two weeks may have only been more clouded by the scrimmage. Should no clear starters emerge at several positions in today's test, it's going to be coin-flipping time for the Purple's coaching staff.

Consider the following: two guards must be chosen from among Ken Schoetz, Jay Skerry, and Brian Fales; a right-side tackle from Mark Tercek and Steve Rogers; a quarterback from among Bill Whelan, Greg Collins, and yes, Bob Lutz; and two starting defensive ends from among Dan Towle, Mike Masi, and Russ Gee. Heads I win, tails you lose.

Odell expects Harvard to dress a pair of talented sophomore quarterbacks for the contest, highly-publicized Brian Buckley and Burke St. John. "It should be a real good test for our defensive secondary," commented Odell. Dick Farley will probably go with a foursome of Greg McAleenan, Mark Eckert, Mark Gerry, and Long Ellis, with Andy Krakauer and Mike Walker ready to help out.

The unit which Harvard will send out against the Ephs will be "the second fifty," according to Odell, and should certainly provide equal competition to that which Dartmouth reserves offered in 1974 and 1975. Whether an official score is kept or not, the result of this one will tell a lot about next Saturday in Clinton, New York.

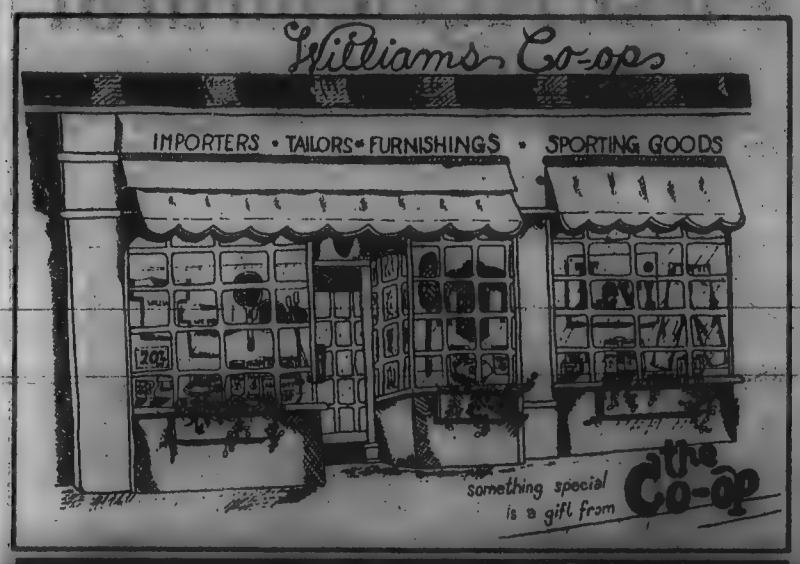
Women netters court another winning season

by Evan Bash



All is normal in New England women's tennis circles this fall as everyone is out to get Williams. Last year's New England Tournament champions and compilers of an 11-1 record, accustomed to being chased due to several recent outstanding seasons, will have to work hard if they want to remain queens of the court following the graduation of eight letter winners.

Coach Curt Tong believes the team will be able to more than hold their own with seven returning letterwomen, although the depth that won close matches in the past appears to be missing. Compensating for this weakness is the strength of the singles positions as four sound singles players return.

Laura Carson replaces last year's outstanding no. 1 Joninna Sadoff as team captain. Other returning singles players smashing it out with Carson for the top positions include junior Amy Demorest and 1976 wonderchildren Becky Chase and Trudie TenBroeke. Giving some depth to the club will be Sherry Willcox, Sally Kruse and Amy Sterling, all successful doubles specialists in the past. Coach Tong also figures to use several freshwomen among those players rounding out the squad.

Williams' schedule is always one of the toughest in New England. Perennially strong Yale, the only team to defeat the Ephs in the past three years, heads this season's list of opponents. The racketwomen also expect tough encounters with Trinity, Springfield, Tufts, Middlebury and Dartmouth.

Tufts gets the first shot of those lining up for Williams in the important opener tomorrow in Boston when the Eph's Sisterhood of Shotmakers will be looking to make a few shots of their own.

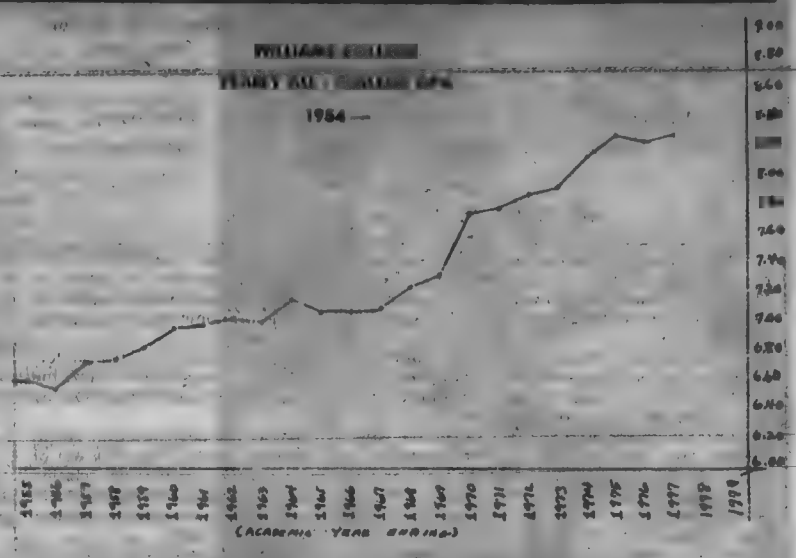
The Williams Record

VOL. 91, NO. 5 WILLIAMS COLLEGE SEPTEMBER 20, 1977

Averages rise after year's respite

The average grade-point average at Williams resumed its upward climb in the 1976-77 academic year, according to David Booth, Associate Provost. After a slight drop from 8.28 two years ago, the average GPA rose last year from 8.23 to 8.29, an all time high.



With the exception of the 1975-76 year, the college GPA has risen steadily every year since 1964-65. Since 1953, the average GPA has moved from 6.60 to 8.29, for an average annual increase of .073 points.

According to the figures Booth has compiled, only 14.7 per cent of the grades given out at the College are below B-. 31.7 per cent of all students received grades of A- or higher, while only 2.2 per cent received grades of D+ and below, Booth added. "C's, D's, and E's are a rare thing at this school," he said, "and when a student gets one, he considers it a real slap in the face."

Booth suggested that the reliability of grading should be questioned when there are so few grades below B-. Booth said he thought that the failure to use the lower end of the grade scale was disadvantaging students. Because C's are not used very often, there is a wide range of performance present in the B- range. "My concern is not so much the rising grade-point average, but that we're not making the distinction that may be there," said Booth.

According to Booth, "very little has been done about the grade rise." One of the problems that Booth noted is that the College doesn't have a standard policy concerning the function of grades. Furthermore, he observed that many of the faculty members are simply unaware of the average grade that they give out.

Booth felt that grade reform is inevitable, and that "when the change comes, it will be toward tougher grading."

Architect Moore presents preliminaries

Architect Charles W. Moore presented three preliminary design schemes, developed by his firm this summer to meet the needs for expansion in the College's physical education and art facilities. Moore and two other members of the firm of Moore, Grover and Harper spoke with students, faculty and administrators in a day-long series of consultations, Thursday.

Moore, Grover and Harper, an architecture firm which operates out of Essex, Connecticut, received the contract for the expansion project last spring. Parallel committees in the art and physical education departments, each with student, faculty and administrative representation, developed programs for the respective space and functional needs of the departments. The committees proposed lists of architects to be considered for the job and conducted 9 interviews before recommending that the College select Moore.

Moore, Grover and Harper began their study of the art and physical education projects by examining existing spaces in the Lasell Gymnasium and Lawrence Hall, Moore said. The firm then developed a variety of schemes, "each of which," Moore explained, "disclosed new problems which had to be worked out in subsequent plans."

Moore alluded to many of the problems he and his co-workers encountered, the most challenging of which is the site itself, he claimed. If expansions to the two departments are to be contiguous to existing facilities, the new structures will have to be located in a small area bounded by the squash courts, the hockey rink and, at a higher elevation, Lawrence and Goodrich Halls. The site is complicated both in terms of its size and its irregular and, in places, very steep terrain.

The architects expressed concern for preserving what they called "the "architectural beauty" of Lawrence Hall. "I don't want to nudge a new building right up next to it," Moore said, adding that he preferred to "keep some openness between the new and old structures."

Moore also said he was concerned about constructing a huge gymnasium complex in what would be the backyard of many Spring Street shops. His preliminary schemes allow space for some commercial stores in the ground floor of gym expansion behind Spring Street.

Other proposals which appeared in the initial plans include conversion of the second floor gym in Lasell for studio use by the art department. Much of the art expansion would occur in the interface between Lawrence Hall and this upper gym, according to Moore's preliminary schemes. Construction in this location would require spanning a deep ravine which cuts between the existing buildings.

Moore and his associates will finalize plans pending input from the various college committees he addressed last week. "The ball is in our court now," Chairman of the Art Department Whitney S. Stoddard said at the close of the meeting.

Stoddard also announced that the College will host an exhibition of Moore's work in November which may include some designs relating to the Williams project.

Will try urban recruiting

Smith courts blacks

The Committee on Black Students at Williams discussed the College's efforts to attract qualified black students with Admissions Director Philip Smith at the committee's first meeting of the year Thursday.

Smith said he described his plans to target six eastern cities (Boston, Washington, New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland and Chicago) for special attention, involve black alumni and undergraduates in the College's recruiting effort, and to "enhance" visits by prospective black applicants.

Dean of the College Peter Berek commented that the committee and Smith were "in substantial agreement" concerning the difficulty of continuing to attract black students and the need to work even harder "to keep on the course we have charted."

Smith described the deterioration of some inner-city schools as a factor in this increased difficulty. "In all conscience, we can't admit students who are not academically prepared for Williams," he explained. "Some secondary schools simply do not give their students an education," Smith added.

Berek also suggested that social and economic diversity among black students and among Williams students in general was hindered by the College's ability to offer financial aid to only thirty per cent of all students admitted.

Williams, like other isolated rural colleges, faces a growing problem in attracting minority students from cities, according to Smith. "Black students from cities just don't come to colleges like Williams in adequate numbers," he added. In addition, Williams has felt the effect of a nationwide contraction of the black applicant pool in recent years, said Smith.

Berek and Smith both emphasized that Williams was quite successful compared to other small colleges in the area. Williams admitted 42 black students to the Class of 1980 and 33 to the Class of 1981, while one college of comparable size admitted only 7 black students to its Class of 1980. Smith attributed the drop in students admitted by Williams to the twenty per cent smaller minority applicant pool last year.

The committee expressed concern over the College's tendency to admit mostly upper- and middle-class minority students, said Berek, adding that the College would work harder to recruit qualified applicants from cities instead of relying primarily on those from suburbs as had been done in the past.

Smith described the newly-instituted visiting program which sends black undergraduates and alumni to target areas to help recruit minority applicants. This program is aimed primarily at areas close enough for "significant follow-through" by the Admissions Office. The visitors will give "an honest exposition of the advantages of attending Williams," said Smith. "The opportunity here is, after all, primarily an academic one."

The College will attempt to make visits to Williams by prospective black applicants more useful, Smith said. Last year Williams sponsored a weekend for black students in February of last year and a similar program is planned for this year, said Smith.

College hosts donors

Preston S. Parish '41, national chairman of the Capital Fund, addressed some 160 of the major donors to the Capital Fund of the 1970s, reporting on how the proceeds from the funding campaign will be used.

Parish told his audience that the College plans to use proceeds from the Capital Fund to finance three building projects.

The College invited the major contributors to attend a weekend program at the College to "express sincere gratitude" to the donors, according to Director of Development Willard Dickerson. He termed the event a success. "They were probably all glad that they came, and I think they are very proud of the College," he added.

According to Dickerson, enough funds have already been contributed to the Capital Fund to finance construction of the proposed music addition to Chapin Hall, at a cost of $2.1 million, although funds for furnishing and maintaining the building must still be raised.

The Capital Fund will cover the costs of constructing new additions to Lawrence Hall and the Lasell Gymnasium, as well as financing smaller projects such as the planned renovation of Garfield House.

Another portion of the Capital Fund will serve to further the College's educational endowment. $2.4 million will go towards the establishment of new professorships, and another $800,000 will finance leaves by assistant professors. $3.4 million will serve to create 48 more named

Kelly's committee clutches funds

Financiers allocate the first of the Student Activity Tax

After some careless financial management by organizations in the past two years, the Finance Committee plans to monitor more closely the use of College Council Funds by student organizations, Finance Committee Chairman Harry Kelly '78 told a Record press conference Thursday.

With resources of over $108,000 from the $56 Student Activities Tax the committee will devote about eighty hours of the next six weeks to determining policy for fund allocations and to making recommendations for specific appropriations.

This year the Finance Committee will keep all student funds in the College business office, and it will require periodic audits from all organizations which have received funds. Kelly said the primary reason for moving all SAT funds to the business office was security. He insisted that this policy has always been in the council's rules but was neglected in recent years. "The policy goes through a cyclic reaffirmation," he explained.

College Council President Tom Herwitz '78, cited two publications whose funding he feels should be changed—the Record and the Gulielmensian, but said he will work for no other specific allocation changes.

Kelly added that this year's committee promised "to make decisions while we can still put into effect funding procedures." In recent years committee decisions have often come too late in the budgetary year for implementation.

Vote to pay the Pipers

The Finance Committee voted Sunday to recommend a $500 allocation to the Williams Pipe Band and $850 for the Newman Association.

According to Finance Committee Chairman Harry Kelly, '78, the Pipe Band will receive $300 for general expenses and an additional $200 for the purchase of new equipment unless funds for that purpose are presented by another source.

The Finance Committee will continue budget hearings next week, considering the proposals of athletic groups, according to Kelly. "All proposals are due Wednesday," he said, "and if we can correlate them, we will deal with the submissions of each department or division separately." Kelly intends to post an agenda for the upcoming meeting in Baxter Hall each Friday. He said he hopes that the advance information will encourage student participation in the hearings and in the budgeting process.

Letter: Black students chastised

To the editor:

At one time minority groups held promise of being an anti-capitalist force in the U.S. What little of that promise did exist at Williams has obviously dried up.

The black members of the Committee on Black Students at Williams seem to be satisfied with their subservient conformism (an attitude shared by most students). Instead of opposing a discriminatory institution like Williams College, the minority group of black students has eagerly contributed in perpetuating both a private enterprise ensuring several administrators and academics privileged lives in the Berkshires and the educational system of a society which ultimately cannot afford to mentally liberate its members. The Committee report tries to measure the progress achieved thus far in Williams College's attempt to establish a microcosmic representation of American class society while at the same time promoting the development of harmonious relations between the antagonists. In pursuing this impossible goal, hypocrisy and myth rule. Hypocritical is the goal of striving to compose the black student population at Williams in such a way as to make it reflect the diversity of the black community in the U.S. while simultaneously expecting the socially deprived and economically exploited to be "academically qualified." Mythical is the Committee's way of generally presenting a social conflict of American capitalism as one of color.

As long as blacks, as well as other minority groups, fail to perceive themselves as being typically the reserve army in the American form of the capitalist mode of production, the once promising Black Student Union will continue to be nothing more than "a supportive academic resource" for the management of Williams College.

Letters: freshman foibles

To the editor:

I'd like to make some corrections on the freshman issue and the first regular issue.

1. Appropriately enough, there are 481 in the Class of '81. Four hundred and eighty are new admits, one is a returnee, formerly of the Class of '80.

2. Faculty Advisers are not assigned according to the freshman's academic interest, advantageous as that might be, because most FAs are selected by the Junior Advisers to serve an entry and we would not want to have history or chemistry entries—or what have you.

3. Although I'm sure your comment about JA intelligence is not seriously intended, it seems an unnecessary comment. In fact, JAs year in and year out maintain a higher grade point than the College average.

4. Whether '84 or 84 were involved, WOOLF did not replace Freshman Days for any freshman. Fourteen freshmen were hiking during some of the departmental open houses, Mr. Stoddard's lecture, and the Casino-Dance. They returned to see their Faculty Advisers and attend the Outing Club Picnic, Wednesday.

Garland Jeffreys
Ghost Writer A&M SP-4629

Cheap Trick
In Color Epic PE 34884

Garland Jeffreys achieved modest notoriety in 1973 with "Wild In The Streets", a minor underground hit at the time. Re-released on his debut album, Ghost Writer, "Wild In The Streets" features leery affectation a la Jagger and simple, tough lyrics in the mode of Springsteen ("Mrs. America - Tell me how is your favorite son - Do you really care - What he has done"). The song is catchy, assertive, and well worth many a listen.

Elsewhere Jeffreys splits time between middle-of-the-road rock'n roll and popular pastiche. "Rough And Ready" gives us traditional dreams of stardom ("I'm burstin' at the seams - Livin' out my wildest dreams") backed by the adequate, and nothing more, electric guitar work of Alan Freedman. "Cool Down Boy", another controlled, inoffensive electric guitar song, has Jeffreys in parts sounding like Jackson Browne.

And Jeffreys sounds like other familiar voices. "35 Milimeter Dreams", despite its by now hackneyed catalogue of old movie stars motif (see The Kinks' "Celluloid Heroes" for the definitive example of this genre), is not unlike Dylan in tone. More melodic is "I May Not Be Your Kind", and here the Bozz Scaggs influence is unmistakable. The song also contains Jeffreys' best couplet on the album:

Show me baby everything you got
Then I'll show you darlin' everything I'm not

The variety continues. The title track, "Ghost Writer" echoes the soft smoothness of Van Morrison. "New York Skyline" is sultry late evening night-club music complete with sax solo. "Why-O" provides calypso social commentary (rather oxymoronic and definitely hard to take with pathos). "Spanish Town" spins an earthy slice-of-life with Jeffreys turning on a Spanish accent, plucking away nicely on acoustic guitar, and voicing plain-spoken defiance, again in the Springsteen-Dylan mode:

I'm gonna eat my rice and beans
I'm gonna suck on a chili dog.

All things considered, Ghost Writer is a solid half-rock, half-folk album. "Wild In The Street" is exceptional, the rest is average (which is not to say poor). Jeffreys in short is not without talent, but here on first album he seems to be trying too hard to prove his versatility. What he needs to do is concentrate more on developing a more distinct style of his own both musically and with respect to his lyrics.

Meanwhile back in the mainstream of late sixties rock'n roll is Cheap Trick, whose second album, In Color, is every bit as good, if not better than, their first of their name-sake.

Cheap Trick has received a lot of rave attention of late, and with good reason. This group plays raucous but magnificently melodic music reminiscent of the hard, crisp style evolved by The Beatles in Abbey Road and portions of "The White Album". In additon, their stage presence is marvelously whimsical. Lead singer Robin Zander and bassist Tom Peterson are straight from "The Barbezan School of Rock Stud-dom" with their long-flowing "faggy shags" and waif-like lathiness. Drummer "Bun" E. Carlos and lead guitarist Rick Nielson though are a different breed of cat altogether. Bun resembles an Al Capone "hitman", Nielson a "pre-Happy Days" school dunce.

But on to the glorious music! Rock 'n roll has seldom sounded so fresh, so joyous, so unfettered in recent years. There is no post-Bowie decadence here, no punk pugilence, no sophisticated pretence. Instead, what we have is ten tight rockers with superbly subtle guitar playing by Nielson. "Hello There", as Dave Marsh of Rolling Stone aptly describes it, captures the mania of The Beatles' "Birthday". "Southern Girls" is a wonderful parody of California pinin'. "Oh Caroline" and "So Good To See You" are powerful but extremely sweet sounding; "I Want You To Want Me" the lighthearted insincere sinerity that made sixties AM music palatable, if not "tasty"; "Clock Strikes Ten" and "Come On, Come On" infectious, irresistible "Saturday night" songs with which to dance the night away.

Cheap Trick in other words knows what has made rock 'n roll great in the past, and they put this knowledge to good use. They improvise, not innovate. The songs are clean, clear, and concise. Solos are at a minimum. The chorus and lead guitar take prominence. The lyrics are of course invariably about girls, but display wit, coyness, and moments of healthy skepticism ("Some people say the weekend is the only world - It's such a strange strain on you").

All in all, nothing is new here, but everything is done with such lushness, ease, and smoothness that almost every song catches a rock 'n rollers fancy after one or two listens and excites it again and again (I haven't played an album so many times with so much relish in a 'ell of a long time, Mate).

At its worst, then, Cheap Trick is excellent derivation. At its best, they have produced the catchiest straight rock album of '77. "Rock'n roll is want I'm born to be," says Patti Smith. Cheap Trick has no birth pains either.

Capital funders return

scholarships, and will also contribute to the general scholarship fund.

As of Friday, Sept. 16, the Capital Fund campaign reached a total of $31 million. According to Dickerson, the College had anticipated reaching the $40 million mark by this date. He blamed "economic recession" for the financial shortcoming, but added, "We've done pretty well considering the state of the economy in recent years." Dickerson pointed out that total gifts and grants ending with the fiscal year 1977 represented the largest total in College's history.

Several contributions in the $1 million range have assisted the Capital Fund toward its goal. One of the largest grants was one of $1.7 million from the estate of the late Schuyler Cole '24. Another $1.5 million bequest came from the estate of the late Captain Belvidere Brooks '10 for whom Brooks House is named.

In addition to the $31 million immediately available, there remains some $3.5 million given in the form of charitable remainder trusts and pooled funds that will gradually be turned over to the College.

According to Dickerson, the College has already received $23 million of the total funds pledged to date.

Grants broaden curriculum

The Andrew W. Mellon Foundation has awarded a $250,000 grant to Williams College to "encourage the diversification of faculty interests and the development of new capabilities and skills." The grant has been made as part of a continuing Mellon Foundation program for faculty development and is to be spent over a five-year period.

One of the major aims of the grant will be to help faculty members prepare to offer courses outside their disciplines or disciplinary sub-specialties. Under no-growth or "steady-state" conditions individual departments can expect to be asking more of their members to offer such courses, and the growth of interdepartmental programs has already begun to impose similar demands upon the energy and versatility of the faculty as a whole. As a result many more faculty are being called upon to teach courses that require them to master professional knowledge and skills outside the subject areas in which they had specialized at graduate school.

To encourage faculty members teaching in interdepartmental programs to broaden their interests and skills, Williams will utilize the Mellon grant to fund leaves for assistant professors, to allow limited release time from normal teaching duties for faculty of all ranks seeking to develop new areas of teaching competence beyond their disciplinary specialties, and to sponsor faculty conferences and seminars of an interdisciplinary nature.

Timberline rocks Chapin

by Michael Healy

It was already 9:30 on Friday night and Chapin Hall was still more than half empty: another typical Williams concert. But by 8:45, something new was happening—the hall was filling, and when Steve Case, of the ACEC, said Timberline was coming out in ten minutes, the crowd started to clap rhythmically. Fast Annie, the group which was to appear along with Timberline, never arrived.

Meshes mellow with loud

When Timberline finally came out on stage and played, "Turn it Up," it was evident that they were much more reminiscent to this reviewer of Dan Fogelberg than anyone else (i.e. the Eagles). Initially, they played some original, sort of mellow, tunes. The concert only started to move when in the middle of "Love the One You're With," the group realized that the crowd wanted to stand up and clap—"go crazy."

The long concert continued in this way: soft original tunes during which the crowd would sit back and wait, then louder, more recognizable songs which would turn loose the energy of the crowd. Only a cynic wouldn't have enjoyed it, but only a deaf man could have overlooked the weaknesses.

Timberline's original tunes show a decidedly John Denver side which is evident more in the lyrics than the music. A sample of the lyrics shows such lofty insights as "Every time she changes you know she's beautiful . . . she's beautiful," or "When I think of you I think of sunshine . . . Thinking of you's gonna get me through the day."

Ignorance

Timberline's greatest strength in the Chapin concert was an ability to move easily from one type of music to another. That versatility also proved to be their greatest weakness, it underscored their inability to sustain energy or subtlety in any one particular style. One has to wonder how sincere a group is if they change from a song dealing with a "natural high" in Colorado to a song called "Travellin' Blues" drawn from a more earthy, gritty type of experience. Timberline showed an ignorance of the roots of the different types of music they played. For example, one song introduced as a "Colorado shit-kickin' music," turned out to be the Eagles' "Midnight Flyer," a Los Angeles country rock tune.

Through the first half of the show, one could think critically, but mostly—sit back and enjoy the music. By the evening's end, standing and clapping and having a good time seemed most important, and that's what music is all about.

Hill delights the crowd

by Kevin Hall

Professor Victor Hill of the mathematics department launched this year's series of Griffin Hall Concerts last Saturday and Sunday with a recital of harpsichord music by Johann Sebastian Bach and Jean-Philippe Rameau. Saturday evening a full house responded enthusiastically both to his masterly interpretations and to the informal atmosphere which he created by presenting his program in a small hall and at a leisurely pace, pausing to explain any aspects of the music which might not have been familiar to his audience.

The first half of the program was devoted to the first eight preludes and fugues of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier. The twenty-four preludes and fugues which constitute each book of The Well-Tempered Clavier are Bach's magnum opus for the keyboard, and they display what is probably the most skillful polyphonic writing ever conceived.

The second half of the program began with the first performance in this area of the recently discovered Fourteen Canons of Bach. The canons were based on the first eight bass notes of the same aria on which the famous Goldberg Variations were structured. Hill himself arranged the canons for two harpsichords, and he was assisted on the second harpsichord by Polly Mattson. The two preceded their performance by an interesting and amusing demonstration of canon and its applications using the tune of Three Blind Mice. The program concluded with Hill alone, playing Rameau's seven-movement Suite in A Minor, the last movement of which is a gavotte with variations that Hill termed the harpsichordist's "gavotte of gavottes."

Williams hosts dancers

Troupe excites audience

The Meredith Monk/The House residency included a master class workshop, a solo vocal concert, and two performances entitled, "Paris/Venice" which are reviewed below.

by Julie Bertuzzi

A taste of life from Paris and Venice was brought to Williams College last Friday and Saturday nights by the Meredith Monk - The House dance-theater company. The two pieces "Paris-Venice" and "Venice," performed both nights, were inspired by travels to these cities and successfully recreated impressions of the people and their way of life. Meredith Monk and her company dealt with feelings and atmospheres in much the same way that artists use surrealism in painting: recognizable social phenomena were presented with an exaggerated twist against a fantastic background.

"Paris" was introduced by a 'puppet' who poked her head through red curtains and told the audience what city they were about to experience—thus, the show within the show began. The juxtaposition of the culture of Parisian high society and the folklore of Parisian immigrants was wonderfully done through the contrast of the 'concert pianist's' performance with the reactions of the immigrants to their wanderings in Paris. Meredith Monk and Ping Chong expressed these reactions through various complex characterizations which included communication with whispering sounds and a woman wearing a moustache. The frequent blackouts, used as transitions between sequences, sometimes detracted from the flow of impressions that included feelings of despair, loneliness, old age and religious strength but the sincerity and intense concentration with which Meredith Monk and Ping Chong performed kept the audience entranced if not, at least curious.

"Venice" was the more lively and flamboyant of the two pieces. It was rich in insights of Venetian culture which was shown through conventional symbols such as the lighted candle in front of a statue of a saint and the white-masked black figure of death. The use of contrast was especially successful in this piece such as the scene where a group of affluent frivolous socialites are jovially singing a song with the theme, "a man was made for the woman, and the woman for a man," while at the same time, a gondolier dies of a coughing fit. The humor scattered throughout the piece was particularly good when "the countess", a portly woman with gold slippers and billowy robes, pranced around the stage greeting the audience with a welcoming "Oh hello!" Another humorous part was the depiction of foreign visitors and their reactions to such novelties as salt, the telephone, and Italian food.

"Venice" did not merely mirror Venetian society (although many images seemed to come from funhouse mirrors), it also commented on it. For example, a card carrier held four different signs on which were written "liar, gossip, voyeur, and cheat" respectively, while an anonymous red-gloved hand emerging from a curtain, pointed to the guilty characters. The special effects also enriched this piece; a black dressed figure inspected fragments of past societies by pointing a flashlight at 'frozen' bodies scattered throughout the dark stage filled with mist from dry ice while at a different point, the characters were lost in a confused dark atmosphere with taped sounds from an airport and a flashing blue light traveling up and down the back of the stage.

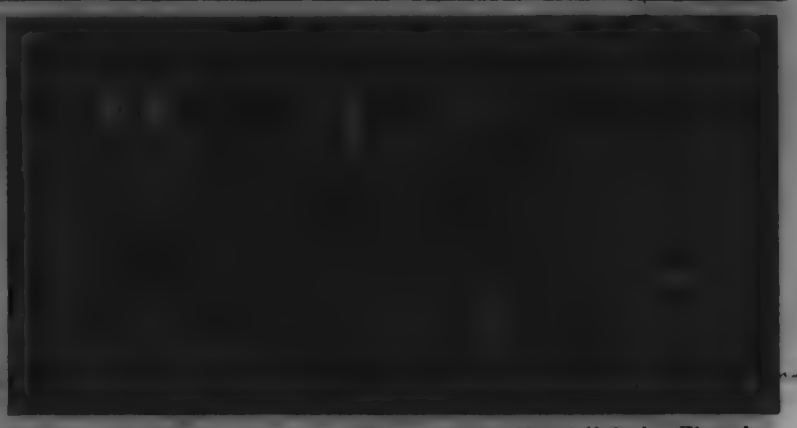
Williams hockey on top in tourney
Women's squad destroys Amherst

by Nancy Rhein

If preseason scrimmages are any indication of a team's readiness, then the women's field hockey team is ready to play following a spectacular showing at Amherst Saturday. The Ephwomen went to the round robin tourney with a group of talented veteran players and returned grand champs with an impressive 20-1 tally after four games.



The squad got off to a good start meeting Amherst's debuting varsity. The inexperienced hosts, unable to handle Sally Kraft and her equally aggressive forward line were easily shut-out 6-0. Early in the match, Williams' halfbacks set the stage for the afternoon's play moving the ball downfield to awaiting forwards. Rotating inners Monica Grady, Edie Thurber, and Val Corning, along with Kraft, perched nearby the Amherst goalkeeper and swooped in for five Kraft goals and one Corning tally.

Williams' defense saw its only action for the day in the second game as a strong Trinity offense scored on a screened Mimi Dumouchel. The defensive confusion of the first half was soon overcome as Dumouchel went on to save eight while Grady (2) and Kraft (1) put the Ephs ahead in the second half. Midfielders Leslie Milne, Dawn Bedrosian, Priscilla Buckley and Sue Wright kept control, without the help of Betsy Lyman who left the game after being struck with a stick in the head.

Following the successful morning, a slightly sluggish squad defeated Smith on two goals by Monica Grady. Wing Liza Olsen sent a beautiful centering pass to Grady who pounded it in for the fast break tally. Fullbacks Lee Ash and Cammie McClellan along with Kathy Spear looked great, touching the ball only four times in the match.

Meeting Tufts in the final game, the Ephs rallied from a 1-0 halftime score to win 2-1. A tired Tufts group was no match for the well-tuned line as wings Olsen and Anne McClelland set up Kraft for four and Thurber and Corning for two. Wellesley exchange Sue Wright demonstrated more super stickwork, stunning the Tufts goalie with a waist-high flick on a penalty shot.

With four decisive victories under its belt, the team again travels down the Mohawk Trail to Holyoke, Thursday, looking to avenge last year's 4-1 loss. Should Saturday's performance be any indication, the Ephwomen's first win over Holyoke is finally within reach.

Eph ready for Hamilton

Tri-captain Herb McCormick and Ken Hollingsworth have done little to disprove their rave pre-season reviews. With Massucco and Scott Harrington, the Ephs have four dependable receivers. Todd Eckerson appears to have won the tight end job, with veteran Kurt Anderson ready. Rookies Mike Curran and Jay Skerry continue to breathe down the necks of veterans Joe Maguire and Brian Fales, who cling to their jobs like the Yankees to first place. All four will see action Saturday.

Odell is still not ready to choose a single quarterback. Bill Whelan is a steady senior with good skills, while Greg Collins' foot speed and cannon arm are valuable as well. "It's still a tossup," quipped Odell, "we'll just have to see who grabs hold first—until then, they'll split time."

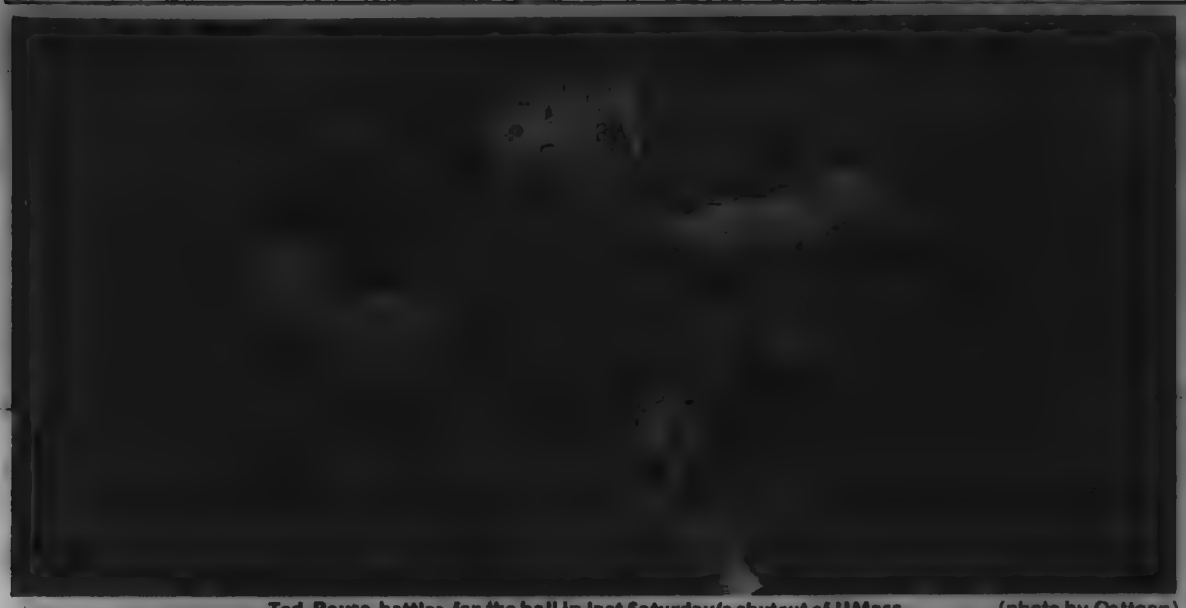
FirstCharge™... from First Agricultural

Nothing is harder to master than money management. Schools teach economic theory and parents pass on what they can. However, experience is the best teacher. That's one reason First Agricultural offers FirstCharge. Another is that FirstCharge allows young adults to establish a necessary bank reference and line of credit to help them in the future.

FirstCharge is a full-service credit card. It's good with hundreds of Berkshire merchants... the same ones that honor First Aggie Master Charge cards. The only difference is that FirstCharge is not valid outside the County. And remember, you receive 30 days interest free with FirstCharge and up to 90 days interest free on purchases over $100 with participating merchants.



In the event you don't have a full-time job, a co-signer may be required for your FirstCharge card. To get more information and your application for FirstCharge, just return the coupon. Kickers claim two shutouts

by Mark Pogue

Williams' varsity soccer team continued to run smoothly, recording shutouts of the R.P.I. Engineers (1-0) and the UMass Minutemen (2-0). Both games were played on Cole Field.

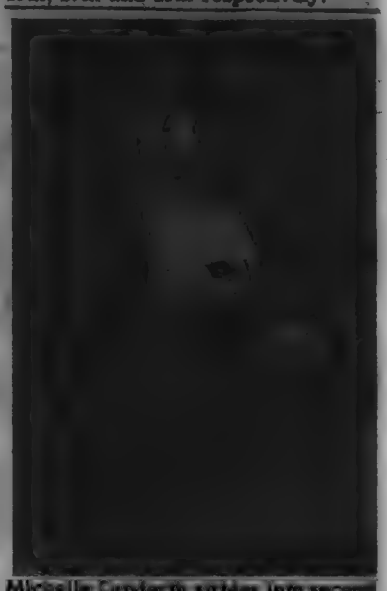
In Monday's R.P.I. game, centerforward John Friborg gave the Ephbooters a 1-0 lead midway through the first half when he broke away into the Engineer backfield and beat the goalie with a kick to the near post. A clever play by junior John Ballan, made the goal stand up for the remainder of the contest. When he saw an R.P.I. shot headed toward an unprotected part of the Purple net, Dallan committed an intentional hand ball to stop the goal and set up an R.P.I. penalty kick. When the appointed Engineer flubbed from the charity stripe the Ephs kept their lead and took the game.

Beaten to the ball and doing far too much individual dribbling, Williams looked ragged in the first half of the UMass game and were fortunate to take a 0-0 halftime tie into the outdoor locker room. Highly-touted UMass frosh Ion Bogdaneris, and Tommy Krutsoukos, teammates on the 1976 Quebec Select Eleven team, applied heavy pressure on goalie Jay Loeffler.

Williams came off the second half whistle passing short and used its superior speed to gain control of the action. With 22 minutes remaining in the half, Teddy Rouse collected a cross from fellow co-captain Henry Osborne and rammed it into the Minutemen goal. Thirty seconds later it was 2-0 when Perry Nelson took another nice feed from Osborne and kicked it by frozen UMass keeper Preston Kise.

Eph cross country demolishes Engineers

by Frank Carr



Coach Tony Plansky's starting pistol sent the field dashing out of the Science Quad and, for the first mile at least, the lead group was an even mixture of purple and red shirts. By the end, though the Purple prevailed and beat RPI 21-38. R.P.I.'s Paul Hebert took the runners through a 4:56 first mile but then faded on the first ascent up varsity hill behind Joe Kolb and Frank Carr. Kolb took the lead and moved easily across the Taconic golf course.

Kolb and Carr opened up a comfortable lead on the return trip up Lovell Street and eased in the last half-mile, tying for first in 26:05. Sullivan and Schreck also crossed the finish line together for fifth place with a 26:43 clocking. Sophomore Garrick Leonard grabbed 7th place and beat in R.P.I.'s third man with a 27:04 effort.

Mike Behrman toured the soggy course in 27:41 for ninth place, followed by transfer student Bud Bell and senior Doug Greeff in 11th and 12th place respectively. R.P.I. then put a quintet of runners through the finish chute followed by Chuck Anderson (18th), Dave Breuer (20th), Peter Winn (21st) and Dan Riley [illegible].

The J.V. squad also opened the season with a victory, crushing R.P.I. 17-46. Freshman John McCammond was the individual winner in a fine time of 20:33 for the 3.8 mile course. Phil Darrow's powerful kick over the last 60 yards enabled him to hold off a red shirted opponent and pick up the runner-up stick eight seconds behind McCammond.

After one more Engineer managed to coast across the finish line, the Ephs purpled the Science Quad with a string of six runners in a 24 second span. Hans Giesecke, Cam Virrill, Pat Dobson, Cleve Thayer, Rusty Anderson and Mike Hill took 5th through 10th to put the victory safely in purple hands. Jon Miller ran 21:40 for 13th place and Ned Collins, Erik Oline and Bob Tyler received their first taste of college competition, finishing 19th, 27th and 29th respectively.

Purple gridders take Crimson 9-7

by Tim Layden

The potential was all there. Harvard Stadium, vine-covered walls, the ghost of Timothy Bottoms haunting the upper rows of the stands. Cambridge, Ryan O'Neal rolling in imaginary snowbanks along the sidewalks. And Williams College (who?) rolling in for a scrimmage.

The script, however, called for a slightly more businesslike atmosphere. The Ephs and Harvard's non-travelling squad varsity players were relegated to a practice field, and the messy matters of preparing for the 1977 season were to be attended to.

"We were much-improved over last time out," said Head Coach Bob Odell of the Purple's confidence-boosting 9-7 win over the Crimson. Playing primarily his first-line players for three quarters of the contest, Odell's troops operated much more smoothly than in a loss to New Haven last weekend and the team appears to be on schedule for their rendezvous with Hamilton Saturday in the season-opener.

The second Williams drive of the gloomy afternoon was initiated by junior tackle Mark Tercek's hip injury (apparently not serious), but quickly took a turn for the bright when soph Dave Massucco hauled in a Bill Whelan toss, a la Willie Mays, along the sideline.

Behind some fine blocking up front (Jack Spound and Ken Schoetz putting in their second straight good week), Williams marched to the Harvard five, where Whelan took over and scooted in off the right side. Ken Hollingsworth added the PAT.

Odell had hoped that Harvard would be able to throw a pair of talented quarterbacks at Williams, but Crimson sophomore Burke St. John threw a monkey wrench into things by making the travelling squad. High school whiz Brian Buckley never quite got going, and despite what seems like a fine arm, seems to be the victim of a once over-zealous Boston area press or his own ego.

The Eph secondary showed no mercy, however, and seem to be the backbone of what should be a tough defensive unit. Mark Eckert and Greg McAleenan continue to swarm the ball like a pack of wolves, while educating newcomers Mark Gerry and Long Ellis at the same time. Eckert and Gerry pilfered one pass each, with the former coming close on at least two others.

John Thiel and Phil Shuman worked well at the linebacker spots, with Shuman flying through a huge gap to sack Buckley for a third-quarter safety as the quarterback grounded a desperation toss to the five-yard stripe. Frosh Brian Benedict also made several fine hits in his one-quarter stint at linebacker.

"It's starting to come together," remarked Odell, "we've never been known to set the world on fire on offense early in the season." The Purple offense has been spotty; but when they've been good, they've been impressive.

Linksmen open against Yale

The golf team opens its season this afternoon against Yale on the Ephs' own Taconic Golf Club. Leading the team onto the fairways of battle will be co-captains Bill Upton and Doug Chumbley.

Sophomore Ed "Big" Bousa has nailed down the number one spot for the first match. His consistency and revamped leg movement should keep him near the top for the entire season. Junior Dan Katz, victimized by crippling knee surgery last spring, returns to the line-up this fall. Although he has not been hitting the ball up to his old standard, Katz has stayed near the top with nerves like a safe-cracker on the putting greens.

Fighting for the remaining spots will be junior John Goodrich, sophomores Chris Holm, Marcel Oudin and Bill Sprague, and freshman Chris Malone. Holm spent his first year on the team as a junior executive in a Coral Gables strip-mining company, but now seems ready to make a strong bid at cracking the top seven. Oudin and Malone while not blessed with the natural flowing power of Chumbley or Upton, will rely on shot-making ability and consistency to wear down the opposition.

Young Sprague, 1976 Exeter golf captain, seems to be making a comeback. The invisible swing of 1975 seems to have regained some of its old tempo and Sprague could be a force to be reckoned with in the future. Lastly, fine Canadian amateur player John Goodrich has the potential to be one of the best players on the team. Goodrich tied for second in the opening qualifying, and if he continues to practice, there is no telling what he can do.

CC changes ACEC concert bid procedure

Reversing a decision made last spring by the All-College Entertainment Committee restructuring committee, the College Council voted to abolish a requirement that the ACEC consult the council before submitting a bid to obtain a concert performer.

ACEC Chairman Steve Case '80 proposed the change "in order to make concert bookings easier." He pointed out that booking agents often require bids at a short notice, so that conferring with the council before each bid "would become a hassle." Council members accepted the proposal with an amendment from Jim Parsons '78 that requires the ACEC to meet with the council before actually signing a contract.

Case has already submitted bids for a concert performance on Oct. 21, but he declined to reveal the names of the performers under consideration. The ACEC has tentatively scheduled two other concerts on November 11 and December 7.

Council President Tom Herwitz initially opposed Case's proposal, saying, "I don't think that it's too unreasonable that the council somehow be notified before the ACEC submits a bid." After the vote he expressed regrets concerning the council's decision. "I'm disappointed when the council reverses itself on past decisions, especially without really giving them a chance to work," he said.

Herwitz also reported on the progress of the Student Power Committee formed last spring to investigate student roles in college decision-making processes. Steve Rothstein '78 and Greg Weber '79 are currently reorganizing the committee, which held only one meeting last year. In addition, Gargoyle is now investigating student roles within the power structures of various academic departments, and will report on its findings soon.

Several council members questioned the effectiveness of the Student Power Committee, including Don McCauley '78, who charged that a "glut of committees will only increase student apathy." Herwitz concluded: "the thing needed most to encourage interest in this project is the leadership of the council."

College Council President Tom Herwitz announced that the deadline for self-nominations for council committees will be Sept. 30 at 4 p.m. The council is also accepting self-nominations to the Committee on Undergraduate Life and Committee on Educational Policy parallel committees, and will elect representatives to those committees during its next few meetings.

$2 million in renovations?

Regulations will benefit handicapped

by Jeff Kovar

New federal regulations designed to implement the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 which went into effect this summer could have serious consequences for the College. The regulations require that every building on campus be made accessible to handicapped persons within three years of June 1, 1977.

If interpreted literally, these regulations could force the College to spend $2 million on renovations or lose all federal funds.

The Physical Facilities Committee, chaired by College Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III '41, will address this legislation as its first order of business in its opening meeting of the academic year, next week.

The new legislation poses numerous questions for very little is known about it. The legislation can be read at its maximum effect (putting a tremendous financial burden on the College), or on a very practical level (such as the existing Massachusetts laws on this topic).

The College is still waiting for the Federal government to spell out the precise regulations, so they can know exactly where the College stands and how to begin compliance.

It is still to early to predict what might occur, Dewey said. Though there is some confusion over the precise meaning of the legislation, Dewey expressed confidence that things will begin to get underway and start making sense when the committee convenes next week.

Peter Welanetz, Director of the Physical Plant, reports that Buildings and Grounds is presently working on an "intense . . . inventory" of all existing College structures. This inventory will classify the buildings as to their present status of compliance with federal and state laws. The inventory will then serve as a starting point for Dewey and his committee.

The Massachusetts laws pertaining to the handicapped are less stringent than the federal ones. Massachusetts requires, for example, that if remodeling of a building to ensure access by handicapped persons would cost more than 50 per cent of its worth then that building would not have to comply with the regulations.

The Commonwealth also implies that access by handicapped persons to only the ground floor of a dormitory constitutes compliance with the law. The federal legislation, however, states in effect that if a handicapped person wanted to live on the fourth floor of West College, access would have to be provided him by means of an elevator.

The College hopes that full com-

Student conservation booklet gives tips on recycling

The Committee on the Campus Environment published a booklet this summer dealing with conservation as it applies to students and Berkshire County residents. The booklet outlines ways to cut down waste by combining common sense and recycling techniques.

The committee is a volunteer organization of students and faculty which studies environmental issues and acts as an advisory committee to the college administration. The group also oversees energy conservation and recycling programs at Williams and monitors the work-study students involved with them.

Conservation techniques for cans, bottles, papers, plastic, food, and energy are the major topics covered in the publication. Each section includes numerous tips about how to save energy and cut waste. Some suggestions include:

1) Use a butane lighter instead of matches since the lighter is clean and efficient while the matches often end up as litter.

2) Put a plastic-wrapped brick in toilet tanks to reduce the amount of water used in flushing.

3) Avoid aerosol sprays.

4) Stay away from overpackaged food since 40 per cent of solid waste is packaging.

The booklet also includes information about the extent of the resource problems facing the country. It says, for example, that U.S. per capita consumption of paper in 1969 was 5731 pounds—the equivalent of 63 cords of wood. It also says a 36-inch stack of old New York Times is equal to one natural tree.

The booklet admits a logical question might be why the booklet was published at all since it might well wind up as waste? The answer is that if the conservation tips are followed a lot more will be saved than was used to pass on the information. And if you don't like it—recycle it.

Copies are available in the lobby of Jesup Hall or the Center for Environmental Studies.

The On Campus Environment Committee [OCEC] is an active volunteer organization performing several functions for the college community. In addition to researching and studying pertinent environmental issues, we act in an advisory capacity to the administration. We oversee the energy conservation programs and the recycling programs on campus.

River House offers decor, plain food

by Sally Mayberry

A fast-food joint, a large cafeteria, a Jewish deli, or a restaurant with belly dancers could have appeared on Water Street this fall. These plans were rejected, however, as a replica of an early American tavern became the setting for a new eating spot in town: the River House Restaurant.

Although Harry and Twanette Garvey and Bob and Sandy Kaufman were involved with developing Water Street, they never intended to run the restaurant that the Garveys were renovating. But after interviewing prospective lessees who "lacked both the sensitivity and the sensibility," Kaufman says, "to get what's needed for the town," the two families formed a partnership to run the restaurant themselves.

The families wanted a restaurant which would offer prices below the higher-priced restaurants in the area, yet whose quality would be comparable. They were looking for dishes that would be "fresh, not frozen, cooked to order, and with no fancy sauces," Kaufman says. "We were tired of eating at places where there was too much rich food, where we came away feeling like stuffed pigs." Kaufman felt that a restaurant specializing in dishes which were lightly seasoned and of high quality would fill a void in Williamstown dining.

Combining their ideas and the cooks' capabilities, the Kaufmans and the Garveys worked out a menu specializing in fresh fish, salads, and meat. Lunch (served from 11:30-2:00) offers soups, salads, sandwiches, quiches, and various specials with prices ranging from $.80 for a house salad to $4.25 for a shrimp salad plate. Dinner (served from 5:30-10:00) includes a variety of appetizers and entrees which range from spaghetti ($4.25) to filet mignon ($10.50).

A big fireplace, Pewter sconces, hurricane lamps, barn-board floors, fresh flowers, shuddered windows and antique furniture create a warm early New England atmosphere at the River House. A blackboard in the corner of the dining room advertizes the special of the day and a dessert table displays various pies and cakes which also change daily. The restaurant is small, seating only 35 people in its dining room and bar-lounge area.

"One of the most exciting aspects of running the restaurant has been watching Water Street develop," says Sandy Kaufman. "The appearances of the properties have greatly improved since the initiation of various projects in the area."

The opening of The Potter's Wheel in 1970 began the development of Water Street. The Kaufmans, along with several other people, began buying buildings to renovate. Kaufman says he hoped to "create a mood, to develop a '24-hour' street," compatible to both residences and businesses. The Garveys, hoping to develop their contracting-architectural designing business in the Williamstown area, began renovating the restaurant building in November 1976. It opened for business in June 1977.

A busy graduation weekend preceded a strong summer, during which the River House was patronized mainly by theater-oriented people. "The summer theatre festival adopted us," Kaufman says, "and we had a lot of tolerant friends."

The owners are pleased with the progress of the River House, but feel the changes they make need to be more consistent. "The mood, atmosphere, style, and food compare favorably with the restaurants in the area," Kaufman says, "but we won't be satisfied until we're the best restaurant around."

"Fleming" letters on Bild and Blacks evoke resentment

Rebuttal #1

To the editor:

Despite the broadside attack of Greg Fleming, Karla Johnsen, Lynn Steinberg and Michael Streitz against my article on Munich newspapers, I didn't bother replying at the time. In the case of angry letters such as theirs, it is usually pointless.

Since two of their letters have appeared in the Record in as many weeks, however, and there is a serious danger of their becoming a permanent fixture in it, I thought I'd better expose these people before anyone begins taking them too seriously. Expose is not a word I choose lightly either.

With regards to the Munich letter, Mr. Fleming et al, were as eager to denounce the Bild as they were to employ its tactics in denouncing me. Although there was no way any of them could know who wrote the article (my by-line was accidentally left off), this didn't stop them from describing my life style in Munich. I was the "Record journalist enjoying himself in fashionable Munich." Sounds pretty nice, huh? In fact, I spent three months there washing dishes, menial work for menial wages, living in a cramped crowded $30-a-month room in one of the poorer sections of the city. They then suggested that "perhaps" I "should" have condemned the Bild's political views. If by this they mean I "ought", I can only reply that the point I was trying to get across is that the Bild and its like are silly and I took it for granted that any political views they expressed would be likewise, and I didn't worry about them. To be honest, I never found an editorial page in any of them. Editorials have far too much connection with important events to be of interest to a scandal sheet editor, or so I believe. In any case, if by this "perhaps . . . should" construction, they meant that, if writing the article themselves, they "would" have attacked the Bild's politics, they are perfectly welcome to the next time they take up the subject.

What's unfortunate here is that Mr. Fleming et al. were on the verge of making a valid point, but it was drowned out by their chorus of polemics.

I wish I could say that much for their most recent assault. They begin by reproaching minority groups on campus for not being willing to do their revolutionary dirty work for them ("At one time minority groups held promise of being an anti-capitalist force . . . What little of that promise did exist at Williams has obviously dried up"), then start tossing around their pejoratives and Marxist vocabulary like frisbees on a Sunday afternoon. Williams is a "discriminatory institution", although we are handed this verdict without so much as an indictment, much less a trial. Maybe Williams is discriminatory, but I think it is asking too much that we should take it for granted.

Next, the divine logos tells us that we live in "a society which ultimately cannot afford to mentally liberate its members." I am not sure what "liberated" means here, but as far as I can make out, it means thinking like the authors. If so, the state of my liberation is pretty obvious, and I don't feel the need to apologize for it either.

Moving right along, the authors warn that the College is mistaken in "expecting the socially deprived and economically exploited to be 'academically qualified.' " Regular readers of the Record may recall that it was a similar statement which caused charges of racism to rain down on Andy O'Donnell last year. To this I would add that I think it is just as humanitarian for the College to refrain from encouraging students to come here who will be ambushed by the workload as it is for it to make special efforts to seek out "disadvantaged" students who would truly benefit from this school.

Finally, Mr. Fleming and his friends conclude by reproaching blacks for letting their student union become "nothing more than a supportive academic resource." Perhaps I am just naive, but it is not at all clear to me from this what the authors think the role of the Black Student Union should be. I will, however, hazard a guess. The proper role of the BSU should be to bring down "discriminatory," "hypocritical," "capitalist" Williams. As a white, I am offended by this reasoning. Were I black, I would be outraged

What kind of idiots do these people think minority students are to believe that, after undergoing what I presume in many cases to be substantial financial hardship to come here, they should want to burn the place down? If there is going to be any "liberating" around here, it is going to result from students, disadvantaged or not, coming to learn and understand the problems of the poor and trading ideas on their solution. It won't come from the sloppy polemics and dogmatic ideological frauds of Mr. Fleming and his friends.

Mark Twain made the point best when he wrote: "Loyalty to petrified opinions never yet broke a chain or freed a human soul in this world—and never will!"

Peter Filkins

Rebuttal #2

To the editor:

Gregory Flemming et al.'s letter on the sell-out of black students at Williams shows that, while anti-capitalism may have dried up here, arrogance and asininity remain alive and well.

The writers denounce blacks for not "opposing a discriminatory institution like Williams." Armchair radicalism has seldom had more ardent champions than Mr. Fleming et al. I am reminded of Lewis Lapham's last column in Harper's Magazine, in which he tells of the Park Avenue millionaire who, while sampling the Chateau d'Yquem being poured by his French butler, deplored to his dinner guest the lack of revolutionary social turmoil in the country.

The rest of the letter is incomprehensible pseudo-Marxist gibberish. Perhaps a field trip to North Adams, Mass. (for their information, the next town over) or Wheeling, W. Va. might afford the authors respite from the dry rhetoric of political science lectures, and provide them with some insight into the very real social problems which exist in the United States. In the meantime, gratuitous sniping at black students, faculty and administration serves no constructive purpose.

Rebuttal #3

To the editor:

I'm addressing this letter to Gregory Fleming and company in reference to their letter to the editor concerning black students (Sept. 20).

I find your letter distressing. I read in it resentment and name calling, and find that these prevent you from seeing anything beyond a contest between two diametrically opposing sides. You condemn Williams College as being discriminatory, as serving to promote the privileged lives of "several administrators and academics," and as perpetuating a capitalist system that "cannot afford to mentally liberate its members." What exactly did you come to Williams for (surely you didn't think it wasn't a private enterprise)? This is not a rhetorical question. What are your goals and how do you want to pursue them? Incidentally, I am aware that you, the writers, are white.

You label as hypocritical the goal of establishing a diverse body of black students while "expecting the deprived and economically exploited to be 'academically qualified.' " What would you suggest? No academic standards? A different way of judging academic promise? Dropping the idea of establishing a diverse body of black students? A different set of criteria for admission altogether? Try sticking your neck out and dare to suggest something that can be done at Williams. I am not really interested in how you would change that great monolith called "society." Starting small is more of a challenge.

The most disturbing thing about your letter is that you talk about human beings as parts of a homogeneous group (such as "administrators" and "blacks") rather than as individuals. One way of promoting harmony among "groups" is to stop thinking of people as soldiers in armies engaged in war. Above all, I cherish the fact that I am an individual.

Absentee ballots

To the editor:

As most of us know (and the Freshmen will soon come to realize), being nestled in the tranquil, pastoral world of the Berkshires has many benefits—as well as several drawbacks. One unfortunate thing that seems to happen to many of us here is that we begin to lose touch with reality. National or home-state news unfortunately must take a back seat to Chaucer or Plato. This is not to denigrate studying, but we become so immersed in books that we unconsciously neglect things that we are obligated to do.

It is with this in mind that I would like to address myself sepecifically to the New Jersey and Virginia residents on campus. Your states are the only two in the nation with gubernatorial elections this year. Let this serve as a reminder: register to vote if you already have not and obtain an absentee ballot application! Take a minute or two and request either form (or both) from your county clerk back home. A simple postcard request will do. It is imperative that this be done NOW or, due to time limitations, you may forfeit your privilege to vote in this election.

Many people fought a long, uphill battle for the 18 year old vote—take advantage of it. Exercise your right. VOTE!

NEWS BRIEFS

14 programs use campus for summer

Twenty-eight hundred people participated in fourteen programs at Williams over the summer. Associate Provost David Booth said the visitors made seasonal layoffs unnecessary and helped cover building maintenance costs.

According to security director Walter O'Brien, the campus was "busy" but that the families were orderly, causing no problems.

Groups ranged from a tennis camp to "Foundations of Swedish weaving" to "The American Studies for Executives" program.

CEP studies division requirement

The Committee on Educational Policy is studying the patterns in which students pick their courses to determine the need for a "General Education" program. The problem area includes how wide a course distribution a liberal arts education requires, and how best to insure that students take this mixture. Committee members will sift through myriad statistics to see if there is a problem and then deal with questions of free election versus increased division requirements to achieve the goal.

Geologist speaks on Adirondacks

Dr. Ingvar W. Isachsen of the New York State Geological Survey will lecture on the "Geology of the Adirondacks" at 4 p.m. on Tuesday, Sept. 27 in Room 105 of Clark Hall (geology building). A second lecture, also on Tuesday, Sept. 27, will focus on recent small but measurable vertical movements in the terrain of the Adirondacks and will be at 8 p.m. in Bronfman auditorium. The movements are unusual since they have been measured in the geologically short time, about a century, since railroads have been in the region.

Since joining the New York State Geological Survey in 1958, Isachsen has studied the petrology, structure, and economic geology of the Adirondack region. He is a member of the U.S. Geological Survey and is adjunct professor of geology at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute and the State University at Albany.

How the Baxter food saga began

by David Sorkin

Recent allegations by Amnesty International that gastronomic conditions in Baxter Hall constitute a fundamental violation of the human rights of freshmen have drawn an outraged response from many of the partisans of that distinguished edifice.

A spirited defense is now building which emphasizes the rich and varied history of Baxter, a history well deserving of a hearing in print.

Few people at Williams can still remember the dark days before Baxter was built. At that time freshmen, in accordance with the teachings of Thoreau, were forced to fend for themselves, living on wild berries and Spring Street's famous pizza (most chose the berries). After many years, this practice of starving the freshman class was finally exposed by missionaries who penetrated the snows of western Massachusetts and reached Williamstown at the middle of the nineteenth century.

Years of tireless work for college supplied meals finally paid off when the administration conceded its error and adopted the missionary position. Construction of Baxter soon began. Original plans to model it on the Parthenon had to be dropped when no one could remember what the Athenian temple looked like. The classics department was unavailable for comment. The College and the architects finally agreed upon Rouen Cathedral as the ideal model, and the building was erected in 20 minutes.

The opening of Baxter was singularly inauspicious. Hundreds of famished freshmen milled around for hours unaware that an oversight had placed the dining rooms on the second floor. Life soon settled down, however, and meals ran especially smoothly when students agreed to line up rather than to rush at the food in mob fashion.

The food in those early days was at best predictable, consisting mainly of bread, with an occasional corn muffin or bagel. The reforms of the legendary Mark Hopkins, however, had already commenced. From the end of his log, Hopkins had overseen such innovations as plates, forks, and the brilliant, but still misunderstood, salad bars.

The golden days of Baxter now began. Great men came from around the world to eat there. Marx developed many of his most controversial theories over cottage cheese, once remarking to James Garfield, "Coca Cola is the opium of the people."

The 1920's were just as gay. Hemingway hunted antelope in the reserve dining room, but accidentally bagged Gertrude Stein instead, precipitating a ban on elephant guns. During these years the snack bar was opened as a speakeasy with one of the country's best floor shows. Al Capone was a regular customer until he was refused service for not having taken a number. The 1930's brought changes as students rose up to the adversity of depression. President Roosevelt, in one of his famous table-side chats, remarked, "The only thing we have to fear is the food itself." The fight against fascism was joined here too. Refugee scientists from Germany invented the push-button milk machine and developed a system for using recycled paper in mashed potatoes.

All this magnificence, though, has not won universal acclaim for Baxter. Complaints still ring in the hallowed hall, and students still describe the meals in the words of a Williams graduate of 1586, who wrote:

To eat, or not to eat: that is the question.
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The slings and arrows of outrageous portions,
Or to take arms against a plate of troubles,
And by opposing end them? To die: to eat;
No more; and, by a fast to say we end
The heartburn and the thousand natural shocks
That freshmen swear at, 'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wish'd.

All locked in, all locked out, locked. . .

by John Rindlaub

"Hello," she says. "Would you mind helping me unlock my room?"

"Not at all," I answer in the affected tone of an experienced junior.

"Oh, you're a junior? You know, you're getting old," she says earnestly.

I never thought that at 20 I was over the hill and yet she's right. Already the campus seems so comfortably familiar I think I've never been away at all. Yet good friends are everywhere but where I want them to be—abroad, at other schools, picking apples, pumping oil. Still, my dorm is home and I call it that. I love the warmth of a dozen familiar faces and the novelty and excitement of forty new ones. Junior year has taken its toll, but its off to a great start until . . .

Friday morning, 8:30. It is hot and rainy. I'm out of bed in a flash to open a window, but it's jammed, locked tight. Sweating madly, I run for the shower, then lock my door and head for breakfast.

"Your I.D. please," she says.

"Sorry, I left it . . ." I'm forced to return to the room through the rain. "Damn," I shout, and kick myself. I've left the keys behind the locked door. By the time Security comes and I find my I.D., breakfast is over and I'm late for my 9 o'clock class.

10:30, at Baxter Hall. I work my way through the crowds to my mail box. I've forgotten my combination, and scramble frantically in my wallet for the little pink slip of paper that has the numbers. When I find it, it's so worn from countless trips through the washing-machine that I can't make anything out. I desperately grab the knob of the box, hoping I'll remember the numbers out of habit. Praying that some supernatural force will guide my fingers, I lessen my grip. I ask for help from behind the high wall of boxes, and when I finally open mine, I get a little scrap that says "You can't come to our O.D.A. party without boxer shorts." I sigh, since I don't wear boxers.

Noon at the library. I plan to study a bit before lunch and head for my books. The book locker is jammed tight, so I call Security, who calls Building and Grounds, who force the door open. I've missed lunch so I run to Constantine's for a pizza.

After class, at the gym, I get a locker, but I've been given the wrong combination. I return to the pit, exchange combos, and try again. Again it's wrong. The third time I get 'lucky,' I change in a hurry and run to the tennis courts.

I find a partner, but the courts are locked, so together we climb the fence. I rip my pants and his racket gets caught on top, breaking a string. We sit down discouraged.

After dinner, I proceed to the Record office to write this story, but it's locked. The key is in the editor's mail box but I know I don't know his combination if I don't know my own. Frustrated, I descend the steps to WCFM and ask the DJ if there's any place on campus that isn't locked and he just stares at me as if I'm really nuts. He mumbles something about a free country and John Locke, so I take the hint and leave.

I decide to get away from campus for a healthy breath of fresh, free, air. A bike ride, I decide, and head for the basement. My front wheel is locked to the bike rack and the rest of my bike has been 'borrowed.' On the verge of insanity, I look for a Psychology Today magazine to console me, but they are locked in the Psych. Department secretary's office.

Now I'm more determined than ever to get away. I look for some tunnels I've heard about, but they're locked. If I can't hide underground, I'll try above. The chapel tower rushes to mind, but after groping in the dark and finding the tower door, it, too, is locked.

Small wonder so many people are going away this weekend. It's now growing dark and familiar tunes fill the air as Friday night parties take off. I head for my car, wondering if Smith is all locked up, too, and whether everyone down there wears boxers to parties. But I'm wondering in vain because the car's locked and I've lost the key. All locked in, all locked out, I climb to my room and lock the door.

Government to ask for changes

pliance with the state regulations will be considered sufficient for the federal regulations, and has managed to get verbal consent by state officials approached with this suggestion. Unfortunately, when pressed for a written statement, the officials declined.

Administration officials have been closely watching the courts for clues as to how strict the U.S. Government will be in regulating the new statute.

Facing outlays of more than two million dollars if all federal regulations are complied with on one hand, and losing all Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare monies if the College is found in violation of the law on the other, the Administration is attempting to stay "somewhere in the middle."

Laugh at, not with 'Exorcist'

by Don Frazier

"Birth of a Nation"

Archeology 207 "Folkways of the Seventies" will meet Friday night in Bronfman Auditorium at 7:00 and 9:30. This week a document is "The Exorcist", providing welcome respite from a week of rational thought.

This movie works—no small compliment to the brutally efficient director, William Friedkin. It works like a roller coaster—relentlessly, with raw physical sensation mocking any conscious thought. Friedkin says, "There are only three reasons to make a movie to make people laugh, to make them cry, or to frighten them." The evidence of his attitude proves he believes it, and believes it in spades.

Friedkin says that when he read William Peter Blatty's book he became physically ill and enjoyed the process. And I suppose that it is fun to be swept up by forces beyond our control—it relieves us of any responsibility. The adult sophisticate can laugh at the transparency of the tricky special effects while totally aware of their visceral impact. Indeed, without this gut-jerking thrill there isn't much else. The scares here are effective but mechanical—raging animal sounds, flying furniture, the famous 360 degree pivot.

We can also enjoy the movie's posture of high and serious Catholicism, but on the level of a dime-store 3-D holy picture.

Filmmakers can have fun with [illegible] gothic horror comedies like "Rosemary's Baby" and especially Brian De Palma's gleefully sadistic "Carrie". But the "Exorcist" is so heavily ham-witted that we must laugh at it, not with it. Such shallowness to be pretending at "apocalyptic vision" (Blatty's own words!)

So what if it doesn't even follow its own rules by not making even religious sense. Asked why he enjoyed the film, a young man frankly confessed that he "knew" believed in "that sort of stuff." What sort of stuff? A dim [illegible] magnificence of human knowledge.

His vagueness was at once touching, pitiful, and to-the-point. Fuzzy-thinkers are fair game for this sort of old stuff, as they are for any mysticism that explains senselessness by saying that there's no such thing as sense.

After playing it both ways with Good vs. Evil, we hardly notice the absence of real characters or feelings. Blatty trots out the cliches: The guilt-ridden divorcee (Satan's chance), the joking-but-saintly priests from "Going My Way", the gruff Jewish cop with a heart of gold. Cardboard figures can elicit no feeling.

Enjoy the ride. Leave your cares behind, not to mention your mind.

Griffith film found historic, controversial

by Cari-Esta Albert

"Birth of a Nation" is D. W. Griffith's version of the Civil War. The story revolves around a Yankee family named the Stonemans and a Confederate family named the Camerons whose paths cross in the aftermath of the war. Stoneman has been sent down to set up a government in the Cameron's hometown of Piedmont. Love affairs develop between the children of the two families but these relationships are threatened by the differing philosophies of the northerners and southerners.

The movie examines the tensions which were prevalent in the South in the post-war period. Refusing to accept the reality of emancipation, the oldest Cameron boy initiates the formation of the Ku Klux Klan. The film climaxes in a battle between the black militia and the Clansmen. One sees both northern and southern whites united against a "common enemy."

Griffith's conception is blatantly prejudicial in its display of blacks. They are usually shown as either drunk or ignorant, whereas the Klansmen are portrayed as the knights in white armor—the saviors of the south— approaching the besieged city over the hill in a blaze of light.

There was much controversy when the film was released; the NAACP staged a very successful boycott. Griffith himself responded by writing a pamphlet called "The Rise and Fall of Free Speech in America."

Reviewers however, hailed the film for its cinematic achievement. Griffith had moved away from static, theatrical presentations.

This Saturday night, Reel Vintage will present "The Birth of a Nation" at 7:30 in Bronfman Auditorium.

Sculptor donates works to college

Six works by the prominent sculptor Herbert Ferber were given to the College last summer as a gift from Ferber and his wife, Edith. The welded sculptures are permanently displayed on the lawns north of the Sawyer Library. The gift to the College was announced by President John W. Chandler who stated that the "six sculptures add new vitality and interest to a segment of the Williams campus that is viewed daily by hundreds of members of the Williams community."

Ferber's career as a sculptor spans almost five decades. Born in 1901, his first exhibition was at the National Academy of Design in New York in 1930. According to S. Lane Faison Jr., professor of art emeritus at Williams, Ferber was a pioneer in welded sculpture during the late 1940's and 1950's. His work broke away from the tradition of carved or molded sculpture. Examples are on display in important art museums throughout the world, including a piece prominently placed in the garden of the Museum of Modern Art in New York City. The College owns three other works by Ferber, two of them in the recently-donated Lawrence Bloedel art collection.

"Sculpture is art in space," noted Faison, who emphasized the educational value of the Ferber works. "It is meant to be walked around. Passersby, especially interested students, will learn to do just that, and observe changing rhythms, axes, emphases, shifting lights and shadows. To have a group, rather than a single work, is all the more exciting, particularly when it represents a range of work by one of America's most distinguished sculptors."

Odell holds 38-9-1 record

A successful coach, on any level and in any sport, is bound to accrue memories and stories enough to fill any willing listener's spare hours for weeks on end. The problem, however, is that no coach ever became successful by telling stories of his past. Precious time spent preparing to keep a brilliant record intact. Williams football mentor Bob Odell is no exception.

The first words the six-year Williams coach was able to drum up on the verge of his 100th career victory were, "time to get started on the next 100, starting Saturday." Odell, however, is only human, and the thoughts of 100 gratifying victories with countless dedicated players rose to the surface.

"My most memorable wins? Well, how about the most recent one—" (last November's shocking 34-7 upset of Wesleyan). "That was one of the most gratifying wins I've ever been associated with."

"It's very satisfying to have been able to win that many," continued Odell, "I feel honored that the kids have been able to win that many." In addition to his glittering 38-9-1 record at Williams, Odell was 37-21 in eight years at Bucknell, and 24-29-1 in a six-year stint at Penn, his alma mater.

Odell recalls some of the other fine wins his clubs have posted over the last 18 years: a big upset of Harvard in his second year at Bucknell, and a win over Princeton at Penn—the one which earned him a watch from the school, a watch at which he proudly glances for the winning score of the game.

During the early 40's, Bob Odell, was a 60-minute football player, the kind your father tells you about, but that you don't really believe ever existed. As what Grantland Rice once called "as fine an all-around athlete as I've every seen," Odell was named to the All-American team twice, and was voted the top college football player in the country in 1943.

Following a term as backfield coach at the University of Wisconsin (during which the Badgers made a trip to the Rose Bowl) Odell was named head coach at Bucknell in 1957. Three years later, Odell and Bucknell won the Lambert Cup. Quite a jump up from the 1957 squad which went 1-8, beating only a winless team. "I began to wonder if this line of work was for me," chuckles Odell.

Among all the honors which he has received, including twice being named New England Small College Coach of the year (1971 and 1975), the Purple Cow in Bob Odell emerges. "The wins over Amherst in '71, '72, and '73 were great ones," beams Odell. "Those were all unbeaten teams and that's the advantage of having a traditional rival like that."

Through all the wins which he has achieved at four different schools, however, the Bob Odell who seldom emerges through the pages and pages of endless bland pre and post-game quotes is seen. To know that Bob Odell is to understand the difference between Williams and Ohio St.—and no, it's not 60 points.

"Some coaches tell people to stay out of the field," says Odell, "well, if I had it to do all over again, I would do exactly the same thing." The 55-year-old coach glances at his office wall, where pictures of his captains hang among the many trophies his squads have won. "There are so many exciting people who I've met and come to know by having coached them here. Look at those two ('71 captains John Murray, Bob Rutkowski), they're both doctors now."

He continues along the wall, reciting the names and memories of his Williams captains. "This summer was Jim Baldwin's wedding up here," he gleams with the smile of someone whose own son had just been married.

"The spectacular games stick out in your mind," explained the coach, "but most of the wins and losses fade. What stays with you are the close relationships that are built—you find out alot about each other on the football field. Kids at Williams are just great, they play because they want to play," says Odell, making it easier to understand how someone who was once the best player in the land is able to come to a small, academically-minded New England College and seem so happy.

Odell announced to his squad before the thrilling Wesleyan upset of a year ago that that win would be his 100th—and the Ephs got it for him, but it was only his 99th. "It was a mistake," says Odell with a bit of gleam in his eye, "but it worked." The perfect combination of sentimentality and psyche—perhaps the story of Bob Odell at Williams.

Tomorrow afternoon in Clinton, New York, coach Odell begins his quest for another 100 wins, make that 101 wins. "One game at a time," assures Odell, but no coach gains 100 wins one game at a time; you can bet Bob Odell already has Middlebury's game plan churning away in his mind. Congratulations on the first 99, coach, and good luck toward number 100 and the next 100 after that. The Ephs are lucky to have you around.

Frosh run over Hotchkiss 31-26

The freshman cross country team started off the season on Wednesday with a 26-31 win over Hotchkiss on the Lakeville, Conn. campus. John McCammond won the 2.6 mile contest with a 13:58 clocking followed by Phil Darrow in second at 14:05. Cam Virrill (14:44) and Pat Dobson (14:54) trailed a pair of Hotchkiss harriers with a 5th and 6th place conclusion respectively, while Bob Tyler and Erik Oline rounded out the scoring in 12th and 13th.

Hamilton opens football season, underdogs to give Ephs good fight

by Tim Layden

Remember that little scrawny kid on your street when you were about twelve? You know, the kid everyone from the bully of the neighborhood to your younger brother used to beat up or challenge to knock the chip off his shoulder? And then, everyone hits age fifteen or sixteen and the little shrimp is just as big as everyone else and nobody wants any part of him.

Hamilton's football program was always the whipping boy for all the NESCAC schools. The Continentals ran up a 23-game losing streak, lasting through 1974, just one game shy of the NCAA Division III record. When Rochester dropped Williams from their schedule in 1976 "to go big time" (after all, the Yellowjackets had only lost to Williams 38-0 and 16-7 in '74 and '75), Hamilton was added to the Ephs schedule. Chalk up a yearly 49-12 Williams win, said the experts.

Not so fast, folks. Hamilton has slowly and quietly built itself a very respectable football team in the uncivilized wilds of Clinton, New York. "Hamilton had not had a strong football team in recent years," said Williams mentor Bob Odell, "we had seen them through films and Renzie Lamb's scouting, and we were a little overconfident going into last year's game."

Paced by unknown sophomore Greg McAleenan's three thefts, the Williams secondary picked off six Mark LaFountain passes and sputtered offensively on route to a 14-6 win which, according to Odell, "brought us all back to reality very quickly."

"They play a 6-2-3 attacking defense," explained Odell, "and it's very hard to run against." The erratic and wild Continentals, not altogether unlike the John McVicar-led Wesleyan units of the past two years, blitzed on 34 of 78 plays against Williams on Weston last year.

"We've got to make them respect our fullback series," said Odell, "they don't read at all, they just come, and it drives you nuts." With fullback Gus Nuzzolese leading the "I", Odell hopes to surprise the hosts, and set up quarterbacks Bill Whelan and Greg Collins for attacks against the Continentals skimpy three-deep secondary.

Herb McCormick will start at one receiver spot for Odell, with Dave Masucco in the slot. Ken Hollingsworth will see his share of time at split end, as well. And while Hollingsworth won't make anyone forget Lou Groza, the junior seems more than adequate on PAT boots.

Across the offensive line for Williams will be Jack Spound, Ken Schoetz, Joe Maguire (with Mike Curran), Brian Fales (Jay Skerry) and Mark Tercek or Steve Rogers. Todd Eckerson will go at the tight end spot, while Scott Harrington runs from the tailback position.

Obviously, Hamilton's passing game was something less than impressive last year, and Odell notes that "they run from a spread offense which creates some problems; but they hurt themselves." The hosts' big guns will almost certainly be wingback Bill Romaine and transfer Jack Koelbl, an ex Brown Bear, sans fur.

Tri-captain Pete Tuttle, Colin Hart, and Bill Couch (with Mike Bernay) will start across the front for Williams, with Russ Gee and Mike Masi (and Dan Towle) at the ends. John Theil and Phil Shuman back the front wall, while McAleenan, Mark Eckert, Long Ellis, and Mark Gerry will be waiting to shoot down a few LaFountain ducks.

Game time for the season lidlifter is 2:00 p.m. with WCFM carrying the game, beginning at 1:45.

Illustrious alumni challenge track for "Aluminum Bowl"

Tomorrow at noon, the Williams Cross Country team hosts what could be its toughest competition of the season. Two of the visitors finished in the top 100 in last April's world famous Boston Marathon. Add to that a 4:12 miler, a 9:01 two-miler plus several members of the world record 24 hour relay squad and what do you get? The Univ. of Oregon X-C team? The Florida Track Club? The New Zealand Olympic Team? No! This super squad consists of loyal athletes who used to run through the Berkshires in purple suits.

That's right! The Alumni cross country team returns to the Purple Valley tomorrow to take on coach Tony Plansky's varsity for the prized "Aluminum Bowl". The race will start at noon in the Science Quad, and there is a good chance it will continue on Sunday morning when the Alums and undergrads get together for an "easy" 10 miles or so.

Ruggers start against Albany Law

The Williams Rugby Football Club opens its schedule tomorrow with an away contest against Albany Law. Prospects for the year range from good to excellent. The club has a strong nucleus of experienced veterans losing only four players from last year's 10-3-2 club. John Greer, Dave Levy, and Jamie Edwards were lost with the graduating class, and Dewey Power took a year off.

Last year's club posted one of the finest records in recent years. After losing the season's opener to Columbia, the WRFC went on a 9 game undefeated streak marred only by a 13-13 tie with Siena. The club's high point was a 14-12 win over Harvard. After losing two games in a row, the club went on to win two then end the season with a scoreless tie, again with Siena.

Both Men and Women's Rugby open their season tomorrow with away games at Albany Law. Pictured is Wednesday's practice scrimmage of the men's club which posted a 10-3-2 record last year. (photo by Gast)

Led by captains Jim Stuart and Wally Boyer, the club has come a long way in its two weeks of practice and should be ready for tomorrow's game. For this year, team size is not a problem. The scrum's average weight should run close to 215 pounds. Al Dalton, Jim Hutchins, Jim Stuart, Charlie Davis, John Svoboda and Ken Quinn are all working hard for the A-side positions. John Raitt, Victor Bell, Paul Shorb, Carl Webster and Billy O'Reilly will round out the remaining positions. The line finds Wally Boyer, Tom Kondel, Jack DuPre and Jim Maxwell all returning from last year's A-side. Jamie Barickman, Dave O'Connell and Vic Zerbino will fill in the line. Jeff Dunn and Phil Herman are battling it out for scrum half. Numerous other returning veterans and a group of freshmen round out the squad and all will see some action.

A new addition to the club this year is the full time participation of the women's team. After winning their only game last spring the women did a good deal of organizing and presently have a five game schedule for this fall. Led by newly elected captains Linda Collins and Sue Kraus, and with the help of administrator Ginny Doherty the club has been working hard. Having lost several women to other sports, they have the problem of breaking in several newcomers. The newcomers have a lot to learn but not much time, as their first game is also tomorrow against Albany Law.

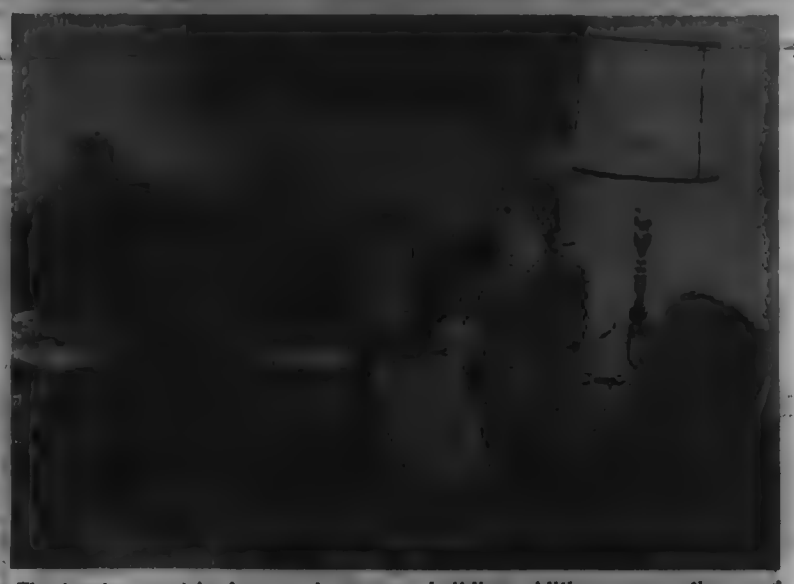
Chapin renovation begins

by Randy Wang

Construction of Phase Two of the Chapin Hall renovation project began last week. The addition, which will house the music department, should be completed by next fall, but will not be fully functional until the 1978-80 school year. According to Chairman of the Music Department Kenneth Roberts, the installation of new furnishings and electronic equipment and the transferral of the equipment from Currier, Chapin and the Chapel will account for the delay. Minimal occupancy, will occur in one and one half years, Roberts said, and for the first time the department will be housed under the same roof. "The professors are 'breathing sighs of relief,' " Roberts said.

The architectural firm Cambridge Seven Associates, a spinoff from the now defunct firm which built Greylock and Bronfman Science Center, designed the addition. David Tierney Jr., of Pittsfield, will do the actual construction.

The plan calls for a three level structure, located on the east or Sawyer Library side of Chapin. The lower floor will house classrooms, audio offices, listening rooms, storage areas, and a library. Mechanical and lavatory facilities for both buildings also will be located in the bottom story. The second level, or the main floor, will contain a large lobby, a 270 seat recital and lecture hall, a 105 seat choral and lecture hall, and a rehearsal room for the orchestra and ensembles. The upper floor will provide balcony space, recording and projection areas, and a visitor's gallery.



The second level will connect with the ground floor of Chapin through two passageways, one in the front of the complex, the other towards the rear. In a space between the addition and the side of Chapin, the architects have placed a small open courtyard.

The facade of the addition will be scored concrete, intended to resemble the stone foundation of Chapin, and to suggest continuity between the two structures. The concrete will also provide a visual break between the brick of the library and Chapin's own brick facade. The architects have been careful to keep the height of the addition in scale with the surrounding buildings.

The acoustical facilities have been designed by Paul Veneklassen, an internationally acclaimed consulting acoustics engineer. Though best known on the west coast, his credits include the refurbished Philharmonic Hall in New York City, the Cleveland Orchestra's summer and winter homes, C.B.S City in Los Angeles and Phase I of Chapin Hall (the twenty-five practice rooms). Sophisticated audio and visual equipment will be installed in the recital hall so that music and art classes, as well as performers, will benefit from the project.

Williams accepted contract bids for the complex on September 2. The signing of the contract one week later climaxed four years of work by the Buildings Committee, first chaired by Irwin Shainman and now by Kenneth Roberts. The College approved the projected location and design, and trustees then authorized

Trustees will plan '78 college policies; eight of nine committees meet Friday

The Board of Trustees will meet on campus Friday and Saturday to discuss a preliminary 1978 budget, the possible nomination of a new trustee, reports on additions to the physical plant, according to College Treasurer and Trustee Secretary Francis Dewey III '41. The trustee Campus Life Committee will also meet Thursday with the Committee on Black Students at Williams, which is composed of both students and faculty members, he added.

Eight of the board's nine committees, which deal with the College's financial situation, campus life, fund-raising, academic policy, and buildings and grounds, will convene Friday. The full board will meet Saturday morning at Mount Hope Farm, when committee chairmen will report on the previous day's discussions.

Trustees will consider on Saturday a tentative College budget for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1978. The budget will be formally approved at the January Board meeting, at which time the board will also consider tuition increases.

The trustees will "probably" nominate an alternate to fill one of the two existing trustee vacancies at the full Board meeting. These two additional trusteeships were created in June 1977 when the board voted to increase its size to facilitate the admittance of more women to the board. There are currently two women members.

According to Dewey the trustees will be brought up to date on Phase II of the Chapin Hall renovation." The addition will cost $2.1 million, beyond which $800,000 will be sought as endowment for the maintenance of Chapin.

Dewey said that the board will be informed Saturday that "architects have been retained to prepare tentative plans for expanded art and athletic facilities." The trustees will not deal with this proposed expansion until sufficient funds for the project have been procured. Dewey will also report on the status of the $7 million bond issue that was arranged for the College during the summer.

News Analysis: Choral problems cancel Merry Widow

by Mimi David

The Merry Widow, an ambitious project planned jointly by the Dance Society, the Choral Society, and to a lesser extent by the Romanic Language Department, has been cancelled as of September 22. An operetta by Franz Lehar, The Merry Widow production involved about 14 dancers, 42 choral members, and numerous professionals including soloists, costumers, set designers, and symphony orchestra members. Partly financed by an anonymous donor, Music Department chairman Kenneth Roberts stated that $1400 in royalty fees is irretrievable and monetary losses to Dance Society have not yet been calculated.

Inspired by a successful Winter Study project of about 4 or 5 years ago performing Stravinsky's Les Noces, this year's attempt at The Merry Widow is a dramatic contrast. After considerable inquiry, it is still unclear as to the exact reasons for specific causes of the cancellation, however, various important issues have been raised.

Planning for The Merry Widow began in May and continued through the summer among faculty members Joy Anne Dewey (dance), Kenneth Roberts (chorus), and John K. Savacool (Romanic Language). The earliest signs of difficulties emerged August 30, when Dewey presented the cast rehearsal schedule to Roberts. According to Roberts, Dewey's schedule required 5 days per week rehearsal for music people. With his 10 years experience, he argued that students would not come five days per week and predicted a "student rebellion." At this time, Roberts suggested that Dewey modify the rehearsal plans.

On September 12, Roberts held a meeting of the Choral Society informing them of The Merry Widow project. Though members of the Choral Society managerial board had heard of the project last May, according to Marcy Holmes, the details were not discussed—in essence, this was the first presentation to the choral group of plans for The Merry Widow. Roberts announced the 42 participating choral members and a rehearsal schedule calling for a commitment of 2 days per week with the possibility of more as the November performance date neared. One of the choral section leaders called it "an honor" to be selected and said people seemed enthusiastic.

Dewey did not take advice

September 20 was the first meeting of the entire cast (music, dance, professionals) led by Savacool. Dewey handed out the rehearsal schedule, which according to Roberts, was "exactly the same" as the one he had earlier rejected. "Mrs. Dewey did not take my advice," he said. The schedule for musicians required rehearsal every night of the week (14 hours total) bits and pieces of each night—the last day of Fall break—and the possibility of amendments every 2 weeks—according to one choral section leader.

Almost immediately, "all hell broke out," said Roberts, and between Tuesday evening and Wednesday afternoon, 37 of the 42 choral participants contacted him. Students complained that it simply required too much time and many wished to drop out. Discussion among students centered around it being too much to put into a production starting at the beginning of the school year, conflicts with earlier commitments to other organizations and academic requirements. According to one choral member, there was real anger—a student revolt."

In response to the numerous complaints, Roberts called a meeting of Savacool and of the choral participants at 8:15 on Wednesday evening before the entire cast meeting. At this time, one of the singers who described herself as "stunned" by the schedule, explained the ensuing discussion. Many students argued that they didn't have the time and were not able to plan in advance as they didn't know. Various alternatives were suggested, but there seemed to be obstacles to most of them. For example, the idea of postponing The Merry Widow to Winter Study was negated by the fact that "symphony orchestra members would not risk their lives getting to Williams from December to March," said a member of the managerial board. The idea of reducing the size of the chorus to just the number of interested people and-or reducing the rehearsal time from 5 to 3 days (one more than really expected), were being debated when the choral group "marched" over to Lasell gym for a whole cast meeting at 9:00.

Students split in committment

What happened at the convention is not totally clear. It appears that as Roberts said, Dewey called her schedule "optimum" and may have been receptive to cutting music time commitments. A choral section leader stated, "she (Dewey) sounded con-

75% respond with honor guidelines

More than 75 per cent of the faculty has filed forms specifying honor code guidelines for their courses with the Deans' Office to date, Dean of the College Peter Berek said Friday.

However, few students have received such statements in more than one or two of their classes.

"Most faculty are relying on the guidelines printed in the Student Handbook," Berek explained, "and have reminded students of the Honor Code, or will do so at the time when they assign their first written exercises. The vast majority of the statements we have received are based on the Handbook; it is only in certain situations involving take-home exams and graded collaborative projects that professors need to specify further rules."

Of the approximately 150 forms distributed among the faculty, 111 have so far been returned completed to the Deans' Office. Many, according to Berek, represent composite statements for all the courses in a small department; others are individual statements by a certain professor concerning a particular

"I have been gratified by the faculty response," Berek said. "It indicates their immediate concern with the honor code at Williams."

Chairman of the Student Honor Committee Dan Sullivan '78, said Sunday that freshmen will be required to sign the Honor Code sometime this week. "This year we will initiate the Honor Code for upperclassmen in February, during registration and every September thereafter," he said. This schedule alleviates the problems of distribution and collection involved with Honor Code forms, he explained.

Sullivan also said that the Student Honor Committee would meet sometime this week after the freshmen codes have been collected. "I've heard varied reports about how professors are distributing their guidelines to students," he said, "and we'd like to evaluate the system."

Letter: Flemming and friends

To the editor:

In view of the nature of the several responses to our letters (on the Bill Berning and the memorandum of the Committee on Black Students at Williams) which indicate a lack of understanding of our position and purposes in writing these letters, we would like to clarify the following points.

First, even though historically blacks have been among those to suffer most from capitalist society in America, we did not and do not mean to imply that they therefore must be expected to take the primary responsibility for introducing change into a system for which all are equally accountable. Our first two letters were merely prompted by two articles in the Record, one of which happened to be about black students at Williams, but we apologize if this has given rise to feelings in the black community of being again the victim of white racism and patronage. Our purpose is only to criticize the lack of socialist activity which characterizes most members of the college community and it is thus, by definition, non-racist.

Secondly, there is a distinction between the critical analysis of a situation and the proposing of positive change. To declare "Either constructive proposals or no criticism at all!" is simply a convenient method of repressing such unwelcome criticism.

Third, in the artificially isolated and intellectually oriented atmosphere of Williams College, we do consider it to be an appropriate action to provide an alternative to the standard Williams viewpoint which never seriously questions the status quo.

Fourth, the value of small-scale improvements is not to be denied. But those who insist that we must restrict ourselves to making such modifications are simply trying to avoid reconstruction of the system as a whole. No step can reasonably be taken without keeping in mind the complexities of the entire American higher educational system.

With these points in mind, we would like to submit for serious examination the following characterizations of our educational system quoted from Ross Wetzsteon's article in the August 25, 1977 issue of the Village VOICE:

"Consider the goals and structure of American education, and the increasing disparity between professed aim and actual achievement.

"• Educational institutions profess to be the single most democratizing influence in our society while actually perpetuating, and often exacerbating, economic inequality, social snobbery, and racial injustice. Education in this country seems to be moving in two directions—elitist universities training the upper middle classes to become professionals, and community colleges training the lower middle classes to serve as white-collar workers for the corporations. Merely changing the definition of the elite, and slightly increasing the number of those admitted into its ranks, is one of the more appalling ways we decieve ourselves into thinking we're creating a classless society.

"• Professing to provide a general humanistic education through the curriculum-elective process, our colleges actually provide little more than pre-job training. The paradox of the elective system instituted in the second half of the 19th century is that while it intended to broaden a student's potential opportunities, it ended by narrowing his actual choices. Thus a humanistic goal ultimately served economic purposes.

"• Professing to develop a capacity for original thinking, our colleges merely impart information. It always struck me as idiotic, for instance, that our testing system if based largely on memory, as if one were to live the rest of one's life, as one leads one's life in the typical testing situation, without the presence of books.

"• Professing to reach out for the entire population, our colleges have merely replaced the elitist image of the well-educated, well-mannered gentleman with a pseudopopulist image of ethnic gentility which amounts to little more than semiliteracy. Jefferson's natural aristocrat has become a mere consumer for the Knowledge Industry. The cheapening of the degree, about which we hear so much groaning, is nothing compared to the debasing of the intellectual life.

"• Professing to create a high-minded, mutually supportive community of scholars, researchers, teachers, administrators, and students, our colleges, in fact, have created a cannibalistic culture unmatched even in the corporate jungle for envy, malice, and opportunism. Student cheating is the tip of the iceberg's tip—what else can we expect in a ruthlessly competitive environment dominated by survival of the fittest, pitting of student against student by faculty contempt for both the administration and the student body by the greedy destruction the once-honorable concept of tenure has become?

"Several aspects of the structure of American higher education can be held accountable for this debasement of a once-honorable ideal: To list but a few:

"• To a degree unmatched by any other country, our colleges are forced to compete for students. The paradox of the relative autonomy of higher education in the United States is that while it freed most institutions from overt political control and allowed them to develop innovative programs almost at will, it also forced them to operate as private corporations in a capitalist economy, to cater to their clients precisely as if they were selling a commodity.

"• The undergraduate curriculum, instead of being devised to serve the general educational needs of the student, is almost always controlled by the needs of the graduate schools or by the pressures of the donors (whether alumni or government). Once more the client-placement relationship (with undergraduate schools merely filling the personnel needs of graduate schools and business) supercedes the goal of democratic, humanistic studies.

"• The concept of tenure, established to secure academic freedom, has turned into an academic gravy train. Has anyone ever heard a single teacher talk of tenure in terms of intellectual independence rather than financial security? Clearly some method of combining security with accountability has to be devised for college teachers—considering the work of some tenured professors, one might even envisage educational malpractice suits.

"• The concept of academic departments, which in the 19th century both responded to and led to the development of new fields of knowledge (the social sciences, agriculture, engineering, etc.) may now be leading us in the opposite direction—toward fragmentation of knowledge and overspecialization at the undergraduate level. Interdisciplinary courses, which began to flourish in many universities in the expansive 60's, have often been the first courses dropped in the retrenching 70's.

"In short, it seems that the disparity between the goals of our educational institutions and their actual achievements is as great as that between the aspirations toward democracy expressed by our Constitution and the economic and racial realities of our society."

CC forms CEP, CUL subcommittees

by Nancy Richman

According to College Council Vice President Peter Friesen, the Elections Committee will be accepting self-nominations this week for the newly formed parallel committees of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) and the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP).

"We are looking for people who talk a lot to other students and who are willing to bring school policy issues into their conversations," explained Friesen. He said he believes that the parallel committees can serve an important purpose by "cutting down on all of the wasteful rubber-stamping" that is often so indicative of the role of student representation now in CUL and CEP decisions.

As approved by the College Council last year, the two parallel committees are to be comprised of all of the student members of the CUL and the CEP as well as an equal number of students who are to be selected through a process of self-nomination.

"As long as there are more students interested in working on the regular committees than can be accommodated, College Council President Tom Herwitz explained, "the council ought to make a special effort to harness that interest and we intend to do that with the parallel committees."

The parallel committees will meet weekly, a few days before the respective CUL and CEP meetings whose actions they are designed to augment. The concept of a parallel committee, explained Friesen, "is based on the idea that unless you are prepared to discuss things intelligently, you will not get anything constructive done for the students and will only succeed in doing busy work for the administration."

Herwitz concurred. "I think," he said, "that the parallel committees will serve a number of important purposes. As we see it, they have a four-fold function. First of all, they should serve to generate further student discussion about many of the important issues confronting the college community today and we'd like to see these parallel committees initiate discussions about matters which are not currently being considered in either the CUL or the CEP."

Also, the committees should ideally serve to better inform the student members of the regular committee, of the opinions of students throughout the school. Herwitz emphasized the importance of "this watchdog function." Finally Herwitz spoke of the value of the committees "as a means for a more formalized expression of greater student imput."

As Friesen explained, "It seems excessive, I know, to be forming another committee but essentially I believe that we are streamlining the process. It seems ironic but I think that these committees will provide for more productive student participation in both CUL and CEP decisions."

Friesen and Herwitz both had specific items for the agendas of the parallel committees. The committee paralleling the CUL, suggested Herwitz, should "take another look at last year's CUL report." "Personally," he said, "I did not agree with many of the findings with regard to the effectiveness of the housing situation here. I'll say, as I've said before that it's not working. Although there is a great degree of heterogeneity in the houses, the choices of house activities rarely reflect this. Often a small and more homogeneous group within the house directs its social functions. I think therefore that we should be more lenient in allowing house transfers."

Area film groups offer entertainment options

by John Setear

"There is only one thing that can kill the movies, and that is education."
—Will Rogers

"There's nothing to do," whines the bored Williams student. It is a weekend night at 7:00 p.m. You've already eaten dinner. Moral or financial reasons prevent your going to the Log. The parties won't be getting started for hours. "What can I do?" the student asks himself. Go to a movie!" answers an annoying little voice.

There are three organizations showing films regularly on or near the Williams campus. The Images Theater is the commercial theater on Spring Street. The Williams Film Society shows general-interest films, while Reel Vintages shows more cerebral films at the same low price of $1.

The Williams Film Society presents films on Friday nights at 7:00 and 9:30 p.m. The Society is non-profit, obtaining its funds only through ticket proceeds. Stewart Reed, head of the Society, is confident that the $1 admission price would not be raised "in the foreseeable future."

Artists represented in this year's Society schedule include the Marx Brothers, Clark Gable, and The Creature from the Black Lagoon. According to Stew, 500 pairs of 3-D glasses have been procured for The Creature. This will presumably assure that the monster's slight facial irregularities will leap out at the audience—a marked contrast to Robert Redford's carefully made-up dimples. Stanley Kubrick's Clockwork Orange, a film of rape and murder, will be shown on what Stew called "pre-med night."

The observant, frugal student may wind up seeing every one of the Society's films. "The first three people to give the correct answer to the trivia question at the bottom of each week's poster will be admitted free," Stew explained. "Since the question concerns the previous week's movie a person could theoretically spend just $1.00 for the first film and get in free to all the others, by simply correctly answering the question." You may want to take notes, though, so check with your date first.

"Our basic purpose is to provide entertaining films at a reasonable cost," Stew added. "There are at least two representatives of the Society at each film. We're always interested in opinions concerning past and future films."

"With the new projectors that have been installed at Bronfman, the image there is as good as that at the Images theater," Stew insisted. He said that last year's sound problems have been corrected. (This reporter attended one of the Society's recent films and found the technical aspects satisfactory, although it may have been the company.)

The Images Cinema, formerly Images at the Nickelodeon, is the local theater in Williamstown. Three different films are shown each week: one on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday; another on Wednesday and Thursday; and still another Friday and Saturday. Admission is $2.50.

The wide variety of films offered is a major advantage Images has over student organizations. Pop-corn and lemonade are on sale in the lobby, something else the on-campus films lack. The other plus is that the films are often new releases.

"The films shown here are a mixture of new films and consistent favorites," said Blake McClenachan, the theater's manager. "Some of the less commercial films may even have their area premiere here."

McClenachan said that the 35-mm prints projected at Images provide a much better image than the 16-mm prints used by the student groups." The prints are also screened and replaced if they are badly damaged, something the student organizations can't do.

"A new sound system will be installed here soon," said McClenachan. "We are definitely putting in a stereo system, and we may even go with Dolby. There aren't really that many films in Dolby, but somehow it makes everything else sound better."

A box in the lobby is available for suggestions. Those wishing to be placed on the mailing list will receive a monthly copy of the theater's schedule if they place their name and address in the box.

Monthly art exhibits are on display in the lobby. Free coffee and tea is available, and the theater's atmosphere is decidedly informal. It's all part of McClenachan's general philosophy. "We try to make the whole theater conducive to relaxing."

Reel Vintage, formerly the Williams College Film Group, is the "high-brow" film group at Williams. With a generally foreign-oriented program of films presented Saturday nights at 7:30 p.m., Reel Vintage is "not solely in the entertainment business," according to Joanne Spano, '78, co-head of the group with Ellen Cary, '78.

The purpose of Reel Vintage is to "expose a greater number of people to more artistically-oriented films," Joanne said. "The films we show can be entertaining, as well as examples of really well-done creative expression."

Films to be shown include those directed by Alfred Hitchcock, Charlie Chaplin, and Buster Keaton, along with lesser-known directors like Fellini, Westmuller, and Cocteau.

Because some people enjoy their entertainment on a Saturday night, Ellen conceded that it can be hard to train yourself to look at these films. "As in any art form," she said, "the effort you expend is usually well worth it."

"In some respects," observed Lord Willis, "the film business is rather like that prehistoric animal the dinosaur, which apparently had two brains, one in its head, and one in its rear." If you have nothing better to do at the moment than ponder that quote, why don't you go see a movie?

Merry Widow: time posed problems

vincing, but people didn't trust her." Roberts said that "more and more students were turned off." In an effort to determine just how many students would participate in the chorus, Roberts asked each singer to place in his box a written note telling the extension of his or her time commitment rather than putting the decision to a vote which was the method advocated by Dewey.

38 out of the 42 choral participants placed responses in Roberts' box. Roberts reported that the results were "split down the middle:" there was a group who would do "anything to keep it alive," one that "may be willing to go on," and one that "resigned from the whole thing." According to Roberts, those who were not willing to participate included managers, soloists, section leaders and seniors. He explained that he was left with 19 definite people—a situation which created various musical problems. There would be 6 men, 2 tenors but 3 tenor parts; there would be so few voices in Chapin Hall that coupled with such a powerful orchestra "we just wouldn't have people for the musical quality we want." As a result of the notes in his box, Roberts said he became acutely aware of the small number of choral students willing to participate. Due to the insufficient number of students willing to participate, at this date and the expectation of more dropping out, the decision to cancel was made by Roberts and the Choral Society.

It appears that the real problem centered around the time commitment The Merry Widow project demanded of its choral participants. Given student groups, it seems that the smaller number of dancers were willing to make a substantial time commitment that many choral members were not. A senior member of the choral managerial board who called the time commitment "awesome" and who herself was not participating—said "the Dance Society was fully aware of the time commitment and accepted it—I am impressed." She added that dancers are probably more accustomed to long term, intensive rehearsal than the majority of choral members.

In discussing the choral members' objections to the amount of time required, Roberts talked about "too many demands on the schedule of the student." He broadened the significance of the choral students' complaints blaming the "crazy curriculum" and Williams "not being on the credit system." He noted that for more than six years, he has been working with the CEP so that non-music majors can get credit for their participation in musical events. Roberts argued that as more demands are made on the student with high marks needed for graduate school, large amounts of time are simply not available for participation in arts events. Indeed it seems to be the quantity of the time commitment that made choral students unwilling to participate in a major production like The Merry Widow.

With the critical role in the decision to cancel being played by the Choral Society, the public reaction of the Dance Society has been minimal. Both Dewey and Savacool referred the Record to Bronson Fargo, co-president of the Dance Society, for an official statement. Fargo stated succintly that, "the Dance Society and myself regret that The Merry Widow will not be produced due to organizational difficulties." Fargo went on to say that "it was a loss to the community overall."

Various issues are raised by the cancellation of a major artistic production. The question of a lack of faculty communication causing the "organizational difficulties" must be considered. Student organizational leaders—Bronson Fargo and Virginia Kling (dance), Marcy Holmes and Tom Michie (chorus), according to Holmes, had "no contact," until this past week.

The organization problems resulting in the inability to arrive at a schedule which would accommodate the dancing as well as the musical participants seems unfortunate. The problem of the quantity of time commitment affecting the degree of student participation is one which holds ominous predictions for future large cast artistic endeavors.

Currently, the cancellation of The Merry Widow spells a considerable financial loss. Roberts explained that "$1400 in royalties (was) irretrievable." The monetary losses to the Dance Society are as yet uncalculated. Cloth and costumes have been bought but not yet used and contracts with professionals still must be terminated. The professional costume designer has already completed her sketches and at the Wednesday night meeting, it was she who pleaded for continuation since so much work had already been done, according to a choral member present.

With the financial loss, the "organizational difficulties," the seeming lack of communication among faculty leaders as well as student leaders—what is the future of such major artistic productions? In Roberts' view, "it will be a long time before anyone can think of such a big thing again."

Birth of a Nation-in Black and White

by Jake Prescott

The screening Saturday night of D. W. Griffith's "The Birth of a Nation" was an extraordinary and eye-opening experience. I was awed by Griffith's power in his use of the medium, but also by the Williams audience that watched the film. This was not the usual audience that turns out on Saturday nights to see repertoire-type films (Being an avid filmgoer myself, I have rarely missed any of this excellent series in my four years here). This particular film, however, was sponsored in part by the campus Afro-American society, and the black student body turned out in impressive numbers. They were not there for the same reason as I was. I went to see "The Birth of a Nation" as a student of film and an ardent lover of any story told in as passionate and technically expert a voice as Griffith's. The blacks came, sitting together in silence in a group on the left side of the auditorium, for the reason that Griffith, besides being a powerful filmmaker and storyteller, was an extremely biased bigot whose views may have severely hampered the civil rights cause while he was alive. The black students, by their presence, and their foreboding silence (even in some of the truly funny moments in the film) kept me from indulging as I otherwise would have in this dangerous film.

The Black Man, according to Griffith, is an inferior creature who, if given "equality", will usurp all power from the helpless White Man, using that power irresponsibly and striving only to marry and abuse the lily-white daughters of former slave-owners. It's not that the Black Man is inherently bad, it's just that he needs his wise white master to show him the way towards virtue. I see these as Griffith's views, and I condemn them, yet a sense of shame and guilt remains for crimes perpetrated by my ancestors. But, were I alive then, I'm not sure that I'd have had the spiritual fortitude to rise above these prevalent notions myself. As it is, there is no physical way I have to repay my fellow students who happen to be black for the years of inhuman treatment inflicted on them through views spread by men like Griffith. I am at a loss.

But what measures can be taken now, here at Williams, to prepare for a future that will make Griffith's views as obsolete as many of his then-innovative camera techniques? Certainly we are getting nowhere by writing letters each week to the Record, accusing one another of racist views, or denying that racism exists. Certainly I would be a hypocrite and a fool to try and side with the blacks, happily saying "I understand what you've been through." I can never understand what torture the Black Man has been made to feel, having been treated for over 200 years as being incapable of holding valuable opinions or ideas. I will never understand this because I have never been made to feel it, always being automatically given advantages, just for being white.

What I can do, however, is to recognize the shame I should feel for this great injustice, but not wallow in it. All Williams students have the same obligation, whether they are black or white, and that is the obligation to rise above the mistakes of the past, to try and see with unemotional eyes, the horrors of the present, like those in South Africa, and to educate ourselves to the furthest possible extent towards solving our future problems with good sense.

Mime duet enchants Clark

The mime-theater duet of Garbo and Jillian brought magic to the Clark Art Institute last Friday night, with their light-hearted entertainment which included juggling, mime, magic tricks and acrobatics. The show was particularly fun for children who had probably never before seen the jaded magic tricks which were performed as Garbo and Jillian joined separate metal rings and made a pigeon disappear from inside a box. But some of the mime was marvelous such as the time when Garbo isolated his head and ribs and appeared to have them moving independently of his will and when both Garbo and Jillian walked down non-existent stairs. In a clever skit called the Chess Game they acted as both the players and the pieces.

Many variations of juggling were performed which were enhanced by funny facial expressions. Garbo started by juggling three, four, and then five balls in different patterns and rhythms and then Jillian joined him so that the two were juggling about seven balls between them. Then Garbo, in a skit called "The Bug," kept finding and losing foam balls in the air until finally a great stream of them appeared to be coming out of his mouth. Their humor was more successful in the typical slapstick pieces such as when Garbo tried to learn how to ride a unicycle and when he and Jillian decided to cook a "french dish."

The "French dish" skit was wonderful as Garbo and Jillian placed a cloth and a bottomless can over the head of a volunteer from the audience and then seemed to combine an egg, and milk, and then sugar in the can from which a grapefruit was miraculously produced. Bits of tumbling, which included Garbo's exciting no-hand flips and a ribbon dance, were interspersed throughout the show whose child-like appeal was pleasingly charming.

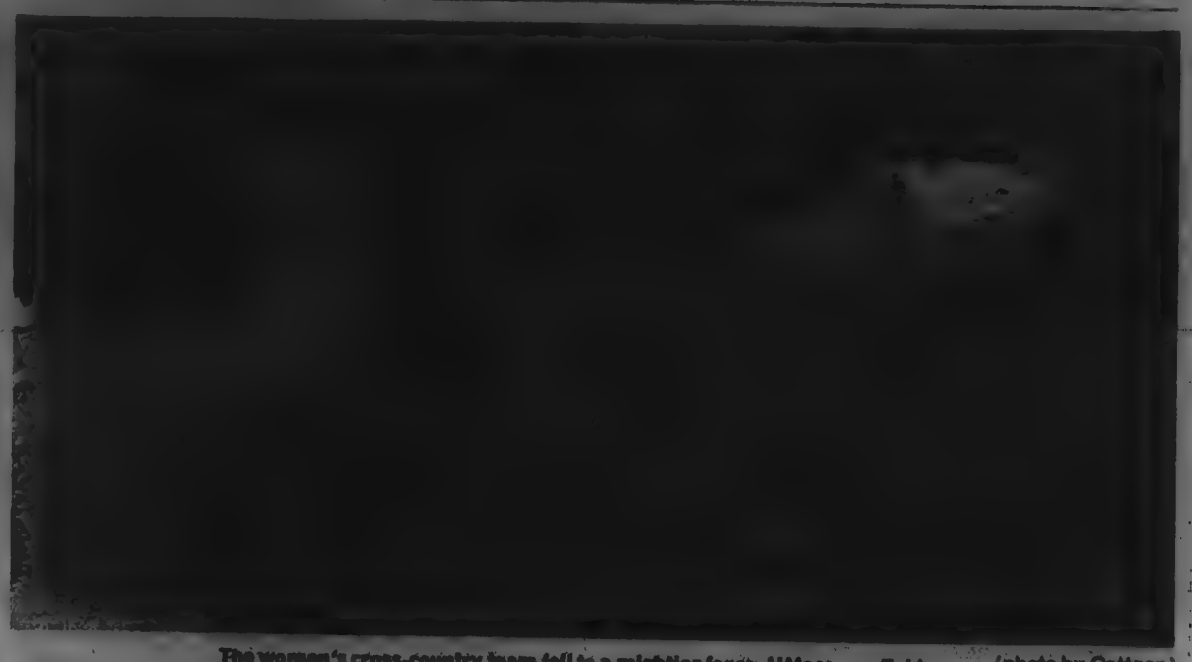
be exact, are the freshmen that are somewhat of a welcome problem for Tong as he sorts out in what positions to put this added team depth. Anne Morris, Laura Goebel, Mary Tom Higgs and Kristan Dale have performed spotlessly to date, not losing a match.

Against Mt. Holyoke, Williams needed all the depth it could muster, losing the first three singles positions to strong Holyoke opponents. Fine performances by Sherry Willcox at No. four singles, Morris at No. five and Amy Demorest at No. six got the Ephwomen pointed in the right direction as they all recorded good wins.



The doubles teams secured the victory as they didn't drop a set. Veterans Sally Kruse and Amy Sterling teamed for one win, while senior Sherry Edman played with Goebel for the second. Higgs and Dale rounded out Williams' wins for the day.

Wesleyan found out the hard way that when it rains, it pours. Captain Laura Carson (No. one) and No. two Becky Chase won their matches without losing a game, while Trudie tenBroeke rolled 6-0, 6-3 at No. three. Goebel switched to No. five singles and won in three sets. The doubles duos, with Edman and Willcox teamed together, dropped only one game.

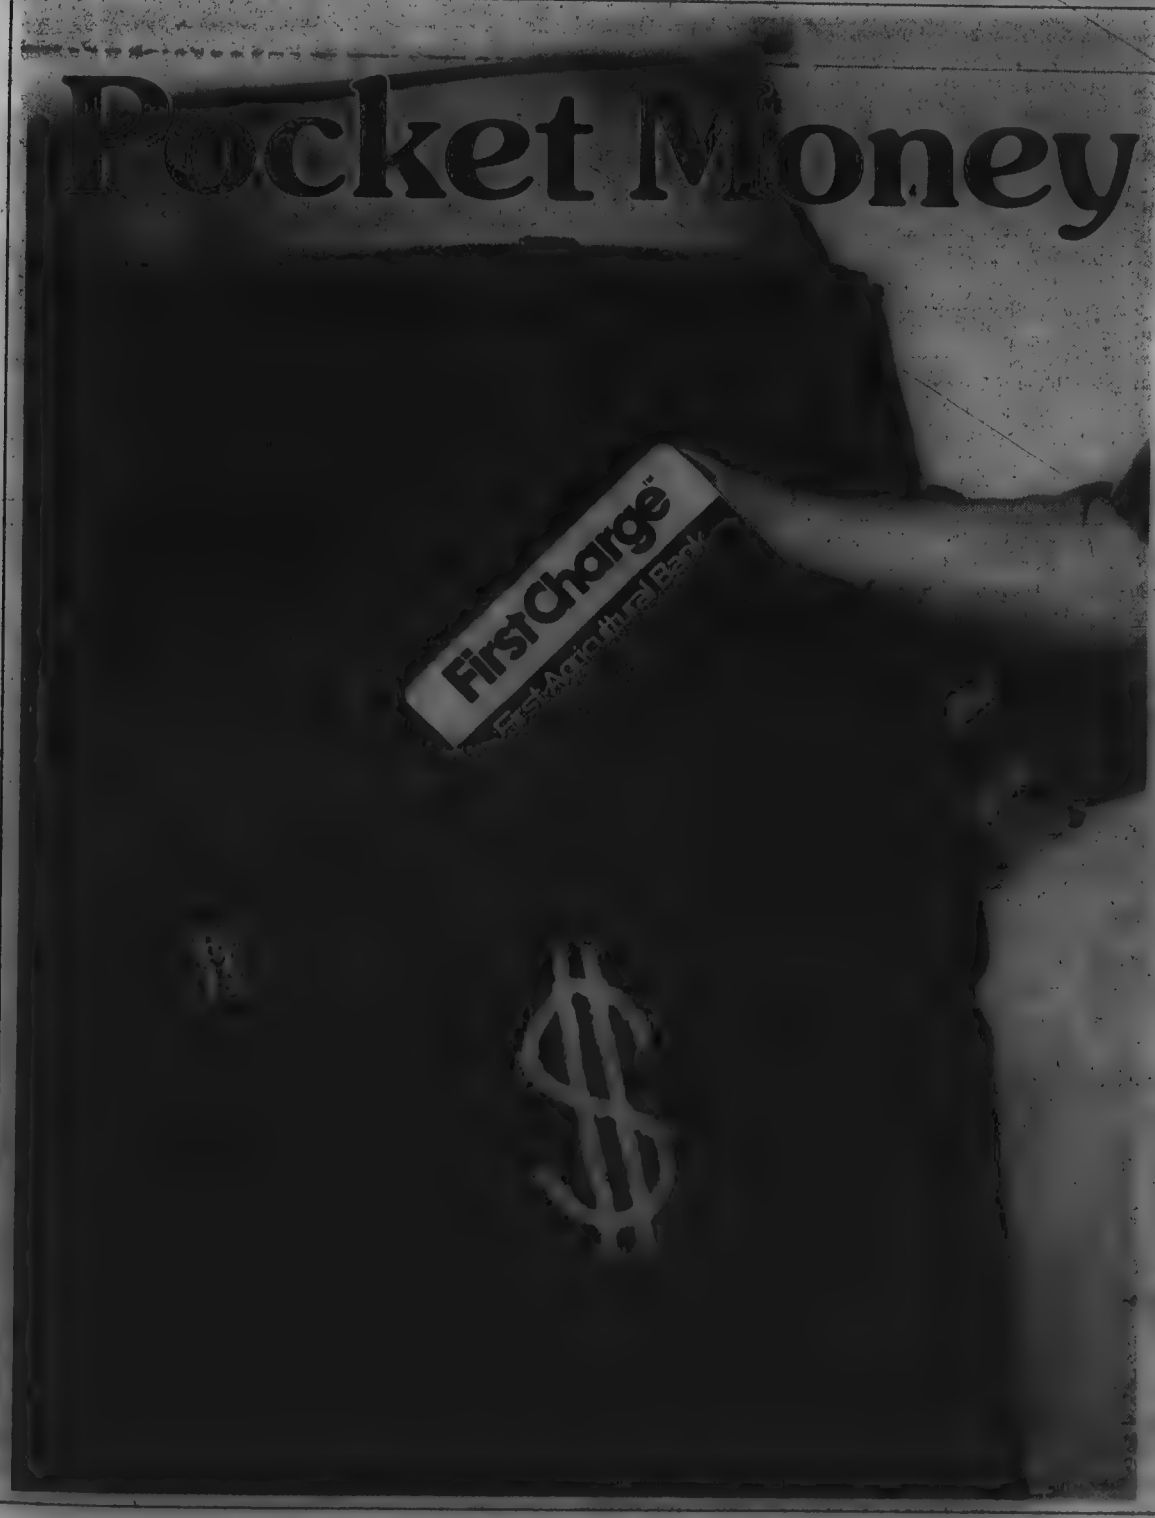
yard, 9-play drive to close the gap to 14-12.

"Defensively, we didn't do terribly," said Odell, "they didn't throw any surprises at us, they just did a fine job blocking people." Following a Scott Harrington punt, Hamilton moved to the Williams one in eleven plays, aided strongly by a very questionable pass interference call against McAleenan in the end zone. LaFountain's one-yard sneak gave Hamilton the lead and set up Collins' heroics.

In at least one respect, the victory was a psychic one for the Ephs, as tri-captain Scott Harrington suffered strained knee ligaments and will be out at least two weeks. Massucco filled in admirably at a position which is unfamiliar to him, receiving crash courses from fellow soph Nuzzolese as the huddles broke.

Ralph Spooner and Mike Masi both shared defensive honors for the day with McAleenan, while Mark Gerry came up from the corner for several fine stops. The junior also called on his basketball winters of the past, leaping to bat a desperation LaFountain heave in the final [illegible].

But for now, Odell and company head to the drawing board and search for a game plan for Middlebury. Romaine got 115 yards Saturday, and one guesses he's not the caliber of Mr. Heffernan. Middlebury stomped poor Colby 56-14 and are the only Purple foe with a winning mark against Bob Odell, Blastoff: four days and counting.



Women runners trim times, lose meet

Although Williams' runners cut as much as 56 seconds off their previous times, the women's cross country team fell victim to a near sweep by one of the best squads in New England, UMass, in their first dual meet last Friday.

Senior Michele Cutsforth finished fourth behind three Massachusetts runners with a 20:30 clocking for the 3.2 mile course, 40 seconds below her time at the Williams Invitational last week. The winner of the event, Jane Welzel, set a new course record with a 19:57. Trish Beckwith '79 and Lisa Capaldini '78, tied for eighth place behind three more UMass women. The final score was 17-44.

Coach Bud Fisher was pleased with his team's performance in spite of the overwhelming loss. "Everyone improved her time by a great deal; in fact, all of the first five finishers were under the course record. UMass has always beaten us, but they also challenge us to run as well as we can at any point in the season."

Tomorrow afternoon, Williams will meet Middlebury at Middlebury for what Fisher believes will be a close match. The Middlebury team won the New England Women's Cross Country Championships last fall and has since lost no one from its nucleus of top runners.

Ephs slosh through to win:

victory over Hamilton marks Odell's 100th

by Tim Layden

Start with truckloads of good 'ole fashioned central New York mud, add a dash of the theme from Rocky, throw in some down-home guts and determination, and pray like crazy that the man upstairs is watching over the guys in Purple and Gold and you somehow come up with a thrilling season opening victory for Williams.

"We didn't play well at all," said Head Coach Bob Odell after his charges had gotten him the 100th victory of his 19-year coaching career. "But they hung together, and the character of the team really came through."

The 21-18 barnburner over the Hamilton Continentals was played in a miserable, steady rain on Stueben Field, and saw the hosts throw a couple of scares into the favored Ephs before a pair of Dodd House juniors reached into their respective bags of tricks and pulled out the win.

With just 1:52 remaining in the game, Hamilton's jack-of-all-trades junior Billy Romaine punted to Long Ellis on the Hamilton 48. Quarterback Greg Collins, in relief of senior Bill Whelan "because he makes things happen, and he can run," (Odell) threw one incompletion before Dave Massucco gained four on a sweep and 15 more on a facemasking call, the first break the men in the zebra costumes gave Williams all afternoon.

Kenny Hollingsworth made a fingertip grab of a Collins sideline pass, moving the Ephs to the sixteen, and a pair of Massucco carries put the pigskin on the seven yard-line. Collins and company went from there without a huddle and the stocky signal-caller rolled right while Hollingsworth made an outside move and curled two yards deep in the end zone. The ball was on the numbers and Williams had escaped alive from a game which all the numbers gave to the hosts.

They're not a bad football team at all," said Odell of the beaten Continentals, "they took a lot away from our offense with their stunting defense, but it eventually cost them the game."

The two clubs battled first-game rustiness and on uncharacteristically cold and windy September day (Indians, how about a little summer, huh?) through the early going. Both clubs slogged up and down through the sloppy turf with only Romaine's 48-yard scamper in the first stanza posing a threat to the goose eggs on the scoreboard.

Hamilton finally got the wind at its back in the second period and moved from the Williams 44 into scoring range with their second drive of the game. With just 54 seconds remaining in the half, Romaine followed the left side of the offensive line for a 1-yard score.

Junior cornerback Greg McAleenan, who later ran his career interception total against Tom LaFountain to four, took the ensuing kickoff on his own four, improvised a fake reverse to Mark Gerry, bounced off a horde of tacklers on the 20, reversed his field and went up the left sideline to knot the score. Hollingsworth added the PAT.

As the weather and enthusiasm in the stands continued utterly lousy, Whelan took the Ephs to the seeming breathe easier tally in the third period. Hollingsworth hauled in a short out and turned it upfield for a 27-yard gain before Gus Nuzzolese hammered over from the eight, releasing the frustrations of running into non-holes all day on an unsuspecting Hamilton safety at the goal line.

The Williams scores, while extending the Eph lead to 14-6, did not erase the day's most glaring consistency. Hamilton's offensive front wall had opened up holes for Romaine and fullback Mark Annunziatta all day, and continued to do so on a 54-

Dublin University falls to Williams soccer 2-1

by Mark Pogue

Sporting a 5-0-3 pre-season mark, their best attitude in years, and speed enough to impress even Digs Devlin, the Williams Soccer Players open a new season tomorrow with a match at Union College. "I'm optimistic," says Purple co-captain Teddy Rouse, "If we can get ourselves mentally up for this one we should do well."

Digs Devlin? An All-Star forward for the Dublin University Ponies, Digs Devlin came to Williamstown last Thursday when he and his mates played a special scrimmage against Williams. "Your lads play a more organized game than we do," Devlin said after the Ephs had made off with an easy 2-1 win. "The Americans have no room to do their own thing on the field—but blimey, they're fast enough!"

Following a spotty first ten minutes, the Ephbooters drew on their superior size and strength to gain command of the action. Midway through the half forward John Friborg collected a Peter May pass and fired a grounder past Irish keeper Paddy Fahy for a 1-0 American lead. Dublin's vaunted forward line, meanwhile—"The Pony Express," as Devlin dubs it—was limited to four first half shots on goal by the Williams defense. After some close competition for these backfield slots Coach Jeff Vennell has decided to open at Union with Jay Loeffler in goal and Pete Thayer, Bill Kister, Tad Roach and Bruce Camilleri at fullback.

In the second half some spectacular individual efforts gained the Irish better penetration, but Loeffler's net was seriously threatened only once. With 39:20 to play Williams made it 2-0 when Greg Hartman took the last of four pinpoint passes and scored from 15 yards away. After Vennell installed his second unit Doug Orr took over in goal for Williams and made several clutch saves before finally succumbing to a Devlin blast with one second left.

Last Saturday, tallies by Chic Johnson, Pete May, Hank Osborne, Stu Taylor, and Andy Chase powered the undergrads to a 5-2 decision in the annual Alumni rainout. Vennell said his club played "fairly well" even though it's "hard to get mentally into an alumni game."

In tomorrow's game, look for the Ephs to use their wing speed to circumvent Union's midfield strength, and their size to stay afoot amidst the inevitable battering-ram tackles. "Union is big and rough," Jeff Vennell says. Game time is four o'clock.

Women's tennis smashes Mt. Holyoke and Wesleyan

by Evan Bash

Last week's weather was soggy enough to make normal tennis players swap their double-knit warm-ups for raincoats and sneakers for a pair of flippers. But, as their 32-2 record over the past three years suggests, the women's varsity tennis team is composed of anything but normal players.

So, coach Curt Tong's charges used a short break in the weather to drown Mt. Holyoke 6-3 on Thursday before swamping Wesleyan 9-0 indoors on Saturday. The Mt. Holyoke match became Williams' season opener after their scheduled debut against Tufts was postponed because of rain. A tentative make-up date of October 15 has been set.

Despite the Ephwomen's encouragingly quick start, coach Tong is still trying to find the team's strongest line-up. "This is the time of year when we'd normally have our line-up set," said Tong after the Wesleyan match, "but because of all the new faces we're still searching."

These "new faces," four of them to

Harriers capture Aluminum Bowl

Despite the rainy Williamstown weather, 15 Alumni cross country runners returned for the Fifth Annual Aluminum Bowl last Saturday and came within 7 points of beating the varsity for the first time. The 26-33 score is the smallest margin of victory ever for the varsity, while this year's freshmen contingent was well back in third place with 75 points.

Joe Kolb and Tom Schreck grabbed the lead after the first mile and splashed across the Taconic golf course with Jay Haug '73 and Peter Farwell '73 right behind. The varsity duo hung onto first place and opened up some daylight on the return grind up South Street, eventually tying for the number one position at 19:16.

Further back, Frank Carr pulled ahead of Bob Clifford '76 and Haug in the last mile and strutted into third in 19:22 for a 1-2-3 varsity sweep. Clifford crossed the line a half-dozen seconds behind Carr, while Haug and Farwell netted fifth and sixth for the Alums. Phil Darrow topped the frosh entants, as he toured the soggy 3.8 mile course in a fine time of 19:45 for 7th place.

After a seven mile race earlier in the day, Mark Sisson '75 managed to squeeze a bit more speed out of his legs, finishing eighth with a 20:02 clocking. Sophomore Garrick Leonard ran to a 9th place conclusion just six seconds behind Sisson, while Scott Lutrey '75 was awarded 10th place with the varsity's fifth man, Mike Behrman, 13 seconds behind in 11th.

Rounding out the scoring for the freshmen were: John McCammond (18th), Pat Dobson (19th), Ned Collins (26th) and Bob Tyler (34th). With Kolb, Carr and varsity captain Dan Sullivan joining the Alums for the '78 race, it looks as if the Aluminum Bowl will be taken out of the youngsters' hands for the first time. Of course, the seniors and Alums have been saying that for the past five years.

Tomorrow the Ephmen head north to Middlebury for the first of nine consecutive away meets. The harriers easily disposed of the Panthers last fall in Williamstown, but Middlebury's course with its rocks, roots and swamps may give the visiting Ephs some trouble.

Stickers stop Wesleyan

by Nancy Rhein

The rain was as steady as the Williams shots on goal as the women's field hockey team easily defeated Wesleyan 4-0, Saturday. Constantly threatening the Cardinal cage with 39 shots on goal, Williams took early control of the rain-soaked contest, hardly allowing the visitors to test Mimi DuMouchel in goal. Although DuMouchel had three nice saves, the fullbacks Lee Ash and Cammie McClellan terminated the little offense generated by Wesleyan.

The visitors were plagued by fouls from the very first faceoff and the Ephs ability to set up quickly on free hits kept the pace up and the pressure on. Minutes into the game, Sally Kraft tapped one in to put the score 1-0 for the half.

Halfbacks Priscilla Buckey, Sue Wright, and Betsy Lyman executed beautiful through shots but the pile-up of Wesleyan players in the goalmouth resulted in corner calls for most offense drives.

The Williams line, admittedly weak on corner play, failed to score on even one of the numerous corner opportunities (34), the only negative point of the game.

The lack of corner offense was easily forgotten though, as Kraft scored again early in the second half. Following excellent team play, Wellesley exchange Sue Wright tallied on a penalty stroke for the team 30 minutes into the half. Minutes later she set up the last Williams goal on a through pass to Inner Monica Grady. Wright, an aggressive halfback, displayed superior stickwork similar to that of last Thursday's Holyoke game which the Ephs tied, 2-2.

The Mount Holyoke match, played under slightly better conditions to that of Cole's swamp was a repeat of 1975's 2-2 tie, the closest the Ephs have come to defeating the talented Holyoke squad.

The hosts opened the South Hadley match with a goal by superstar Milda Castner. Williams came on strong in the second half though, winning six corners but again unable to connect for the tally. Inner Edie Thurber finally tied it up on a centering pass from wing Liza Olsen with Grady grabbing the go-ahead goal later.

With four minutes left in the contest, the team was unable to set up quickly enough to prevent an unexpected Holyoke free hit from deflecting off DuMouchel's pads and knotting the score at 2-2.

The team, undefeated as yet, meets Trinity in Hartford tomorrow with newly elected co-captains Liza Olsen and Cammie McClellan looking to repeat their 2-1 preseason victory over Trinity.

CC reverses stance on concert bids

Reversing its recent decision, the College Council voted unanimously to require the ACEC to consult with the Executive Committee of the Council before bidding for a concert performer.

Treasurer Harry Kelly moved for the change which abolishes the ACEC's right to make bids independently, a right granted by the council only two weeks ago. Claiming that a bid is a "verbally binding contract," Kelly charged that the previous decision "virtually gives the chairman of the ACEC the power to make a contract without any other check." Council President Tom Herwitz approved of the new rule, and pointed out that in the event that the ACEC had to make a bid on short notice, the Executive Committee would be able to meet immediately for consultation.

ACEC President Steve Case announced that Don McLean, who achieved national recognition in 1970 with the hit song, "American Pie," will perform in a Chapin Hall concert on Oct. 21. The ACEC had originally bid for Nils Lofgren to perform on that date, but withdrew from the bid when Lofgren demanded more money. Case estimated the total loss for the McLean event at approximately $1600.

Reporting for the Elections Committee, Vice President Peter Friesen announced appointees to 8 committees, including the Course Guide, Area Studies and Finance Committees. The council also approved the election of two Row House representatives to the Food Services Committee.

CEP plans to study specialization trend

by Chip Eastham

The Committee on Educational Policy has formed a subcommittee to evaluate the education offered at Williams and to determine whether the College provides a true liberal arts education.

The increasing trend toward specialization has caused some faculty to wonder if students organize what they learn across disciplinary lines. If there is a tendency for students to limit themselves to a particular department or division, the College might not be fulfilling its goals as a liberal arts institution.

According to Dean of the Faculty Francis C. Oakley, the value is not limited to students. In a memorandum on the subject he observed that "the ease of day-to-day contacts with colleagues in a broad array of disciplines" is an advantage of a small college.

He continued that a goal might be "to explore—both among ourselves and with our students—the underlying unities and elusive interrelations that bind together the apparently disparate realities which we study in our separate disciplines."

Before proposing specific programs, however, the committee must study the need for such a move. The table shown left outlines the distribution of course selections within the various divisions, by major for the Class of '73 (only one for which all relevant data has been compiled.) With the sole exception of the German student all majors show a concentration over 50 per cent within their division.

CEP Chairman Gordon C. Winston asked if it is a matter of the faculty not offering the courses the institution deems necessary, or the students not taking a "good course package." If the latter is the case, the College might need to offer more guidance through the variety of specializations present in the catalog, hoping that with better information the students can make the "right" choices.

Assuming that the students act in complete knowledge, but in a way other than that which the College sees as beneficial should the institution require specific courses or divisional requirements? Or should it endeavor to "entice" students into the "optimal" course distribution?

Although the "enticement" option sounds more attractive, faculty CEP member Michael Bell said he feels compulsion might be necessary. Bell, apparently referring to the Freshman Liquor Course offered during Winter Study 1977, cancelled for lack of student interest, asserted that to achieve the goal of a general education the College would need to require specific courses, or stiffen division requirements.

Possible alternatives include: a core curriculum of required courses, to guarantee a broad coherent introduction to liberal arts study; stiffer divisional requirements, possibly along the lines of the five divisions proposed by the CEP in 1967, or the addition of a fourth "General Education" division.

Group pushes conservation, recycling

An enthusiastic core of eleven students and Professor of Geology William Fox will attempt to reverse the trend towards environmental apathy at Williams this year as they implement On Campus Environment Committee (OCEC) plans to reduce dining hall waste and educate students about recycling and conservation.

During a meeting at which committee member Peter VanOot encouraged OCEC to "work on the big problems around campus," the committee discussed the problems of waste in college dining halls. Committee members resolved to immediately begin improvement on minimizing the use of plastics and eliminating excess food," but acknowledged that their plan of recycling glass, cans and paper in the major dining halls remains a critical problem.

According to Fox, a student recently spent his Winter Study as well as the month of February recycling the cans which had been used in Baxter Hall. After two months, he had collected several tons of tin. This fraction, multiplied several times over by including the major dining halls and continuing the project all year, would amount to a significant contribution to ecology.

The OCEC faces several problems before its plan to recycle dining hall waste is realized. They have agreed first to have a complete, workable plan drawn up before they submit it for discussion with the food service managers. VanOot said, "The program should be tailored so that

Chandler views regulation

President of the College John W. Chandler spoke to a group of students on governmental intervention in higher education and its effect on Williams at an informal meeting of the Tuesday Forum Tuesday night.

"The fact that we feel Williams has a special role to play as an institution of higher learning makes federal representatives very uneasy, I think," Chandler said. "There has been a trend towards the equalization of higher education since World War II and the GI Bill, and because of Williams' differences—the differences between public and private institutions of high quality—we have encountered great hostility."

According to Chandler, the full force of governmental intervention has yet to be felt at a school like Williams. Title IX, which requires equal consideration for both sexes in terms of athletic facilities and progress, is no surprise for Williams, where Director of Athletics Bob Peck says women have received increasing attention since their admission in 1970.

Chandler said he sees the federal government as taking a "reasonable stand" on the law calling for building renovations for the handicapped, and says that the effect of that legislation will not be devastating.

Williams currently receives $240,000 in governmental aid to students and $190,000 for research annually. Chandler said that although the paper work and general business involved with keeping federal records up to date is extensive, the time has not yet come that such aid is not worth the trouble.

In answer to a question from Bruce McElvein, '79, one of the members of the Tuesday Forum, Chandler speculated on the economic feasibility of Williams in the future. "It's interesting to note that, along with the gradual rise in the College's fees during the past twenty years or so, there has been a parallel rise in the average family's disposable income. Also, as the number of children in each family declines from four now to two, as current trends indicate, a greater portion of any family's income will be available for education per person.

"I don't think that Williams and comparable institutions are in danger of being too expensive for general consideration in the future. In fact, it is a college like Williams which will benefit from what is called the 'demographic crunch.'

Chandler went on to say that the government's attitude towards higher education as a type of consumer-producer relationship sometimes "made him very angry." "I can understand their concern, but I refuse to think of myself as a producer and the student as a consumer. The assumption then is that a conflict exists between the two."

Mandate spurs coop plans

by Stu Mandel

Carrying mandates from the President and Trustees of the College, members of the Student Housing Committee have begun formulating a proposal for implementing coop housing at Williams next fall.

The Housing Committee will cooperate with the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) over the next weeks to create a proposal adapting coop housing to Williams housing philosophy, Dean Cris Roosenraad said.

As Roosenraad, Director of Student Housing, Charles Jankey, and committee members evolved the concept, students would live in College-owned coophouses, off board and cooking their own meals. They would pay full room fees, though doing most cleaning and minor maintenance themselves, because "it's unlikely we would let anyone go from our service staff," Jankey said.

"We could not turn around and rent a building to students because of town zoning ordinances," the housing chief said explaining why the College will retain control of the houses. He also noted that health inspections will make upkeep of the kitchens important—with the College responsible.

"We want to have some proposal to take to the President and trustees for implementation next fall," Roosenraad said, underlining the priority given the proposal. A reaccreditation report which came out this fall also has suggested alternate housing.

Some Housing Committee members questioned the affect of coop housing on the existing choices of College and off-campus housing and fit into the
